Treasurer of the United States.

Hon. LEVI WOODBURY,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. President, I have now said all I wish to say upon this bill. I am perfectly aware that much of what I have said has no direct bearing upon, or connection with, the bill before us; but such has been the range of debate, I felt myself called upon (little prepared as I was) briefly to notice some of the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts. I can entertain no fear for the fate of the measure. The bill will pass, and I rejoice at it; and after what has been said, I hope I shall receive the co-operation, not only of the Senator from Massachusetts, but of other Senators in the Opposition, in securing, without delay, the passage of this bill, so essential to the public service, so important for the preservation of the public credit.

Mr. BENTON regretted extremely that another Treasury Note bill had been brought into Congress, and the more so, as it was easy to make a loan to supply the temporary deficiency in the Treasury. The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, asking for a temporary supply, mentioned a loan, as well as Treasury notes, as the means of raising it; and there was no doubt but that the Government could easily borrow the amount in hard money, which he (Mr. B.) greatly preferred to stamping bits of paper.

Mr. B. said the Senate would remember his repugnance to this mode of raising the supplies, as manifested at the called session of 1837, when this resource was first recurred to under this Administration; and again, when there was a second issue of these notes at the last session. On the former of these occasions, he said he had spoken at large on the subject; and would now, with the indulgence of the Senate, read a paragraph from the speech which he then delivered. It was in these words:

"I will now say a few words on the policy of issuing Treasury notes in time of peace, or even in time of war, until the ordinary resources of loans and taxes had been tried and exhausted. I am no friend to the issue of Treasury notes of any kind. As loans, they are a disguised mode of borrowing, and easy to slide into a currency; as a currency, it is the most seductive, the most dangerous, and the most liable to abuse, of all the descriptions of paper money. 'The stamping of paper (by Government) is an operation so much easier than the laying of taxes, or of borrowing money, that a Government in the habit of paper emissions would rarely fail, in any emergency, to indulge itself in the employment of that resource, to avoid, as much as possible, one less auspicious to present popularity.' So said General Hamilton; and in that, all the fathers of the Republican church—Jefferson, Madison, Macon, Randolph, and all the rest—concurred with him. These sagacious statesmen were shy of this facile and seductive resource, so liable to abuse, and so certain of being abused. They held it inadmissible to recur to it in time of peace, and that it could only be thought of in time of war; and that after exhausting the direct and responsible alternatives of loans and taxes. Bred in the school of these great men, I came here at this session to oppose, at all risks, an issue of Treasury notes. I preferred a loan, for many and cogent reasons," &c.

Mr. B. said these were his opinions three years ago, and all that had occurred since, had strengthened them—what was now occurring strengthened them. This is three times in three years that we have had recourse to this description of paper. Is it not proof of the danger sliding into the use of Government paper money; the most seductive, the most dangerous, and the most liable to abuse of all the descriptions of paper which can be issued?

Mr. B. did not propose to go into the subject of Treasury notes at present: he contented himself with recurring to his uniform dislike to them, and hoped that he might never see another bill for their issue. He was against this bill; he would be still more against a future one. He was perfectly certain that a loan of hard money might be made at present; and he was equally confident that the United States, by following the proper financial system—by following the financial system of our Constitution—could have gold and silver enough to carry on any war with any power of the world, without recourse to paper money, either State or Federal.

Mr. B. did not join in the discussion of the causes which made the present deficiency in the Treasury. Gentlemen in the Opposition may ascribe the deficiency to what cause they pleased. To him it was clear that it was owing to three causes: 1. The distribution of the surplus revenue among the States; 2. The failure of the old deposite banks (he meant a part of them only) to pay up the amounts for which they got delay from Congress in 1837 and '38, and the expected failure of the Bank of the United States to pay the two and a half millions which would be due from that institution before Congress met again; and 3. The wretched enactments of the compromise act of 1833. This act, concocted out of doors, and by gentlemen who had no practical knowledge of manufactures, and galloped through without consideration, is so loose, so vague, so uncertain in its generalities and classifications, that every thing is matter of doubt, and of contradictory interpretation; men differ as to what is cotton goods, worsted goods, silk goods, linen goods: they even differ as to what is a shirt, and what is a stocking—what is ready-made clothing, and what is uncut and unstitched goods. In these discrepancies, the questions go to the juries of the importing cities, and the Government "goes to the wall" in every trial. Mr. B. then referred to a document which he held in his hand, No. 49, of the House of Representatives, to show the extent of these losses to the Government, and read from page 44 as follows:

"Estimate of probable loss and prospective deficit of revenue, arising from the diversity of opinion in the construction of the acts imposing duties on imports, by reason of judicial decisions.

SILKS.

"The aggregate value of manufactures of silk, or articles classified as such, imported between the 1st of January, 1835, and the 31st of December, 1838, and exempted from duty, is ascertained to have amounted to upwards of $56,000,000.

Of this, there was imported in the year 1835 - - $14,984,564
1836 - - 20,331,896
1838 - - 10,277,705

"Assuming, therefore, that of these manufactures one-sixth part should have been otherwise classified, and paid duty as millinery or ready-made clothing, &c. upon an estimation, at the lowest rate, the probable loss on these manufactures to the revenue has amounted to $2,362,845.

Of this, the probable loss in 1835 was - - $624,356
1836 was - - 847,162
1837 was - - 463 090
1838 was - - 428,237

Taking, then, the importations and loss of 1839 as equivalent to those of 1838, and considering the extended operation of the principles of construction established by the courts upon the basis here given, it may safely be assumed that the prospective deficit will not fall short of $800,000 on this description of manufactures.

LINENS.

"The aggregate value of manufactures of hemp or flax, or articles classified as bleached and unbleached linens, between the 1st of January, 1835, and the 31st of December, 1838, and exempted from duty, is ascertained to have amounted to upwards of $22,562,239.

Of this, there was imported in the year 1835 - $5,932,568
1838 - 3,526,001

"Assuming, therefore, that of these manufactures one-fourth part thereof should have been otherwise classified, and paid duty as linens colored, &c. upon an estimation, at the lowest rate, the probable loss on these manufactures to the revenue has amounted to $1,411,389.

Of this, the probable loss in 1835 was - - $370,785
1836 was - - 516,988
1837 was - - 303,241
1838 was - - 220 375

"Taking, then, the importations and loss of 1839 as equivalent to those of 1837, and considering the extended operation of the principles before referred to, upon the basis here given, it may safely be assumed that the prospective deficit will not fall short of $400,000 on this description of manufactures.

WORSTED.

"The aggregate value of manufactures of worsted, or combed wool, or articles classified as worsted stuff goods, between the 1st of January, 1835, and the 31st of December, 1838, and exempted from duty, is ascertained to have amounted to upwards of $20,000,000.

Of this there was imported in the year 1835 - $6.549.278
1838 - 3,993,445

Assuming, therefore, that of these manufactures one-sixth part thereof should have been otherwise classified, and paid duty as woollens, &c., upon an estimation, at the lowest rates, the probable loss on these manufactures to the revenue has amounted to $1,285,142.

O. this, the probable loss in 1835 was - - $409,329
1836 was - - 416,832
1837 was - - 209,391
1838 was - - 249,590

"Taking the importations and loss of 1839 as equivalent to those of 1838, and considering the extended operation of the principles referred to, it may be safely assumed that the prospective deficit will not fall short of $500,000 on this description of manufactures.

"These data show that the probable annual loss on silks, linens, and worsteds, to the revenue, has averaged upwards of $1,250,000, and that the annual prospective deficit may be estimated as over $1.500,000, without taking into view the further deficiency resulting from the classification of mixed fabrics or manufactures, such as wool and cotton, wool and linen, and worsted with either of those components, although the difference in receipt is equivalent to one-fourth the value of such goods, which may be put down as little short of $2,000,000."

Such, said Mr. B. were the losses under the contradictory constructions of this bill—which were sufficient of themselves to account for the present deficit in the revenue. They had amounted, in four years past, to about eight millions of dollars, on three articles only; namely, silks, linens, and worsted. They had amounted, besides, to two millions annually on mixed fabrics; and the annual losses, until the act was amended, were computed at about $3,750,000. Such was the operation of the act which is called sacred and inviolable—which was not allowed to be amended in either House when it passed—and which is not to be allowed to be amended now. Yet the Administration has proposed to amend it; it has sent down the draft of a bill for this purpose; it was in this same document, No. 49: and Mr. B. was surprised that a bill in conformity to it had not been reported by some committee, or brought in by some member.

[Mr. HUBBARD said such a bill had been reported in the House of Representatives.]

Mr. B. said that would supersede what he was going to say, which was that he would himself give notice of an intended motion from himself to bring in such a bill.

Mr. B. said he had, in his place, at the time this bill passed—the night it was "registered"—declared that no Administration could execute it; that it was a mass of loose generalities and vague classifications, about which no two persons could agree. He named this among other objections to the bill at the time; and was answered from the other side of the House, by one of the authors of the bill [Mr. CLAY, of Kentucky,] that, if the Administration would execute the bill in the same spirit in which it was made, meaning, no doubt, the same amiable spirit, there would be no difficulty in it. This was one of the objections he then made against the bill; and time had shown that he was right. Mr. B. was led into this view of the operation of this act by the censure thrown upon the Administration for the deficiency in the Treasury; a deficiency which every body would see resulted from the distribution of the surplus revenue; from the default of some of the former deposite banks, and the expected default of the Bank of the United States, which must be provided for; and from the losses to the revenue in executing the compromise act of 1833.

Mr. B. had said nothing on this bill to issue Treasury notes, except to justify his vote against it, and to state that his ancient repugnance to this mode of supply had become stronger, and was now insuperable.

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. President, I must confess that I have been greatly surprised at the determined opposition of the Senator from Missouri to this, as well as to other kindred measures. The Senator opposes it on the ground that it is substantially an issue of paper money; and he urges the propriety, instead of a resort to a measure like this, to negotiate a loan at once. Paper money: what sort of justice is there in calling these evidences of public debt paper money? No, sir, it is a loan—a temporary loan. I admit it gives to the President authority to borrow, upon the credit of the country, five millions; it points out the form of issuing the certificates of this debt; it fixes their denomination; it pledges the faith of the Confederacy for their redemption; all these, sir, are essentials in the negotiation and perfection of a loan. But the Senator approves not the mode; he would at once contract the entire loan. I would, sir, at a time like this, do no such thing. His distinguished friend had been, for years gone by, the able advocate against monopolies—against banks—moneyed corporations—the aristocracy of wealth; and does not the plan he now submits and recommends go to encourage monopolies—to favor banks—to extend to the moneyed power the exclusive privilege of taking such loans? This constitutes the objection I have to loans, negotiated in the common mode. I would appeal to my friend to carry into practice his principles on this occasion—to come in aid of this bill. Let the application go forth to every class of the community; let the farmers, the mechanics, the laboring classes, who may have a few hundreds in their purses, be permitted to come to the aid of their Government in the time of its need. Such a course would indeed be a full illustration of the abstract views of the Senator from Missouri. Compel not the Government to seek relief from the moneyed power of Europe; impose not upon her the humiliating necessity of proclaiming her necessities to the bankers of England, when, within our own land, corporations, as well as individuals, would vie with each other in extending to the Administration all the pecuniary assistance the peculiar exigencies of the country would require.

After some further remarks from Messrs. BUCHANAN, SMITH of Indiana, and PRESTON, the question was taken on the passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative—ayes 25, noes 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Dixon, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Phelps, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, and Young—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Benton, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Merrick, Preston, Ruggles, and White—8.

The Senate adjourned.

CUMBERLAND ROAD.

IN SENATE,

THURSDAY, April 2, 1840.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was then taken up, the question being on the substitute proposed by Mr. CLAY of Alabama yesterday.

Mr. WHITE addressed the Senate at much length in favor of the bill.

After some remarks in reply by Mr. CLAY of Kentucky,

Mr. LUMPKIN said: Mr. President, many considerations have inclined me to give a silent vote on this bill. It is a favorite measure with many of my personal and political friends. But, sir, after what has fallen from the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. WHITE,] I feel myself called upon at least to correct his impressions and statements in regard to matters which he has thought proper to introduce in connection with my own State. The Senator has evinced his utter want of a correct knowledge of the facts and circumstances of which he has spoken, so far as Georgia is concerned. It was to me a matter of surprise that the Senator should attempt to aid the passage of the Cumberland road bill, by stating that the Federal Government had expended upwards of six millions of dollars, to aid Georgia in getting rid of her Indians, and other purposes of liberal expenditure in aid of that State.

Sir, the impressions and misapprehensions of that Senator would need no correction here, so far as this Senate is concerned, for I am sure, sir, that no other member of this body, except himself, is so uninformed upon the subject of the Senator's address. But, sir, his age must plead his apology; he has spoken of things which transpired before his birth; and he has neglected to make himself acquainted with the history of the transactions upon which he has attempted to enlighten the Senate. I will, therefore, for the edification and instruction of the Senator, inform him here, upon the floor of the Senate, that, instead of the State of Georgia ever having been a recipient member of the favors of this Union, she has been one of its most liberal donors. Yes, sir, Georgia has given much to build up and strengthen this great confederacy of States, while she has asked nothing—received nothing.

The gentleman's items of charge against Georgia are nothing more than the tardy payment of the just debts of this Government to Georgia, for a most valuable consideration—debts long withheld, and grudgingly and reluctantly paid. The just demands of Georgia upon this Government were long kept back, under the humiliating plea of inability. Look at the maps on your walls, sir: see the large, fertile, and flourishing States of Alabama and Mississippi, ceded by Georgia to the United States, under the compact and cession of 1802. And what did Georgia receive for this extensive and lovely domain? A mere song, sir—$1,250,000, a promise to settle certain fraudulent claims against the State, and the more important consideration of a promise to extinguish the Indian claim to all lands within the limits of Georgia, abridged as these limits were by that cession. And, sir, the want of good faith on the part of this Government has retarded and crippled the prosperity of Georgia up to this day. We have, sir, but just got rid of our Indians: much of our territory is still an unimproved, unsettled wilderness. Whereas, if this Government had been faithful to its compact with Georgia, we should have had a population and improvements proportioned to our extensive limits and productive soil. Under these circumstances, sir, I can never remain silent in this hall, and permit it to be proclaimed to the country that the Federal Government has graciously spent millions from its Treasury for the benefit of Georgia. The true cause why this Government has been compelled to spend so large a sum in fulfilment of its obligations to Georgia, has arisen out of its own bad faith, and procrastination of a plain duty. Time was when this Government might have extinguished the whole of the Indian title to lands in Georgia, upon reasonable and peaceable terms. But instead of discharging this honest duty, it pursued a different policy. It forced the Indians from its own lands upon the lands of Georgia, and finally, when Georgia determined no longer thus to suffer herself to be trifled with and imposed upon, this Government found itself under the necessity of giving to the Indians an extravagant price for their claims to lands within the limits of Georgia.

And now, sir, can the Senator from Indiana expect to help out the Cumberland road bill by attempting to make the impression upon the minds of Senators, that there is the slightest similarity between this Government paying a debt to Georgia, and taking money from your Treasury to make a road in the States to be benefited by this road. Sir, I state to you, and I hold the proof in my hand—a communication from the Treasury Department—that while the payments from the Treasury of the United States, from the 1st of January, 1801, to the 31st of December, 1839, for internal improvements by the Federal Government, amount in the aggregate to $18,681,683 65, and the interest on this immense expenditure, since its disbursement, would, if added, amount to twenty-five millions of dollars, at least, expended by this Government on objects called internal improvement, by the Federal Government. And, sir, out of this immense sum, what amount would you suppose Georgia had received, after what has fallen from the Senator from Indiana? I will inform, not only you, sir, but the Senator from Indiana. Georgia has received, out of twenty-five millions of dollars, seventeen thousand dollars, applied to the removal of obstructions in the Savannah river. Yes, sir, you have the amount, all told. Now, sir, the new State of Indiana, the Senator's own State, has received considerably upwards of one million of this vast expenditure. Under these circumstances, sir, can that Senator expect to stand here unrebuked, when he attempts to make comparisons between Georgia and Indiana in reference to sharing the spoils of the public Treasury, in a scrambling system of internal improvement? No, sir, Georgia has never been a competitor with many other States in seeking special favors from this Government. She seeks nothing—she asks nothing in the way of special favors. Equality, justice, a strict adherence to the Constitution, is the motto of Georgia. Mr. President, upon constitutional grounds, I am opposed to this measure; I can find no grant in the Constitution to authorize these appropriations. But, sir, I know that constitutional arguments are wholly useless upon this subject. Such arguments have been reiterated again and again in my hearing, and in both branches of Congress, for twenty-five years past.

Sir, when we base ourselves on the Constitution, it only excites a sneer. We are sometimes even ridiculed for our constitutional scruples; yet we are all bound in the most solemn manner to support the Constitution. But, sir, ample and conclusive objections to my mind, may be found against a further prosecution of this Cumberland road by the Federal Government, upon the "general welfare" principle; and, sir, should I hereafter, as I possibly may, submit any remarks to the Senate on this subject, I will meet the friends of the "general welfare" school on their own ground, and endeavor to show that it is inexpedient, impolitic, and unwise, further to prosecute this work. If I might be allowed to offer a word of advice to the friends of this measure, it would be to come to a compromise upon this subject; they ought, in my opinion, gladly to have accepted of the proposition of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] proposing to give the Sates through which this road passes, two per cent. of the nett proceeds of the public lands hereafter accruing from the sales in those States.

Is it not obvious that this measure is losing favor on every side of this chamber? Sir. I think it will not require many more such speeches as we have this day heard from the Senator from Indiana [Mr. WHITE] to seal the fate of this Cumberland road. It is true, sir, the Senator's speech was honestly and zealously intended to be in support of the measure. But, sir, all the able speeches which I have heard in opposition to this measure, for twenty-five years past, have not tended so effectually and fully to convince me of its great evils, as has the speech of the Senator this day, intended for its support. If this measure continues to obtain favor, it must expect it upon open, fair ground. It is useless for its friends to attempt longer to support it under the pretence of compacts, and two per cent. or three per cent. funds, set apart for that purpose. The Federal Government has more than discharged its obligations, arising under its compacts, with the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois. Upon this solitary road, the Government has already paid the enormous sum of $6,777,739 82—more than ten per cent. of the nett proceeds of the public lands which have been sold in those States. Why, then, sir, longer talk about the two per cent. and three per cent. to which these States are entitled under compacts with this Government? No one will hereafter be deluded by thus mystifying this subject. Equally fallacious and futile is the attempt to make it appear that other States, and portions of the Union, have been the recipients of like favors and appropriations. All such attempts will have to stand upon a similar foundation to the one this day attempted to be imposed upon the State of Georgia, and which I have felt myself called upon to expose and refute.

Mr. ROANE said: Nothing was ever farther from my intention than to have opened my lips on the subject under consideration. I am, Mr. President, always extremely reluctant to participate in the debates of this body, and had not supposed it possible than any thing would occur, which could induce me to do so in regard to the bill now under discussion. But, sir, the very earnest, fervent, and almost personal appeal which the Senator Indiana [Mr. WHITE] most unexpectedly made a few minutes since to me, the only representative from Virginia on this floor, in behalf of this measure, renders it proper that I should promptly and immediately add a few brief words to the more potent monosylable, which it will very soon become no less my pleasure than my duty, to utter against the passage of this bill. And why, sir, are these appeals made to me as a representative of Virginia? On what principle, on what grounds, by what precedents, am I invoked to give aid or countenance to this "Cumberland road" bill? Has it heretofore received the countenance and support of that State? Have my predecessors in this chamber been its advocates or patrons? If so, I am unacquainted with the fact. The Senator, it seems, predicates his appeal to the favor of Virginia, upon the interest she has in this road, because of its leading through her territory, and also because of its reaching to, and passing by, her flourishing town of "Wheeling." Let us see what force or weight there is in these considerations. Sir, this road takes its start (as well as its name) from the town of Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to a destined terminus at some suitable point on the river Ohio. The town of Wheeling was selected as that point. A due regard to the geography of the intervening country, and the principles of engineering, required, therefore, that the road should seek its passage to the Ohio through a small portion—a mere corner—of the territory of Virginia! The entire length of the road through that territory is only about fourteen miles! What great favor does this circumstance confer on that State? What great interest can it excite in Virginia or her citizens? And what obligation should it impose on her Representatives to vote annually large sums of the national treasure towards extending its progress through the boundless West! But, sir, we are also informed that the town of Wheeling, in Virginia, by which this road passes, has grown up to be a flourishing, populous, and wealthy city. True, sir, and we rejoice that it is true. But permit me to say to the gentleman, that neither the town of Wheeling, nor any of the other cities which have sprung up, as if by magic, on the banks of the Ohio, and all our other Western rivers, owe their rapid growth and unexampled prosperity to this Cumberland road. Be assured, sir, that the flourishing, enterprising town of Wheeling, would at this moment be struggling and plodding with a stinted growth, had her prosperity depended alone on the influence and effect of the Cumberland road. I will tell you, sir, to what she owes her rapid advance in population, wealth, and enterprise: she owes it partly to her almost unequalled water power, but mainly to the mighty power of steam, which has given navigation to her noble river, and machinery to her multiplying workshops. The revered name of Mr. Jefferson, too, the honored patriot and venerated statesman of Virginia, has been invoked to enlist the feelings of his native State in behalf of this road. Yes, sir; gentlemen who perhaps have but little respect for the opinions and principles of that great man on other subjects, are frequently most forward and clamorous in proclaiming his orthodoxy, when the public Treasury is to be tapped for the benefit of the "Cumberland road."

It is, perhaps, too late in the day, and is entirely unnecessary to my purpose, to argue the constitutionality of this road. Whatever may have been the reasons originally to justify or excuse the scheme, they do not, in my opinion, apply at the present time. Mr. Jefferson did, I believe, some forty years ago, or nearly, sanction, and perhaps patronize and foster, this road; but I am certain that he would never have done so, could he have foreseen its consequences, direct and collateral. He never even dreamed that it would attain its present length, and become an annual sponge, or perpetual drain on the public Treasury. When this work was first projected, the vast and fertile region north and west of the river Ohio, was a dreary wilderness, occupied by barbarians and wild beasts. It is blooming, populous and wealthy, having contributed six or more additional members to our blessed family of States. Mr. Jefferson, sir, had greatly at heart the settlement, population and improvement of this country, and could have projected and favored this road to its great river with no other view and expectation than to facilitate the migration thither of the enterprising pioneers and hardy settlers of his "favorite West," as he was wont to call that region. Besides, sir, the power of steam was not then known: It was not then within the ken of the wisest man to foresee, that so soon after the adoption of this plan of conducting the people, implements and other means of civilization into the wilderness of the far West, the stubborn currents of its mighty rivers were destined to yield to it a safe, easy, rapid, and most profitable navigation. Mr. President, it seems clear to my mind, that if these things could have been anticipated, we should never have heard of this "Cumberland road:" for if my information is correct, it is fast yielding to their influence, and becoming in a great degree a mere neighborhood affair in the States where these vast amounts of the national treasure are expended for its extension. I am informed, that nearly all who wend their way into the far West, invariably, when they reach the Ohio river, abandon the delightful coaches of this magnicent road, and pursue their journey in steamboats whenever the river is navigable.

Mr. President, this "Cumberland road" which was at first but a little serpent, is now fast growing to be a mighty anaconda, elongating itself through an empire, and involving States in its griping and inextricable folds! When and where, sir, is it to stop? Its course is onward, onward—"crescit eundo," is most emphatically its motto. "It grows as it progresses," and its appetitite is only sharpened by what it feeds on. The millions which have been already appropriated to its uses, only stimulate its cupidity, and embolden its demands for other millions. When and where, Mr.

President, I again, and earnestly ask, is this thing to stop? Where is to be its terminus, or is it to be interminable? Will gentlemen tell us? I see a bill laid upon our tables to authorize the President (I think) to have marked out the boundaries, and to take possession, of the Teritory of Oregon.

Think you then that this road, if permitted thus to go on, is to stop even at the base of the Rocky mountains? Will it not cross over, or pass through, those slight impediments, and then pursue with fresh vigor its onward course through the delightful plains of Oregon, to the bright shore of the great Pacific Ocean. And what will there then be to prevent its return to its native East, by a new and circuitous route through other States? I, sir, for one, am ready at this moment to stop the "progress of this evil;" and if we cannot "kill the snake," let us "scotch it." I am against this bill, Mr. President, because, in my soul and conscience, I do not think we have power under the Constitution to pass it. I am against it, because I think it unjust, impolitic, and inexpedient to pass it; and if it was both constitutional and expedient, I should be against it, because of the present meagre state of the Treasury and disturbed condition of the country, both in its domestic and foreign relations.

Mr. SMITH of Indiana said he had not intended to say any thing on the subject at this moment, though, as a member of the committee that had reported the bill, and coming from a State feeling some interest in the question, he had supposed it might become his duty to reply to the speeches of the gentlemen opposed to the measure before the final vote was taken. The remarkable speech of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] who had just taken his seat, said Mr. S. will change my original intention, and induce me now to submit some remarks, in answer to the positions assumed by that Senator, who seems to be among the most zealous opponents of this measure, and I desire the especial attention of that Senator to my remarks. I wish to know whether I have misunderstood him, for I assure him I desire to present his arguments to the Senate fairly, and to answer them candidly. Did I understand the Senator correctly as saying that this road is local in its character, because it does not point to Mobile or New Orleans?

[Mr. CLAY of Alabama here rose and said he did not place its unconstitutionality on that ground, but that it did not terminate either on the seaboard or on the frontier.]

Then, sir, said Mr S. the constitutionality of a work of this kind is to be tested by the point at which it tesminates. This is a remarkable doctrine. As this road is to terminate at a point connecting itself with the great thoroughfare of commerce in the Southwest, it is unconstitutional; whereas, if it had connected with the frontier or the Atlantic, it would have ceen constitutional.

[Mr. CLAY of Alabama said he had contended that the work was local, as it was confined to three or four States at most in its benefits.]

Not exactly so, Mr. President, said Mr. S. How does the Senator make out his case? If you admit his premises, he can make a very plausible speech. But, are his premises correct? How does he make out, in the first place, that the road is confined, in its benefits, to only three or four States at most, in order to make it unconstitutional? Why, sir, he must sever the work at the Ohio river, and take one end or the other of it—either the eastern or the western section—and even then his position is untenable. But which end will he take? not the eastern end, surely, running through Virginia, Pennsylvania, and Maryland; for that end all admit to be constitutional. Mr. Jefferson said so, and therefore he cannot mean the eastern division; he must mean the western, running through Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, and ultimately, I hope, through Arkansas. Then, sir, I am to understand that the road in the contemplation of the Senator, west of the Ohio, is unconstitutional, and east of the Ohio is constitutional. Do I understand the Senator right in this particular?

[Mr. CLAY again rose and said, he should despair of making the Senator from Indiana understand him. He had contended for no such doctrine as that one end of the road was constitutional, and the other end unconstitutional.]

Then, Mr. President, said Mr. S. how does the Senator make out the work to be a local measure, confined to three States, and at most to four; if he gives us the benefit of the whole road, he must and does know that the road, as located, extends from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to St. Charles, in the State of Missouri, running through seven States, and that it is contemplated to continue it through the eighth. What, then, becomes of his local question? He has referred to the veto message of General Jackson on the Maysville road bill. I did not expect to hear that Senator refer to that document, as he voted for that bill both before and after the veto, as I understood him as admitting to my friend from Illinois, [Mr. YOUNG] But, sir, let me once for all say to those who recognise the doctrines of that veto message, here and elsewhere, that, for one, I am entirely willing to test the question before the Senate by the doctrines of that document. I mean, upon the question whether this be a local or a national work. Sir, if the Cumberland road is not a national work, where, in the name of Heaven, can you find one; a work that connects, as it were, two continents—the Atlantic with the great valley of the Mississippi, crossing the American Andes, and uniting the States and people of the Republic by a chain that will remain for ages a monument of the wisdom of our statesmen, and which may, like the Appean way of Rome, outlive the liberties of the country, and remain a memento of our nation as she was in the pure days of the Republic.

The Senator from Alabama is not the only Senator who has pointed to the western portion of the road, from the river Ohio west, and argued that it was local, and some have said almost useless, as the Ohio river, they seem to suppose, answers all the purposes of the road; at most, they say, that portion of the road is only beneficial to the few States through which it runs. These views are, no doubt, honestly urged; but, sir, knowing something about this matter personally, I aver to you, that if I were called upon this moment, by my vote, to dispense with either end of the work, I would not hesitate a moment in selecting the eastern portion from Wheeling to Cumberland; and for this obvious reason—you have a number of avenues, roads, and canals, from the Ohio river to the Atlantic, besides the Cumberland road; when it is a fact known to all, that there is but the single thoroughfare for the whole travel, stages, mails, and emigrants, west from the Ohio, running directly through these great States; nor could it be maintained, for a moment, that the Ohio river would answer as a substitute for the road, even if it were admitted that it was at all times navigable, as the road runs through the centre of the States, about equidistant between the Ohio and the lakes, say at an average of near one hundred miles from the Ohio. Senators say that it is only beneficial to four States, at most. This is a limited and erroneous view of the question. It is beneficial to the whole; if it is not, what becomes of your break-waters, light-houses, fortifications harbors, custom-houses, and improved rivers. They are infinitely more local than this work, and yet who ever thought of confining their benefits to the particular State in which they are located? Suppose, however, the benefits of the road were confined to four States; is it no object to construct it? These four States contain a population greater than was contained in the Union at the period of the Revolution. They have paid into the National Treasury over $70,000,000 for public lands alone, besides their equal proportion of your imposts. And are they to have no return? Are they to be ostracised by this new-born policy of the present day?

I have, in my report, pointed to this work as a great commercial road, and therefore national in that point of view. Sir, I repeat it here, I am aware of the new-fangled doctrine on this subject, but I have read and listened in vain to the arguments of gentlemen possessing powers capable of illustrating any proposition with clearness and force, with the single object of seeing or hearing some satisfactory solution of this matter, and I would now like to hear some gentleman, who has made this matter his study—and I see several in the Senate—tell me why it is that you can constitutionally clear out and improve, at the expense of the Government, under the commercial power, Tar river, in North Carolina, where the whole commerce may consist of the passage, in a wood boat, of a few barrels of tar or turpentine, and a return cargo of a barrel or two of salt, when, under the same power, you cannot construct or complete the Cumberland road over which, in addition to the great mails, (which are strangers at Tar river) there are more actual commercial operations in one day than there are on the river I have named in a year. I have only selected that river as an illustration, as there are innumerable cases equally strong; but I select the North Carolina case, because both the Senators from that State deny the constitutional power to construct this work. Let Senators read me the clause in the Constitution that relates to the regulation of commerce carried on in boats or vessels, and excludes that carried in wagons. Can it be possible that as soon as a box of goods leaves the boat and enters a wagon, it changes its constitutional relations? Can that instrument be so read, without doing violence to its provisions? I know that construction will suit the seaboard, but it is not the true reading of that charter, which was created for the benefit of all, universal in its provisions, and applicable to the thousand different shapes commercial operations may assume. I do not say that the opinions cannot be maintained, by which the commercial powers of the Government are confined to the water, but I do say I have never heard or read any argument intelligible to me sustaining that distinction, and I repeat, I shall be pleased to hear some one of the many restrictionists here attempt to sustain it now. Mr. President, since you entered political life—yes, sir, since I have taken part in political matters, which is long since you were at the meridian, these new-fangled doctrines have sprung up; they did not vegetate in the soil of the Revolution, nor were they cherished or countenanced by the heroes and sages who formed our Constitution; and who, it might be supposed, if we were not told otherwise, had some knowledge of the provisions contained in it. I do not feel bound to go into the whole constitutional argument to sustain the power until I hear gentlemen, who admit the commercial power to make harbors and clear out rivers, in which I heartily concur, draw a distinction intelligible to me, against the power in this case.

The Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] and the other Senators, have based their arguments against this bill, so far as I have been able to understand, them, on the following ground, in addition to the constitutional objections, and the locality of the road, which objections I have adverted to. They say that the funds, or rather the two per cent. of the sales of the public lands in the States through which the road runs, has been exhausted; and, therefore, there is no obligation on the part of the Government to complete the work. I am aware, sir, that this argument is plausible, and upon a superficial view of the subject, it is well calculated to prejudice honest minds against the bill. I shall, therefore, direct the most of the remarks which I shall submit at this time to that point, leaving the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. YOUNG,] my colleague, and others, to discuss the subject more at large. I am not about to deny the position assumed, that a sum equal to the amount of the two per cent. of the sales of the public lands in the States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, has been expended by the General Government on this road. I presume such to be the fact. But, sir, when I have admitted all this, I contend that, so far as the merits of the question are concerned, I have admitted nothing against the bill. If this work be, as I contend it is, a national work, commenced by the Government, and located to and through its public domain, in the valley of the Mississippi, with the avowed object of facilitating the settlement of the public domain, and thereby of aiding the public Treasury in meeting the heavy debt which was hanging over the country; and if, by such location, as I contend, the Government held out to the purchasers of her lands the assurance that the road so located by her should be finished, she canno, now abandon the work without a gross violation of public faith, nor without doing the greatest injustice to the people, who have purchased, and improved at high prices, the land on the line of the work, relying on the completion of it in good faith; nor can the Government now abandon the work without doing violence to the States through which it runs, upon general principles. I am not now examining the compacts. It is a fact well known by all Western Senators, that, upon the location of the Cumberland road through the States west of the Ohio river, the State roads running in the same direction were abandoned, and the whole travel thrown upon this road; the State roads were located upon a scale corresponding with State necessities and State means, while this road was located and intended to be constructed upon a scale of expenditure far beyond any thing that a State would have contemplated—hence the great injustice of abandoning this national work to be completed on a scale ruinous to the States, and about which they were not consulted; nor are their means adapted to it. I hold upon general principles, therefore, that, as the work was laid down by the Federal Government on a national scale, it should be constructed by the National Treasury. But, sir, do the compacts relieve the Government from her general responsibility to complete the construction of this work. I maintain that they do not; and here I am apprised I am about to assault the supposed impregnable fortress of the enemies to this work. I meet the question with pleasure, and all I can ask is, that Senators may hear me with patience and meet my arguments with candor. What is the true meaning of the compacts, or, in other words, what was the contract between the States west of the Ohio river and the General Government in relation to this work? I am answered by the Senator from Alabama. It was simply that two per cent. arising from the sales of the public lands in those States should be expended by the Government towards a road leading towards those States; and that when such an expenditure has been made, the Government has discharged its obligation to the States. This position I wholly repudiate. I contend that the General Government was bound to make the road, and that the two per cent. reserved by her was to aid her in the completion of the work; and I rely upon the following facts to sustain me. The construction of this road was a part of the original land policy of the nation as the proprietor of the domain in the Valley of the Mississippi. It was commenced, and in progress, long before the existence of the compacts between the States of Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, with the General Government, and was not therefore prompted by these compacts.

Immediately after the location of the road through Ohio, the Government reduced the price of the lands from two dollars to one dollar and twenty-five cents per acre, and made large grants, for various purposes, without the consent of the States. The States were never consulted in relation to either the route, scale, or location of the work, but, on the contrary, the Government laid down the scale and prosecuted the work upon her own plan, wholly independent of the States, which certainly would not have been the case, had it been understood by either party that the work was to be abandoned whenever the two per cent. was expended, arising from sales of the residue of the lands at the reduced price. The truth is, as the early estimates and reports show, it was believed by all parties that the two per cent. fund would finish the work; and it was upon that principle the Government agreed to make it, and proceeded, without consultation with the States in relation to the scale or location of the work, as the States had nothing to do with that matter. What would have been the situation of the parties, if the construction of the Senator from Alabama should be adopted? Why, sir, the General Government would have the whole power in her hands, and the compacts to the States would be a dead letter. The expenditure of the two per cent. towards making a road leading towards the State, might be so made as to lay out the whole fund east of the Alleghany mountains, on the foundation of a work which the States west of the Ohio would be compelled to complete, to avail themselves of any benefit whatever from the fund, even if such a benefit would result from a work not coming near their borders. Such a construction of the compacts would not be listened to a moment, were the question one between individuals—much less can it be maintained between the high contracting parties in this case.

But let me examine the position a little further, and suppose the General Government a trustee for the States in the expenditure of the two per cent. fund on this road. I put it to the Senators who oppose the bill, whether it was competent for her to diminish the funds by a reduction of the price and quality of the land from which it was to be raised. Will Senators attempt to maintain that, in the discharge of the trust, the Government could lay down the work on a scale so national and expensive that the fund would only be sufficient to commence the work, and leave for the States the completion of a work of dimensions so extensive as to put it out of their power to finish, without great embarrassment? I hold that, viewing it merely as a trust question, a faithful discharge of that trust required the Government to appropriate the whole fund that would have arisen from the sales of the whole of the public lands at the prices fixed at the date of the compacts, in the completion of the work, and if she reduced the price of the land, made donations or grants for any purpose whatever, laid out the work on a scale too extensive for the fund, withheld appropriations until they were consumed in repairs, or otherwise improvidently dissipated the fund, or defeated the object, it was at her peril and at her own expense, and is no answer to the States when they ask for the appropriations to complete the work. This, sir, is briefly my view of this question. I might amplify and illustrate, but I choose to be concise, in hopes that I may not deter those who are willing to understand this question from reading my remarks and examining my positions. The argument of a bankrupt Treasury seems to be urged against this bill with unusual force by gentlemen who participate largely in national expenditures. I have met this argument more than once during the discussion on this subject in its various stages, and I can do little more now than repeat what I have before said; and that is, that I will not accept of that plea as a defence against the charge of a refusal to make this appropriation; last year the same cry was raised; the bill passed the Senate, and fell in the House. Notwithstanding the cry, then, I see the expenditures of the Government last year were $31,815,000, not a dollar of which was appropriated to this work. Where did it go? aye, that is the question. Are we, then, to be told of an empty Treasury as an excuse for not completing this road? Sir, will not that plea be just as good next year as it is this? Will not objects of expenditure be always found sufficient to drain the Treasury, in exclusion of this work, if we are to be put off with that excuse? As one of the friends of the work, I demand that it shall participate in your expenditures. If economizing is to be the order of the day, I am willing that our great work may bear its due proportion of the reduction of expenditures, with the other objects to which the national expenditures have been directed, but I protest against its exclusion. I regret exceedingly that the Administration should have thought proper to leave this work out of the annual estimates. I greatly fear the effect of this rejection in the estimates may prove disastrous to the appropriation, though I do not see why it should. I am apprised of the power of party, and how difficult it is for gentlemen to rid themselves of party influence; still I do hope that the friends of this work will rise above party considerations, and sustain that policy which was commenced by Mr. Jefferson, and prosecuted through the succeeding administrations, maintain the national faith, and give no just grounds of complaint to those who have relied on us to complete this great national work. I will not detain the Senate longer, leaving it for others to go more at large into the condition of the road, and claims of the West. I rose to a few prominent points in the argument, and having said briefly what I proposed saying, I leave the matter with a confident hope that the appropriation will not be withheld.

After some remarks in reply by Mr. CLAY of Alabama.

Mr. ANDERSON said he did not rise for the purpose of entering into the details of the discussion, and should have been contented merely to record his vote, but for the remarks which had just been made by his friend [Mr. CLAY] from Alabama. This last and earnest appeal which he had addressed to the opponents of this measure, to induce them to support his amendment, made it altogether proper that he should say a few words in explanation of the course he should take.

Mr. A. said he had listened with great attention, when this subject was discussed on yesterday, to the remarks of the distinguished Senator near him, [Mr. CALHOUN,] from South Carolina, and took occasion to state that he concurred most fully in the views which he had advanced in regard to the great principles that, in his opinion, apply to the main question. The amendment had been advocated as a proposition which would put this perplexed claim forever at rest. If he entertained this hope, nothing would gratify him more than to give to it his most candid support; or if there was even a remote probability that this would be the result, he would cheerfully unite with those gentlemen. There was nothing he more desired than that some plan could be devised by which this important and exciting subject could be surely and lastingly severed from us. But he said he had examined the amendment with care, in the hope of finding the grounds upon which gentlemen had placed their expectations, and he regretted to say that there was nothing, either within the context or the proviso, which would justify him in the belief that it would be well received by the parties who are so deeply interested, or which could be considered as in any way final and obligatory. Sir, said he, they have higher views of their own claims, which have risen with the progress of legislation. In fact, there is nothing by which you propose to bind them. It would only end as a mere gratuity, and the practical result would be, if they were to accept your proposition, the condition would not be felt to be binding as to any thing except that they should merely take into their own hands the application and expenditure of a certain amount of money. They would, hereafter, urge that the very consideration expressed upon the face of this amendment implied your concession of their claim; and after exhausting the funds which you had given to them, they would return upon you with redoubled energy and augmented demands. They would come here from year to year. They would never cease to urge their pretensions upon you. It is according to the laws which govern all human action that this should be so. We ought to remember that a massive population, growing in numbers, and spread over a vast territory, occupying four States of this Union, will continue to feel that their interests have entered into the success of this road; and, sir, you have no alternative but to meet the question face to face. He voted against the amendment of yesterday for several reasons, which it was unnecessary to repeat, except to say, generally, that he had no objection to the friends of the measure fashioning it in its greatest strength, because, in a contest of this sort, this would sooner or later be done; and the only true method of resistance was to meet it fully and boldly, and in the strongest shape in which it could be presented. The overthrow would then be the more signal and permanent. We have, sir, no safety in mere strategy. Ours is a cause which must be fought upon the basis of principle, or not at all. We have no allurements to offer. If we are defeated we must renew the contest—discuss our principles, enlighten the public mind, and rely upon it, in the end, a free and thinking people will abide by their Constitution, and return into the halls of Congress the true expression of their opinions. As to this amendment, you have nothing to hope from it. It settles nothing, and, said he, I shall vote against it, and against the bill, because it is unconstitutional.

Sir, said he, I should be greatly gratified to see ourselves relieved from the burden of this question, so that the Congress of this great Republic should no longer experience this incessant and harassing oppression, and that in regard to all great questions of such high constitutional import, no local interests, wielding a powerful influence, could be brought to move upon our sympathies. In this view, he hoped that the time would come when this subject, embracing such a variety of considerations, will, under some judiciously devised plan, be finally disposed of, and that we, sir, will be untrammelled, and beyond its reach. Sir, we will then stand as we ought, fully and fairly as to matters of this sort, upon the great constitutional question of internal improvement by the General Government. All other lines and shades touching it will then be extinguished, and, in the true character of American Senators, we might put at rest forever the pretension of this immense and imposing power, which is advocated by a great party in this country. Sir, I look upon this power of internal improvement by the General Government as more seductive, influential, and dangerous than any which has ever been claimed for it. The power to establish a United States Bank is far beneath it, in all that concerns the great practical results upon our social and political system. The latter is but as a single rod of iron, while, compared to that, the other is as a thousand of similar size, bound into a single bundle; and looking upon the question in this aspect, he preferred to meet it full in the front, and, if we can, to vote it down. He believed it to be the only mode to adjust it, unless it can be otherwise done at some future day, by the fully expressed concurrence of the parties involved. Mr. A. concluded by saying that these remarks were sufficient to explain what he thought as to the amendment, and which was the sole object for which he had risen.

Mr. PIERCE briefly replied to Mr. ANDERSON, when

The question was taken on the substitute, and it was rejected, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Dixon, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, and Ruggles—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Davis, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Merrick, Nicholas, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Southard, Strange, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Webster, White, Wright, and Young—26.

Mr. GRUNDY said that, as the season would be far advanced before this bill would be finally acted on in the House, and as the amount appropriated could not be profitably expended the present season, he moved to reduce the sum in each State from $150,000 to $100,000.

Mr PRESTON moved as an amendment to the amendment, that "$100,000" be stricken out, and "$75,000" inserted.

The question was then taken on Mr. PRESTON'S amendment, and it was agreed to—ayes 23, noes 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Crittenden, Cuthbert, Davis, Dixon, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Pierce, Prentiss, Preston, Roane, Ruggles, Sevier, Southard, Strange, Webster, and Wright—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benton, Buchanan, Grundy, Henderson, Linn, Merrick, Nicholas, Porter, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Wall, White, and Young—17.

The question then being about to be put on the engrossment of the bill,

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky intimated his wish to address the Senate on the bill; and, on his motion,

The Senate adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. SAMUELS, OF VIRGINIA.

In the House of Representatives, April 13, 1840—In Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government, for the year 1840.

Mr. SAMUELS said: Mr. Chairman, the subject now under consideration is a bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1840. It is necessary to state this fact, and occasionally to recur to it, or it may be overlooked in the wide range which the debate has assumed. It is a subject worthy of remark, that the section now before the committee, is that appropriating money for the salaries of the President and his Cabinet counsellers. It must be admitted, by every member, that this appropriation must be made as long as the law fixing the salaries remains as at present. This waste of time, the whole day, up to this hour, upon a subject about which there can be on difference of opinion, cannot be justified. In the remarks I am about to make, but little will be added to the abuse adverted to. Considering the debate wholly irregular, I will not practise myself that which I condemn in others.

My principal object in rising, is to take issue with several gentlemen who have favored the committee with their views. My colleague, [Mr. WISE,] the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIDDLE,] all concurred in opinion that the Executive is responsible for the appropriations contained in this bill, if it shall pass. My colleague [Mr. WISE] especially, oftener than once inquired of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether this bill was recommended and approved by the Executive: and when informed that it was prepared from estimates furnished by the Departments, he took particular pains to direct the attention of the committee to the fact that it was so prepared. He avowed his purpose of fixing the responsibility of the measure upon the Executive. From all this we might infer that my colleague holds that the Executive is invested with the power to make appropriations, for it would be highly unjust to hold him responsible for them, if he have no such power. Does my colleague hold that, because an appropriation is recommended by the President, that Congress is bound to make it?

[Mr. WISE was understood to answer in the negative.]

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] expressed the opinion that we ought to vote for appropriations recommended by the Executive, unless in an extreme case. The gentleman from Pennsylvania went so far as to hold the Department responsible for the correctness of their estimates, and if there were any omissions or errors in those estimates, he would not vote appropriations called for by supplementary estimates, unless good reasons could be shown why they were not included among the first. He was pleased to indicate this course for himself, because, as he alleged, it would prevent the practice which he charged upon the Departments of making estimates which are published extensively through the country, and afterwards making additional estimates, which have not the same degree of publicity given to them.

The opinions of the three gentlemen seem to be based upon the hypothesis that the power of originating appropriations, to some extent, at least, is with the President; or why attach so much consequence to his recommendations?

To these opinions, and the obvious inferences from them, I cannot assent. I hold that, in the constitutional distribution of power touching this subject, the President is only invested with the power to recommend to the consideration of Congress such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient: the duty of Congress is not changed by the fact that a measure comes forward with the Executive recommendation. The power of Congress to lay and collect taxes, &c. to provide for the common defence and general welfare, to raise and support armies, to provide and maintain a navy, is conferred by the Constitution; and, whether the Executive makes a recommendation or not, the power, the duty, and the responsibility of Congress are precisely the same. Gentlemen could not, if they would, avoid the responsibility of their station, either by delegating their power to the Executive, or by yielding submission to his recommendations. The acts of Congress are chargeable to that body: if they waste the public money, they are responsible; if they suffer it to be done by the Executive, they are guilty of a double dereliction of duty, in neglecting the public interest, and in permitting an encroachment on their constitutional power.

Nor can gentlemen, with more appearance of justice, ascribe to the Secretary of the Treasury any responsibility on account of the public expenditures. His duty, as defined and laid down by law, is to digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue, and for the support of the public credit; to prepare and report estimates of the public revenue and public expenditures, and to superintend the collection of the revenue, and to lay before Congress, at every session, a report on those subjects, for their information. Whether his policy be good or bad, whether his plans be wise or unwise, is a subject which Congress alone are able to decide. Their accountability to the people is not lessened because the Secretary of the Treasury may have recommended the measures they adopt.

At the present session of Congress, the President, in accordance with his duty, has recommended to Congress such measures as he deemed necessary and expedient. Among other measures recommended, is the practice of economy. It is our duty to consider this recommendation with reference only to its own intrinsic merit, and apart from the quarter whence it comes. It is at all times the duty of Congress to appropriate no more money than is demanded by the public welfare; and now that we are engaged in the consideration of a bill making appropriations, it is the duty of every member of the committee to examine it closely, and see if there be any extravagant or superfluous appropriation, and if so, to amend the bill. I therefore invoke the aid of my colleague's superior experience: if there be any thing exceptionable in the bill, I hope he will take up the challenge of my friend the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and make it apparent. That gentleman invited scrutiny, yet my colleague made no specific charge against the bill.

[Mr. WISE said he had several amendments to offer, when we shall arrive at the sections for which they are intended.]

I am glad to hear my colleague say this: it shows that he has had the bill under consideration, and gives some assurance that the subject is likely to receive the investigation due to it at the hands of Congress. For myself, I profess a strong desire to practise economy in the public expenditures, and will show my sincerity by my votes.

My colleague [Mr. WISE] has animadverted with great severity upon what he deems the fearful and enormous expenditures of money for several years past: he took some pains to show the average amounts for those years: he made a calculation to show how much per head this expenditure would have imposed on each individual if the money had been raised by a capitation tax. He made the average annual expenditure for the time embraced in his calculation between thirty-three and thirty four millions of dollars. All this expenditure he ascribed to the present Administration and that immediately preceding it. He scarcely recognised the intervention of Congress in making the laws appropriating money. He denounced the Executive for his extravagance in unmeasured terms. When inquired of by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] whether he expected the Executive to withhold his constitutional sanction from the appropriation laws upon the ground of their supposed extravagance—and whether he censured him for having given that sanction, my colleague distinctly admitted that he did not expect the Executive to withhold his sanction for such reason—that it was unusual and improper to do so. Although my colleague took no exception on account of the President's exercise of his constitutional power, yet he ascribed to him a certain mysterious subtle influence over members of Congress; an influence which my colleague, with all his graphic powers, could not delineate or define, yet which he alleged to have existence, and of which he asserted the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] was fully conscious. This influence, if exerted for the purpose, my colleague thought would have kept down the expenditures.

Without stopping to defend the President and the former Congress from the grave charge implied in the statement of my colleague, I must say that the censure conveyed by it is most unjust. The charge is, that a secret influence is possessed by the Executive over a co-ordinate branch of the Government, which is alike dishonorable to both. Yet because he foregoes the exercise of that alleged influence in regard to a most important branch of public business, it is made a subject of reproach. If such influence did exist, it would not have been a cause of complaint that it was permitted to lie inactive forever.

My colleague gave his testimony, without reserve, against the extravagance of the present and late Administration; he condemned them without any qualification or saving whatever. He gave amounts of money expended in various years, and because the amounts in certain years exceeded the amounts in certain other years by large sums, he considered the charge fully made out. It seems to me, however, that, if the expenditures in 1838 exceeded those in 1826 by the sum of fifteen millions of dollars, it by no means follows that the expenditures of 1838 were extravagant, because it might be necessary and proper to expend so much more in 1838 than in 1826. The charge alleged, is, that a useless and wasteful expenditure of public money has been made; my colleague bore testimony to the truth of the charge. It is due alike to himself, to his constituents, and to the country, that full proof should be obtained upon this subject. The charge is a conclusion drawn from many facts, and the justice or injustice of that conclusion must depend upon the facts from which it is drawn. The candor and liberality of my colleague should prompt him to bear testimony in favor of the Administration upon those points wherein they are justified. That gentleman was a member of the Twenty-fifth Congress: that Congress made the appropriations which were expended in the year 1838, in which were made the largest of the expenditures complained of. Testimony coming from my colleague would have great weight; and it would be important to hear him upon each item of excess of expenditure in 1838 over 1826. I have prepared a table contrasting the expenditures of those years respectively, and would like to know which of the appropriations in 1838 he approved, and which he opposed. The aggregate of the excess is made up of smaller sums; and if each item of excess be justified, the whole cannot be wrong.

The table is not perfect, because of the great difficulty in identifying the character of the expenditures in those years. I will not detain the committee by a minute examination of these particulars, but there are a few items so large in amount as to show how a great part of the excess was created. For instance:

[In the progress of the recital of the table, much desultory debate occurred between Mr. SAMUELS and Mr. WISE, the former insisting that if any one of these excesses was improper and inexpedient, it should be pointed out, and interrogating Mr. WISE as to his votes in regard to several of them. Mr. W. said it was impossible for him to recollect how he might have voted upon particular appropriations. In regard to the increased expenses of the army, Mr. W. said he was not answerable at all, as he had opposed the increase of the army, which necessarily increased the expenses. Mr. W. finally declined answering any further questions.]

Mr. SAMUELS said it was, in his opinion, wholly unjust to make a general and sweeping denunciation of waste and extravagance against the Administration, without being able and willing to particularize. Such a course involved this injustice; there are many items of excess which all must agree ought to be subjects of commendation rather than of censure: as, for instance, the expenditure on account of the trust funds. These funds were received almost entirely by the Government in satisfaction of claims by our citizens upon foreign Governments, yet, when paid over to the rightful owners, they go to swell the aggregate of expenditure, and are thus made the cause of reproach—that is, the Administration is reproached for successfully asserting, and honestly paying over, the claims of our citizens upon foreign powers.

Mr. Chairman: I think it has already been shown that the responsibility of passing appropriation laws rests wholly upon Congress. It is for the people, who are deeply interested, to inquire into this subject, and if there be any waste, to hold those accountable who caused it. It is a fact perfectly well known, that the original unmixed "Whig party" and their new allies, the "Conservative party," held the power in the House of Representatives during the Twenty-fifth Congress, which made the appropriations for 1838. In regard to the Whig party, the immediate political friends of my colleague—he must admit that they were not under the influence of the Executive—whatever they did, or omitted to do, cannot be charged to that officer. The "Conservative party" made a great display of independence; they have not permitted the world to be in ignorance of their singular fortitude in withstanding alike the frowns and blandishments of Executive power. The merit which that party claims for itself, is, that of unyielding firmness and honesty. Without stopping to inquire how far these lofty pretensions are borne out by facts, it may safely be asserted that they were so far removed from the Administration and its friends as to prevent any imputation of influence by the Executive over them. Thus it appears, that in this House at least, the power was not with the Administration; and, so far as this House is concerned, the Administration and its friends are not chargeable with extravagance, if any there were.

Whether there has been any waste of money heretofore, is more than I know. I hope, however, for the future, we may be able to reduce the expenses within the limits of rigid economy.

THE CURRENCY.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE,

FRIDAY, March 6, 1840.

Mr. DAVIS having concluded his reply to Mr. BUCHANAN'S charge of misrepresentation,

Mr. BUCHANAN addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: When I addressed the Senate on Tuesday last, I endeavored to state my cause of complaint in the mildest manner which the nature of the case admitted, and to treat the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS,] so far as I could, with courtesy and respect. The remarks of that gentleman to-day have absolved me from any such obligation, and I shall proceed to refer to his misrepresentations of my speech in favor of the Independent Treasury bill as they deserve. At the same time, I shall endeavor to perform this duty in a manner consistent with my own self respect, and with the elevated character of the Senate.

The Senator, in his labored remarks, has endeavored to draw me into a false issue. In this attempt, he shall not succeed. I am not thus to be diverted from my purpose. Have I, or have I not, advanced the arguments which he has published to the world, that I urged in favor of the bill? This is the question at issue between us.

In regard to his speech against the Independent Treasury bill, I have never said (for I never shall say what I do not know to be true) that he did not make that speech in the Senate. The hour was late—the patience of the body was exhausted, and he left the seat near me which he usually occupies, and spoke from another part of the hall. He is, therefore, mistaken in stating that I sat near where he stood, whilst he was delivering his speech. Not having the least intention of replying to him, I was talking freely, when in my seat, to those around me, and was out of it a considerable portion of the time whilst he was speaking. I not only did not hear him utter any one of the misrepresentations of which I now complain; but I most solemnly declare that I never even suspected him for having given them currency in his speech, until my attention was called to it by a friend on Saturday evening last. This may have been culpable negligence on my part. Whether or not, it has taught me the necessity of paying strict attention to that Senator's statements, should he ever reply to me hereafter.

But, sir, whether the speech delivered and the speech published be identical or not, this cannot vary the question. It remains precisely the same. Has the Senator attributed to me arguments in support of the bill which I never used? This is the point in controversy.

If the most artful and unfair man in the world had determined to destroy any public measure, in what manner could he most effectually damn it in public estimation? It would be to enumerate all the terrible consequences which would flow from it, according to the predictions of its enemies, and put them into the mouth of its friends as arguments in its favor. There could not by possibility be any stronger admissions of its evil tendency. Such is the manner in which I have been treated by the Senator, and such is the character of my complaint against him.

Sir, the enemies of the Independent Treasury have denounced it, from the beginning, as a measure which would destroy the banks of the country, introduce an exclusive metallic currency, prostrate credit, check importations, and reduce the value of property and the wages of labor. Now, I could not offer the least objection against any Senator in the Opposition for urging any arguments he pleased, to prove that the bill would be productive of all these fatal consequences. This would be all perfectly fair. What I do object to, is, that the Senator, instead of urging these arguments against the bill himself, has reiterated, over and over again, that I supported it, because these disastrous consequences would result from its passage. The Senator has placed me precisely in this position. If I can prevent it, he shall not escape from this plain question of fact by retreating into a wide field of irrelevant argument.

If this matter had been personal to myself alone, I might have borne it, and probably would have borne it, in silence. But, on the eve of a Presidential election, my sins are to be visited upon the present Administration, whose principles I support. The President is to be struck at through my side: and it is thus attempted to make the public believe that he also sustains the Independent Treasury bill because it will be productive of all the ruinous consequences which have been portrayed. This is the key to unlock the whole published speech of the Senator from Massachusetts.

In its first paragraph, he professes his intention of making "a brief reply to the new doctrines which have been now, for the first time, published here, and come to us through channels that leave no doubt of their being the doctrines of the Administration."

Now, Mr. President, what are these new doctrines which the Senator says involve "great and momentous considerations, affecting the most cherished interests of the people?" After heralding them in this imposing manner, he proceeds to announce them. Two friends of the Administration, says he, Mr. WALKER and myself, have declared that this bill—mark me—this very Independent Treasury bill "contains the necessary corrective [for the evils] imputable to the pernicious influence of bank paper, as it will check importations of foreign goods, suppress what they call the credit system, and by restoring a specie currency, reduce the wages of the laborer and the value of property."

"This is the character given to the measure by its friends; and, alarming as the doctrines are, I am gratified that they are frankly avowed."

Now, sir, should I not deserve a straight jacket; ought I not to be placed in confinement by my friends, if these imputations were well founded? What! sir, to rise before this august body and to say, Mr. President, I support the Independent Treasury bill—first, because it will destroy the banks of the country, abolish all bank paper, and restore a specie currency; second, because it will check importations; third, because it will suppress the credit system; and fourth, because it will reduce the wages of the laborer and the value of property!!

And yet this is the ridiculous attitude in which I am placed by the Senator's speech. If these imputations were well founded, I must be one of the most ferocious men in existence. Destruction must be my delight. No wild agrarian in the country has ever thought of waging such an indiscriminate war against all property, my own among the rest, as that which has been attributed to me by the Senator.

Now, sir, need I say in the presence of this body, before which my speech was delivered, that I never used any such arguments? On the contrary, in my reply to the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] I advanced no "new doctrines," but pursued the very same course of argument which I had adopted when this measure was first before the Senate in September, 1837. I was then convinced, and so declared in the most solemn manner, that this bill would not injuriously affect the sound and solvent banks of the country; and my reflections since have served to confirm this conviction. One of the points which I most strongly urged at that time, in answer to the objections of the enemies of the bill, was, that it would not operate with that severity upon the banks which they professed to apprehend. I alleged "that the cause was too impotent to produce any such effect," and "that its influence would scarcely be felt;" and I maintained these propositions in the course of my remarks. In my late speech, which has been the subject of so much unfounded remark, I congratulated the country that "the prominent arguments formerly urged against the Independent Treasury bill had nearly all vanished away." Among others of this description, I expressed my astonishment, "that we had no homily from the Senator [Mr. CLAY] against the specie clause of the bill. Even this seems to have lost much of its terrors. It is no longer the terrific monster which was to devour all the banks, and establish a pure metallic currency for all the transactions of all the people of the United States."

And yet, in the very face of all this, the Senator, in his speech, has put into my mouth, as arguments in favor of the bill, and of course as consequences resulting from it which I desired, that it would destroy the banks, introduce a pure metallic currency, suppress credit, and reduce the wages of labor, and the price of property. Can he point to any portion of my speech in which I contended that this bill would produce these monstrous effects? If he himself had urged that it would, I say again, I could have made no objection. My cause of complaint is, that he has sent abroad to the world his speech, and has by it placed me in the ridiculous attitude of not only admitting that all these objections to the bill are true, but of strenuously urging its passage for this very reason. This, I repeat, is the point of the controversy between us. In order to make good his charge, he must prove that I used any such arguments in favor of the bill—a task which no mortal man can perform. I never thought or dreamed of any such arguments.

But the Senator proceeds to weave his web with much art. He says:

I will now notice the effects upon the public policy imputed to this bill. We have always been told that it was a simple proposition to divorce the Government from the banks, so as to enable it to hold its own money, and, therefore, harmless in its character, as it would affect nothing else.

This was precisely the character which I gave of it throughout my late speech.

But, sir, (says the gentleman from Massachusetts) the Senator from Pennsylvania, while he declares that he is not for an exclusive hard money currency, or, in other words, is not hostile to well regulated State banks, if they can be well regulated, as he expresses himself, argues that this bill will diminish importations, suppress credit, and stop speculation, by modifying the currency, so far as to work out these extraordinary ends."

And here permit me to observe, that the extreme candor of the Senator is worthy of all commendation. He seems to have been shocked at my destructive propensities. He was unwilling that the public should believe that even this bill was as bad as I had represented it to be. In order to apologize for my indiscretion, and to prevent the country from being too much alarmed at my arguments, he most kindly interposes.

I am by no means satisfied (says he) that it (the bill) is capable of producing all these consequences; but as such a power is imputed to it by its warmest friends, and those who are in the councils and confidence of the Administration, who bring it forward with this view and expectation, I shall, in this reply, confine myself to the positions assumed. That it will do the country no good, I have never doubted; but I have never allowed myself to believe that it can exert that influence upon its affairs which is ascribed to it.

Those in the councils and confidence of the Administration bring the bill forward and impute these terrible consequences to it; though the Senator himself recoils from the idea that it would produce such disastrous effects! I again repeat that this is the issue between him and me. Did I ever impute any such consequences to the bill? That is the question.

The Senator next proceeds to comment separately in detail upon each of the arguments in favor of the bill which he has thus imputed to me, as though they had been leading points of my speech. After concluding this portion of his speech, he refers to the 3*d.* or 4*d.* per day which the laboring man in hard money Holland receives; and thus leaves it to be inferred, though he has not expressly asserted the proposition, that I desire to bring down the laboring man to the condition of the miserable serfs of Europe. The Senator has shown much ingenuity in this effort.

He then proceeds to his hypothetical case. Hypothetical I admit it to be in the first instance; bu after stating it as such, he makes it real, by declaring that I had ascribed the power to the bill of producing the effect which he describes.

And here, sir, permit me to remark, that after the disclaimer which I understood him to have made on Tuesday last, in regard to this topic, I should have taken care in my reported speech to have suppressed every allusion to the subject which could have caused him pain. He has now disclaimed the disclaimer, and I shall act accordingly.

He says:

To follow out the case, I have supposed the income of every man, except the exporter, is to be reduced one-half in the value of wages and property, while all foreign merchandise will cost the same, which will obviously, in effect, double the price, as it will take twice the amount of labor, or twice the amount of the products of labor, to purchase it.

Thus far the case is suppositious; but the Senator, in plain English, makes it a reality against myself in the very next sentence.

"I do not ascribe," says he, "this power to the bill; but it is enough for me that its friends do." What power? What is the immediate antecedent? Is it not this power, ascribed by its friends to the bill, of reducing one half "the value of wages and property" in the country? But let us proceed a little further. In the next sentence he asks, "what response will the farmers, mechanics, manufacturers, and laborers, make to such a flagitious proposition."

What is this flagitious proposition? Is it the Independent Treasury bill in itself? No, sir; no. The Senator throughout, with affected candor, expresses the opinion that this bill would produce no such fatal consequences as had been ascribed to it by its friends. No, sir; it is palpably an attempt on the part of the Senator to induce the public to believe that one of my arguments in favor of the bill was that it would reduce the value of wages and property one-half. He was pursuing the course which he had adopted throughout every previous part of his speech, still persisting in doing me the injury of putting arguments into my mouth which I had never uttered. Any plain man who reads his speech would place this construction upon it. After the Senator has done me all the mischief he could, in public estimation, it is now too late for him to say that he did not attribute this argument to me.

Sir, his speech is not a manly and open argument against the Independent Treasury bill. It is a subtle and ingenious contrivance throughout, for the purpose of casting odium upon the Administration and its friends, by ascribing to them arguments which they never uttered, and sentiments which they have always disavowed.

It is an attempt to impose upon the public the belief that we support the bill, not because it will separate the banks from the Government, but because it will destroy the banks, introduce a pure metallic currency, suppress credit, and reduce the value of property and the wages of labor. The Senator has become the witness against us; and he cannot, and shall not, escape from the consequences of his own testimony.

A "flagitious proposition!" The highest English authority informs us that the meaning of the word "flagitious," is "peculiarly infamous:" and I shall leave the Senate and the world to determine whether this term may not be more appropriately applied to the Senator's misrepresentations of my remarks than to the Independent Treasury bill.

What a wonderful spectacle is presented in this speech of the Senator! From the first to the last, from the beginning to the end of my speech, I did not attribute to this bill one of the consequences which he has imputed to me. With my settled convictions of the effect of the bill, I should have been the greatest dunce in Christendom thus to have causelessly alarmed the fears of the country. I never intimated that it would seriously injure, much less destroy, the State Banks. It never entered into my conception that it would introduce a pure metallic currency, or reduce the wages of labor, or destroy the credit system, or seriously affect the business of the country in any manner. I treated it throughout, as what the Senator informed us we had been uniformly told by its friends that it was, "a simple proposition to divorce the Government from the banks so as to enable it to keep its own money, and therefore, harmless in its character, as it would effect nothing else." Throughout my speech, it was one of my chief purposes in advocating the bill, as it had been in 1837, to allay the fears of the country, and to prove that it would produce none of these fearful effects.

I am happy to think that my efforts in this respect, have not proved wholly unavailing. I have good reason to believe that they have had some influence in disabusing the minds of honest men and relieving them from the apprehensions which they had formerly entertained on the subject. I pursued the very same course of argument I had done in September, 1837, when I first addressed the Senate on this bill. On that occasion, I said: "In this crisis all which the General Government can effect is, in the first place, to withhold its deposites from the banks, and thus refrain from contributing its funds to swell the torrent of wild speculation; and, in the second place, to restrain the extravagance of their credits and issues, in some small degree, by collecting and disbursing our revenue exclusively in specie, or in the notes of banks which will pay the balances due from them in specie, at short intervals. To accomplish these two purposes, as well as to render the public revenue more secure, are the objects of the bill and amendment now before the Senate." I never, for a single moment of my life, entertained the idea which the Senator has imputed to me, that the bill would destroy the Banks, or even restrain their extravagance except "in some small degree." Was the imputation justified by any remarks in my late speech? That, I repeat again, is the question between the Senator and myself. In that speech, I declared that—

"Our chief objects in adopting the Independent Treasury are, to disconnect the Government from all banks, to secure the people's money from the wreck of the banking system, and to have it always ready to promote the prosperity of the country in peace, and to defend it in war. Incidentally, however, it will do some good in checking the extravagant spirit of speculation, which is the bane of the country.

In the first place, by requiring specie in all receipts and expenditures of the Government, you will create an additional demand for gold and silver to the amount of five millions of dollars per annum, according to the estimate of the President. A large portion of this sum will be drawn from the banks, and this will compel them to keep more specie in their vaults, in proportion to their circulation and deposites, and to bank less. This, so far as it may go, will strike at the root of the existing evil. I fear, however, that it will prove to be but a very inadequate restraint upon excessive banking.

In the second place, this bill will, in some degree, diminish our imports, especially after June, 1842. I most heartily concur with the Senator in desiring this result. What is the condition of the importing business at the present moment? It is almost exclusively in the hands of British agents, who sell all the manufactures they can dispose of in other portions of the world, and then bring the residuum here to glut our markets. According to our existing laws, they receive a credit from the Government for the amount of its duties. They sell the goods for cash: and this credit becomes so much capital in their hands, to enable them to make fresh importations. The Independent Treasury bill requires that all duties shall be paid in gold and silver; and after June, 1842, the compromise law will take away the credits altogether. We shall then have a system of cash duties in operation, which will contribute much to reduce the amount of our importations, and to encourage domestic manufactures.

In the third place, this bill will make the banking interest the greatest economists in the country, so far as the Government is concerned. Their nerve of self interest will be touched in favor of economy, and this will induce them to unite with the people in reducing the revenue and expenditures of the Government to the lowest standard consistently with the public good. They will hereafter abhor a surplus revenue, as much as they delighted in it formerly, when they used it for banking purposes. Any surplus which may exist in future, will be locked up in gold and silver, in the vaults of our depositories; and, in proportion to its amount, will deprive the banks of so much of their specie. They will, therefore, become the partisans of reducing the revenue to the actual and necessary expenditures of the Government, so that the specie may flow out of the Sub-Treasuries with a rapidity corresponding with its influx. Nothing but a large surplus can seriously injure the banks. This was demonstrated to me by one of the most distinguished financiers which our country has ever produced, not himself, I believe, friendly to the Independent Treasury. These Treasury drafts, in the natural course of business, will find their way either into the banks at the very points where our depositaries are situated, or into the hands of individuals there having duties to pay to the Government. Take, for example, New York. A public creditor receives such a draft on the receiver-general in payment of his debt. Will he carry it to New York, receive payment, and transport the specie from that city? Such instances will be rare. He will generally deposite it to his credit in the bank with which he transacts his business, wherever that may be. This bank, if not in New York, will transmit it for collection to one of the banks there; and thus these banks will draw the specie from our depositaries as rapidly as it is drawn from them for the payment of the public dues. Thus the equilibrium will be preserved, so long as the Government is without a large surplus. In other instances, these drafts will be sought after and procured by individuals having duties to pay, and they will be presented to the receivers-general, and accepted by them instead of gold and silver."

I have presented these extracts from my speech before the Senate, for the purpose of showing how absurd it was to have imputed to me the arguments in favor of the bill attributed to me by the Senator from Massachusetts. Instead of ascribing to this bill the power of destroying the banks, and introducing a pure metallic currency, I declare that "I fear it will prove to be a very inadequate restraint upon excessive banking;" and that it will not affect the banks at all, unless a large surplus of gold and silver should be locked up in the vaults of the Sub-Treasuries—a case not likely soon to occur.

I have also stated that it would, in some degree, diminish our imports, especially after June, 1842, when the duties on imported goods must be paid in cash, and thus encourage our domestic manufactures. Is there a patriot—nay, is there a man in the country who does not consider this "a consummation devoutly to be wished?"

As I stated before, I ridiculed the idea that this bill would destroy the banks of the country, and substitute a pure metallic currency for bank paper. Instead of destroying the banks, I proved that it did not even contain any power of wholesome regulation; but for this purpose we must appeal to the State Legislatures. I also established the position, that neither a bank of the United States, nor the Bank of England—instruments of vastly greater power than the Independent Treasury—could, even if they possessed the inclination, restrain the excessive issues and credits of the banks of their respective countries.

Now, sir, I have presented to you the materials, and the only materials, from which the Senator from Massachusetts could have derived the charge against me, which is presented in different forms throughout the whole course of his speech; that I had argued that this bill would destroy the banks, restore a specie currency, reduce the wages of labor and the value of property one half, check importations, and suppress the credit system. I never attributed any one of these consequences to the bill. It is too impotent in its character to produce any such effects.

The Senator does not seem to perceive, that even if he could prove I was a hard money man, this would not, in the slightest degree, justify his statement of the nature of my argument. It is now too late for him to say, as he has done, that he did not consider it of any moment to investigate the degree of influence which the bill might have; but as I had admitted it would have some influence as a corrective, he had directed his reply to the general scope of my argument. Had his published speech corresponded with these sentiments, he and I should never have had this unpleasant controversy. What I complain of is, not that he drew unjust inferences from my argument; but that he imputed to me arguments which I never used: not that he declared that I had expressed the opinion that the bill would have some influence as a corrective, which I certainly did express, and clearly defined what, in my opinion, would be the extent of its influence; but that he put into my mouth, as arguments in favor of the bill, that it would destroy the banks, introduce a pure metallic currency, prostrate credit, and reduce the value of wages and property. My cause of complaint is not any deductions which he might have drawn, fairly or unfairly, from my speech; but it rests on the fact that he has attributed to me arguments in support of the bill which I never urged or thought of urging. He might himself have contended, he might, if he could, have inferred from my speech that I was a hard money man, (though this would have been most unjust towards me,) and have drawn any deductions from this fact which he thought proper; but he had no right to make me say that the bill would establish a hard money currency.

Now, sir, the whole of the miserable attacks which have been made upon me are based alone on the presumption that I am an exclusive hard money man. On this question my opinions have never been disguised. Although wiser and better men than myself may be friendly to a pure metallic currency, yet when the subject was first broached in the Senate, I took a decided stand against it, which I have ever since maintained. In my speech of 1837, I used the following language:

It is impossible that manufactures and commerce can flourish to any great degree in this country without the aid of extensive credit. I would not, therefore, abolish banks if I could. A return to a pure metallic currency is impossible. To make such an attempt would be ruinous as well as absurd. It would at once diminish the value of all property more than fifty per cent.; and would, in effect, double the amount of every man's debts. It would enrich creditors at the expense of their debtors, and thus make the rich richer and the poor poorer. It would paralyze industry and enterprise. I would give enterprise wholesome food to feed upon; but would not drive it into mad speculation by administering unnatural stimulants.

This is the ground which I occupied when the question was first raised before the country. It is the ground which I have maintained ever since. I differ in this respect with my friend from Mississippi, who is now absent, and have had many arguments with him, in a kind spirit, to convince him that he was wrong in advocating a pure metallic currency. On his return, he will be no little astonished to learn that the Senator from Massachusetts has represented me, in the very speech which afforded the occasion of several of these friendly arguments, not only as a hard money man, but as having advocated the Independent Treasury bill, because it would put down the banks and introduce an exclusive hard money currency. The Senator from Mississippi, whatever may be his abstract opinions, never used any such arguments in favor of the bill. My sentiments upon the subject have been expressed fully and freely, both here and elsewhere, as often as the occasion offered. How any Senator could have misapprehended them, I am wholly at a loss to conjecture; especially after I had clearly and distinctly repeated them in my late speech. The published speech of the Senator from Massachusetts has placed me in a strange position. It was but the other day that a hard money journal of high character was sent to me from New York, which denounced me in strong terms for expressing, in my late speech, sentiments friendly to the continued existence of banks. A similar course has been pursued towards me by another paper of the same character, in Virginia. On the other hand, whilst I am thus attacked by the hard money men, the Senator makes his appearance, and asserts not only that I am a hard money man, but that I had urged the passage of the Independent Treasury bill, because it would convert the United States into a hard money country.

But whilst I am opposed to an exclusive metallic currency, I am equally hostile to that system of banking which has been the cause of those expansions and contractions of the paper currency which have produced so much ruin and misery among all classes of society. This is the crying evil of our country. Would to Heaven, I had the power to correct it! What was my argument in relation to this subject? I shall read my remarks to the Senate, as they are short; and because I cannot now state them with as much clearness and force as I did on that occasion.

What has been the financial history of this country for the last twenty-five years? I can speak with positive knowledge upon this subject during the period of eighteen years since I first came into public life. It has been a history of constant vibration—of extravagant expansions in the business of the country, succeeded by ruinous contractions. At successive intervals, many of the best and most enterprising men of the country have been crushed. They have fallen victims at the shrine of the insatiate and insatiable spirit of extravagant banking and speculation. Starting at the extreme point of depression of one of these periods, we find that the country has been glutted with foreign merchandise, and it requires all our efforts to pay the debt thus contracted to foreign nations. At this crisis the banks can do nothing to relieve the people. In order to preserve their own existance, they are compelled to contract their loans and their issues. In the hour of distress, when their assistance is most needed, they can do nothing for their votaries. Every article sinks in price, men are unable to pay their debts, and wide-spread ruin pervades the land. During this first year of the cycle, we are able to import but comparatively little foreign merchandise, and this affords the country an opportunity of recruiting its exhausted energies. The next year the patient begins to recover. Domestic manufactures flourish in proportion as foreign goods become scarce. The industry and enterprise of our citizens have been exerted with energy, and our productions have liquidated the foreign debt. The third year, a fair business is done—the country presents a flourishing appearance. The banks, relieved from the drain of specie required for foreign export, begin once more to expand, and tempt the unwary to their ruin. Property of all descriptions commands a fair price. The fourth or the fifth year the era of extravagant banking and speculation returns, again to be succeeded by another ruinous revulsion.

This was the history of the country, up till 1837. Since then we have travelled the road to ruin much more rapidly than in former years. Before that period, it had required from three to six years to get up an expansion, and its corresponding explosion. We have now witnessed the astounding fact that we can pass through all these changes, and even from one suspension of specie payments to another, in little more than two years.

Now, any person who has read my speech with candor, any person who heard it in a fair spirit, must have observed that it was exclusively my object to correct the excesses of the banking system, not to destroy the banks. I wished, by wise and wholesome State legislation, to reform it in such a manner as to secure to the people the benefits which may be derived from it without involving them in ruin by its periodical excesses. I desired to see a sound mixed currrency established, so that the wages of labor, the value of property, and the prices of the necessaries and comforts of life, might have a fixed and permanent character, and not be liable to the perpetual fluctuations to which they are now at every moment exposed.

But the Senator seeks to involve me in inconsistency, and to prove that I am a hard money man, notwithstanding my repeated and solemn disavowals of this doctrine, and notwithstanding the admission in his speech, that I had declared I was not friendly to an exclusive hard money currency, nor hostile to well regulated State Banks. It is true that, in the very sentence in which he makes the admission, as well as throughout his speech, he nullifies its effect, and proceeds to argue as though it had never been made. What course does he pursue to accomplish this purpose?

Having ever been the friend of domestic manufactures, I endeavored to prove what I honestly believe to be the fact, that "the extravagant amount of our circulating medium, consisting, in a great degree, of the notes thrown out upon the community by eight hundred banks, was injurious to our domestic manufactures. In other words, not that banking, but that extravagant banking and domestic manufactures are directly hostile to each other"

To establish this proposition, I referred to the well known principle of political economy, "that if you double the amount of the necessary circulating medium in any country, you thereby double the nominal price of every article. If, when the circulating medium is fifty millions, an article should cost one dollar, it would cost two, if without any increase of the uses of a circulating medium the quantity should be increased to one hundred millions."

In order to apply this principle to our condition, and place it in its most striking light before the country and the manufacturers, I took the United States, which is emphatically a paper money country, not at the present moment of depression, but at the extreme point of our periodical expansion, when every article commanded the highest price; and contrasted the condition of our manufactures at that point of time with those of Germany, which is emphatically a hard money country. I presented the two extremes, in order to make the contrast the more striking.

At particular stages of our expansion, (I said,) we might with justice apply the principle which I have stated, to our trade with those countries, and assert, that from the great redundancy of our currency, articles are manufactured in France and Germany for one half of their actual cost in this country. Let me present an example. In Germany, where the currency is purely metallic, and the cost of every thing is reduced to a hard money standard, a piece of broadcloth can be manufactured for fifty dollars; the manufacture of which, in our country, from the expansion of our paper currency, would cost one hundred dollars. What is the consequence? The foreign French or German manufacturer imports this cloth into our country and sells it for a hundred dollars. Does not every person perceive that the redundancy of our currency is equal to a premium of one hundred per cent. in favor of the foreign manufacturer? No tariff of protection, unless it amounted to prohibition, could counteract this advvntage in favor of foreign manufactures. I would to Heaven that I could arouse the attention of every manufacturer of the nation to this important subject.

The foreign manufacturer will not receive our bank notes in payment. He will take nothing home except gold and silver, or bills of exchange, which are equivalent. He does not expend this money here, where he would be compelled to support his family, and to purchase his labor and materials at the same rate of prices which he receives for his manufactures. On the contrary, he goes home, purchases his labor, his wool, and all other articles which enter into his manufacture, at half their cost in this country; and again returns to inundate us with foreign woollens, and to ruin our domestic manufactures. I might cite many other examples, but this, I trust, will be sufficient to draw public attention to the subject. This depreciation of our currency is, therefore, equivalent to a direct protection granted to the foreign over the domestic manufacturer. It is impossible that our manufacturers should be able to sustain such an unequal competition.

But, sir, did I propose to convert this country into a hard money country in order to place it in the same condition with Germany and France in regard to domestic manufactures? Far, very far, from it. Such a change would violate all our fixed habits, and be opposed to the genius of our people. The case was presented not with this view; but for the purpose of exhibiting the injurious consequences arising to manufactures from the redundancy of our currency at the periods of our greatest expansions. We must trade with these countries, whether we will or not, and in order to place us in something like a position of equality with them, I desired, if possible, to prevent these extravagant expansions by introducing such bank reforms as would secure to us a stable mixed currency, which should not be perpetually fluctuating in amount. This was the whole tenor of my remarks from beginning to end.

At the commencement of the very next paragraph I use the following language: "Sir, I solemnly believe that if we could but reduce this inflated paper bubble to any thing like reasonable dimensions, New England would become the most prosperous manufacturing country that the sun ever shone upon." The same idea is conveyed throughout. It is the reduction of our inflated paper currency to reasonable dimensions, not the destruction of banks and bank paper, which I have uniformly advocated.

In my statement of the simple fact known to all men, that the foreign manufacturer goes home to his hard money country and purchases his labor and his materials at half what they cost here, at the moment when our currency is in a state of the greatest expansion, the Senator finds his justification for asserting that I desire to establish a hard money currency in this country, and to reduce the wages of labor and the value of property. But this is not all. Though the Independent Treasury bill was entirely lost sight of at this period of the discussion, and the only point involved was a general principle of political economy, having no reference whatever to that bill, he has had the hardihood to proclaim to the world, upon no other foundation than what I have stated, that I urged its passage because it would establish a hard money currency, and thus reduce the wages of labor and the value of property.

In 1837, I introduced the very same principle of political economy into the discussion, and in similar language presented the ruinous consequences which resulted to the manufacturing interest from the expansions and contractions of our paper currency. No Senator then misunderstood my argument. It was reserved for the Senator from Massachusetts, at this late day, entirely to pervert my meaning, and to endeavor to hold me up to the country as the avowed enemy of the poor laborer, and as the advocate of the Independent Treasury bill, because it would reduce his wages.

These periodical expansions and contractions of our currency seriously threaten to ruin our domestic manufactures. Unless they can be prevented, by some means or other, these manufactures must sink. When I express this opinion, I speak in the sincerity of my heart. Whether I am friendly to the cause of domestic industry or not, I leave for those to determine who have observed the whole course of my public life.

Our periodical crash is always preceded by a year of enormous importations. The reason is obvious. In proportion to the expansion of our currency, the prices of all articles rise; and from this enhancement of price, our country becomes the best market in the world for the sale of foreign manufactures. In the year 1839, our imports were greater, by forty-four millions of dollars, than they had been in 1838. This excessive importation, whilst it was the immediate cause of the ruinous revulsion in the business of the country, and of the suspension of specie payments, left our markets flooded with foreign goods, to the great injury of our own manufactures. When the explosion came, manufacturers, merchants, mechanics, laborers, and all, fell under its blasting influence. It was my object to correct the excesses of the banking system which are productive of these injurious consequences, and not to destroy the banks. The gentleman, although he may take up detached sentences of my speech, and pervert their meaning, can never place any other construction upon the whole of it than such as I have stated.

To regulate—to restrain the banks within safe limits—to afford to the laboring man constant employment and regular wages—not to cause the wages of labor in one year to mount up with all other articles to an extravagant price, and then, by the revulsion in the succeeding year, to sink to almost nothing; these are the ideas which pervade my speech throughout. After our periodical explosions, the laborer undergoes calamities and sufferings much more severe than any other class of society. It was to correct this inevitable result, and thus to benefit the laborer, that I insisted upon bank reform. I declared that "an entire suppression of all bank notes of a lower denomination than the value of one week's wages of the laboring man, is absolutely necessary for his protection. He ought always to receive his wages in gold and silver. Of all men on the earth, the laborer is most interested in having a sound and stable currency."

Is there any gentleman of any party who will not unite with me in these sentiments? Ought we not to abolish all small notes, if this were in our power, of denominations lower than one week's wages of labor? The history of the proceedings in this Senate on the currency bill, and on other bills, proves that a principle which would produce this effect was sanctioned by all and voted for by all.

To show that I expressed no opinion in favor of an exclusive metallic currency, but directly the reverse, permit me to refer to another paragraph of my speech.

But the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] leaves no stone unturned. He says that the friends of the Independent Treasury desire to establish an exclusive metallic currency, as the medium of all dealings throughout the Union; and, also, to reduce the wages of the poor man's labor, so that the rich employer may be able to sell his manufactures at a lower price. Now, sir, I deny the correctness of both these propositions; and, in the first place, I, for one, am not in favor of establishing an exclusive metallic currency for the people of this country. I desire to see the banks greatly reduced in number; and would, if I could, confine their accommodations to such loans or discounts, for limited periods, to the commercial, manufacturing, and trading classes of the community, as the ordinary course of their business might render necessary. I never wish to see farmers and mechanics and professional men tempted, by the facility of obtaining bank loans for long periods, to abandon their own proper and useful and respectable spheres, and rush into wild and extravagant speculation. I would, if I could, radically reform the present banking system, so as to confine it within such limits as to prevent future suspensions of specie payments; and without exception, I would instantly deprive each and every bank of its charter which should again suspend. Establish these or similar reforms, and give us a real specie basis for our paper circulation, by increasing the denomination of bank notes first to ten, and afterwards to twenty dollars, and I shall then be the friend, not the enemy, of banks. I know that the existence of banks, and the circulation of bank paper, are so identified with the habits of our people, that they cannot be abolished, even if this were desirable. To reform, and not to destroy, is my motto. To confine them to their appropriate business, and prevent them from ministering to the spirit of wild and reckless speculation, by extravagant loans and issues, is all which ought to be desired. But this I shall say If experience should prove it to be impossible to enjoy the facilities which well regulated banks would afford, without, at the same time, continuing to suffer the evils which the wild excesses of the present banks have hitherto entailed upon the country, then I should consider it the lesser evil to abolish them altogether. If the State Legislatures shall now do their duty, I do not believe that it will ever become necessary to decide on such an alternative.

I declare that to reform, and not to destroy, the banks, is my motto. This was my language in 1837: it is my language now. The greatest enemies of these institutions are those who are unwilling to arrest them, by wise legislation, in their reckless and ruinous career, and thus prevent them from destroying themselves. There is no truth more certain than this: that if the influence of the banks should prevent the adoption of such legislation as will afford to the people the facilities which they have a right to demand from these institutions, without, at the same time, inflicting the evils which their wild excesses have hitherto entailed upon the country, they will finally be crushed by public opinion. This I should regret for many reasons although it is possible that a much better banking system might arise from their ruins.

It is true that I expressed a serious doubt whether the present banking system would be wisely regulated by the States. I feel confident that this can never be effectually accomplished whilst nine hundred banks exist, pouring forth upon the country, at the periods of expansion, bank notes of all denominations from a dollar and upwards. You cannot have sound banks unless you reduce their number. Out of the large commercial cities, where banks transact their business much more by means of bank credits, deposites, and checks, than by the issue of notes, no bank can make money, and at the same time be safe, without an extended theatre for circulation. Country banks, whose circulation is limited to a circumference of a few miles in diameter, if they do a profitable business, must, from the very nature of things, force their paper upon the public to such an amount as to render them insecure. In the days of expansion, when speculation is raging, they may not be in immediate danger. When the reverse comes, and panic arises, the notes of such a bank may be all thrown upon it for redemption in a single day, or a single week. It can make no safe calculation of the extent to which it can maintain its circulation, as it could do if this circulation covered a large space of country. One of the greatest reforms of our banking system would, therefore, be greatly to reduce their number.

Now as to the wages of labor: I really thought it was impossible that I could have been misunderstood, until I read the speech of the Senator. In combating the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, (Mr. CLAY,) I proved that what the laboring man ought, above all things, to desire, was, such a reform in our banking system as would afford him "constant employment and regular wages, paid in a sound currency." It is ruinous to him for his wages to be rising with the kite of speculation one year, and the very next year to have them reduced to almost nothing, and even to be without employment altogether. He never benefits by extravagant speculation. It brings to him nothing but unmitigated evil, because the increased prices which he is obliged to pay for the necessaries and comforts of life, counterbalance, and more than counterbalance, this advantage. What he desires is stability and regularity in the business of the country. He ought to be able to raise his family in peace and comfort, and to look forward to the next year for the same reward for his honest toil that he received the last. On this subject no anxious doubts ought to harass his mind. He ought to feel himself independent so long as it shall please the Almighty to give him health and strength to earn his bread by the sweat of his face, without being involved in those periodical crashes of the banking system, which are produced by extravagant expansions of the currency. Under the present system the laboring man cannot calculate what a day may bring forth. He receives high wages to-day and is starving for want of employment to-morrow. In illustrating these views, I most cheerfully admitted in my speech that "that country is most prosperous where labor commands the greatest reward; where one day's labor will procure not the greatest nominal amount of a depreciated currency, but most of the necessaries and comforts of life." And I said that by correcting your bloated credit system in such a manner as to reduce "the amount of your bank issues within reasonable and safe limits, and establishing a metallic basis for your paper circulation," you would greatly benefit the laborer. He could then purchase more of the necessaries and comforts of life for one dollar "than he could have done in the days of extravagant expansion for one dollar and a quarter." Besides, he would then enjoy the advantages which he never can do under the present system, "of constant employment and regular wages," without being "involved in ruin by a recurrence of those periodical expansions and contractions of the currency, which have hitherto convulsed the country." The last thing of which I ever dreamed, was to bring his wages down to the pure metallic standard. I wished to adopt that safe mixed currency which I so fully described in the course of my remarks, and which would be a blessing to manufacturers, merchants, mechanics, laborers, and all the people of the country, because it would produce certainty and stability in all the transactions of life.

It was the ardent desire of Henry the 4th, the great monarch of France, so to govern his country, that every laborer in his dominions might have a pullet in his pot on Sundays. In our own highly favored land, even at the period of the greatest expansion, the laboring man could not afford to regale himself and his family with a roast of beef. If his wages were high, the monopolists of this article, aided by the banks, raised the price of this necessary of life in a much greater proportion.

I repeat that the Senator might have argued as he pleased against the Independent Treasury bill, and this would have afforded me no cause of complaint. He might have inferred, from my argument, however unjustly, that I was friendly to a pure metallic currency, and I should not have complained before the Senate. But when he put into my mouth, as a leading argument in favor of the bill, that it would restore an exclusive metallic currency to the country, I felt myself obliged, by imperious necessity, to correct the misrepresentation, because it was doing me the most galling injustice.

I regret, exceedingly, that any thing of a personal character has grown out of this matter. It was the farthest thing imaginable either from my intention or my wishes. But when the Senator thought proper to treat my complaints with the scorn and contempt which he said they deserved, I believed it to be a duty which I owed to myself, to hurl back his defiance, and he may make the most of it.

Mr. PRESTON rose and congratulated the Senate and the country on the explanation just made by the Senator from Pennsylvania. He (Mr. P.) had understood his speech precisely as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] had, and he was highly gratified to find that he had entirely misapprehended him. The impression left on his mind by the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania, and the speeches of other prominent friends of the Administration, in support of the Sub-Treasury bill, was, that it was the object of the party in power to break down the banking institutions of the States, to destroy the credit system, and to reduce the wages of labor, and that to accomplish these results they supported that bill; but it seemed he was entirely mistaken. He understood the Senator from Pennsylvania now to say that he was not opposed to banks, but merely wished that some restraint might be placed on them, so as to prevent their running their credit into extravagance. The honorable Senator from Tennessee [Mr. GRUNDY] had made the same declaration, and the honorable Senator from Arkansas [Mr. SEVIER] had expressed himself of the same opinion. He regretted that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WALKER] was not present, to define his position also. But what says the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] on this subject? He had stood by this hard money question from the first, and when he was solitary and alone in its support. He had fought himself through an ocean of obloquy, while the little fishes huddled around him to protect them from the roar of popular opinion. Will he also favor us with an explanation, lest perhaps we may have misapprehended his course and his sentiments on this subject?

Mr. KING said he had witnessed with unfeigned regret the direction this debate had taken; but it was not his habit, nor would he now take part in a personal altercation. His only purpose in rising was to notice some of the remarks of the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON.] He had listened to that Senator with no little surprise. He states that the impression made on his mind by the speeches of the prominent members of this body, who sustain the Administration, and particularly by those of the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] was, that it was the object of the party now in power to break down the banking institutions of the States, to destroy credit, and reduce the wages of labor, and that they advocated the Independent Treasury bill upon the ground that it would produce these results. Now, said Mr. K. while these charges were confined to the dirty newspapers of the day—those vehicles of detraction and misrepresentation—they deserved not the slightest notice; but coming, as they now do, from a Senator who stands high in the estimation of the country, and deservedly commands the respect of this body, they assume an importance which demands immediate correction and refutation. Will the Senator designate any portion of any speech delivered on this floor, by any friend of the Administration, in which such objects are avowed? He, Mr. K. had been strictly attentive to the discussions on the Independent Treasury bill, and on no occasion had he heard an argument used, which, properly understood, was calculated to make the impression which the Senator declares had been made upon his mind: least of all could it be made by the remarks of his friend from Pennsylvania, who has discussed this great question with an ability which few can equal, and with that characteristic frankness and fairness which should have saved him the necessity of correcting misrepresentation, intentional or otherwise. Sir, said Mr. K. my friend has over and over again declared, in the most explicit terms, that he was no advocate for an exclusive metallic currency; that he wished to see the banks so reformed as to enlarge the basis of specie circulation; thus securing to the country a well regulated mixed currency—specie for the ordinary transactions of business, and a paper always convertible. Would this destroy State banks, or prostrate credit, or deprive the laborer of a fair compensation for his labor? No, sir, no; but directly the reverse; and of all classes, those who live by the sweat of their brow would have most cause to rejoice at such a reform of the currency. My friends, said Mr. K. are opposed to bank expansions which lead to the most extravagant and ruinous speculations, deranging the business of the country, and terminating in a refusal to redeem their notes in specie. These expansions, we have been told by the Senator from South Carolina, and his friends, were produced by the State bank deposite system. Admit them to be correct. Does it not prove conclusively that we should no longer mix up our affairs with theirs—that we should not subject ourselves to the inconvenience and loss consequent on their failure to pay over the public moneys placed with them for safekeeping. My friends are in favor of collecting the revenue in specie, so as to enable the Government to meet its obligations according to the requirements of the Constitution, while the Senator from South Carolina would compel the receipt of the depreciated paper of non-specie-paying banks: at least such was the proposition once made by him; but meeting with no countenance, even from his own friends, he was compelled to abandon it. My friends, as far as I know their opinions, are opposed to any interference with the State banks. To the States they leave, what to them properly belongs, their regulation and control. We are content to act within our constitutional spheres—so to collect, keep, and disburse our revenue, as will enable us to meet, in good faith, all our obligations, and not again subject ourselves to the taunts and sneers of the Senator from South Carolina and his friends, that the Government was a bankrupt concern, because it could not compel the banks to pay over their deposites. Mr. K. said he looked with great interest to the success of the proposition made by his friend from Pennsylvania a few days past, so to amend the Constitution as to prohibit the issue of bank notes of a less denomination than twenty dollars. Could the States be induced to divest themselves of this power, most of the evils which have grown out of the banking system, as at present conducted, would, in his opinion, be remedied. He sincerely hoped it would meet with a favorable consideration.

One word, said Mr. K. as to my friend from Mississippi, now absent. The Senator from South Carolina has, as I conceive, done great injustice to the views of that gentleman, as to the operation of the Independent Treasury bill. He is represented as having contended that it would prostrate the banks, and bring about an exclusive metallic circulation. Now, sir, whatever the peculiar notions of that gentleman may be, as respects the advantages to be derived from banks, he too well understood what would be the operation of the measure he advocated, to contend that any such effects could, by possibility, be produced by it. Sir, we were indebted to the gentleman and his friends for what, to me, appears opinions so absurd. Again and again have they declared, on this floor, that such would be the effects of the adoption of the Independent Treasury; and they have denounced it accordingly, in such unmeasured terms, that I was disposed to give them credit for honestly believing what they so roundly asserted, and so strongly condemned. I had no idea it was for political effect. But really (said Mr. K.) it is too bad to attempt to fix upon the friends of the Administration opinions they never entertained, arguments they never used, but which they have constantly repudiated.

Mr. K. said he well knew the opinions of the greater portion of those with whom he was politically associated here: his intercouse with them had been of the most unreserved character; and he would take this occasion to say that the charge that they were the advocates of the destruction of the State banks, and an exclusive specie circulation, was entirely destitute of foundation. Their object was to reform, not to destroy.

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky said he really did not know where he was; but there is the gallery, and there the countenance of the Father of his Country beaming down upon us, and yet it seemed to him as if persons and things had lost their identity. We now hear that there is no intention on the part of the friends of the Administration, to injure banks—no desire to destroy the credit system of the country—no wish to reduce the wages of labor. Why, really, one is almost tempted to imagine that the present display has been the result of previous arrangement, to give an opportunity for a general recantation. Why, was not the whole tenor of the argument of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. WALKER,] in his speech on the Sub-Treasury, to prove the evils of banks and the credit system, and the beneficial effects that would result from an exclusively metallic currency, and reduced wages of labor, which were to be effected by the passage of that bill? And has not this been the course of all the arguments of gentlemen on that side of the chamber? He was aware that the Senator from Pennsylvania was not what is considered a whole hog man—he stopped at the half-way house—not the half-way house of Conservatism, but of a mixed currency. He confessed that he was surprised and gratified at the declarations and recantations of gentlemen this morning, but he warned the country against confiding much in the sincerity of those making them.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Kentucky, in his remarks, had used the terms "recant, "recantation." Does the Senator intend to convey the imputation that I have recanted: that I have changed any opinion heretofore held by me on this subject? I desire the Senator to point to any vote ever given, or sentiment ever uttered by me, which is inconsistent with the principles avowed in the remarks I have made this morning.

Mr. CLAY said his remark was not intended to apply to the Senator from Alabama particularly, but to the former course of the party with which the Senator acted. He had understood the course of the Executive to be such as he had characterized it, and he considered all that supported his Administration as concurring in the policy indicated by his measures.

Mr. BROWN said: That a very extraordinrry spectacle had been presented to the Senate during the progress of the present debate. After the termination of a discussion, which was of a nature highly irritating, and of a strictly personal character, between the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. BUCHANAN] and the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAVIS] two other Senators had thought proper to volunteer in the debate, and to interfere in a manner which he did not, to say the least of it, deem the most courteous, especially towards one of the parties who had been engaged in this conroversy.

The Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON,] and the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] had, with much apparent gravity, congratulated the country on the recantations, as they have chosen to term them, in regard to the banking system, which have been made on the present occasion, as they allege, by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and other Senators friendly to the policy of the Administration. What recantations had been made by any Senator friendly to the Administration? He had not heard them, if any had been made; and he was quite sure, if the Senators from whom these remarks had fallen, had done justice to the arguments and views of almost the entire body of those on this floor who had supported the constitutional Treasury system, that they might have spared themselves the trouble of offering their congratulations to the country, for recantations which had never been made, and which, indeed, there was no necessity to make.

In regard to the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BUCHANAN,] he had said nothing, in the course of his triumphant vindication, that had even the semblance of a recantation. On the contrary, he had only re-affirmed and reiterated the views and opinions which he had before repeatedly expressed, as to the effects of the constitutional Treasury on banks and the currency of the country. If he had expressed the opinions then for the first time attributed to him, on that floor, they would have been utterly inconsistent with all those which he had, on many occasions before, avowed, and which were to be found so explicitly set forth in his published speeches, made, on former occasions, on this subject. What! the Senator from Pennsylvania, a zealous and able advocate of the constitutional Treasury bill, urging, as an argument in its favor, that it would, among other effects, "suppress credit!" He would only say that, if that and some other argumenis which had been attributed to him by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. DAVIS] had really been used by him, much as he admired the Senator from Pennsylvania for his talents, and respected him for his integrity, he should have considered him as an enemy in disguise to the very measure which he was advocating, and to which it was but an act of justice to him to say that he brought that powerful aid, always afforded by him when he takes part in any important debate. He would add that he had never heard, or known, arguments so entirely preposterous as some of those that had been attributed to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to be used by any one, either in that body or elsewhere, in their advocacy of that measure. Nor had he known such arguments to be imputed to any member of this body, favorable to the constitutional Treasury system, except in the correspondence of hired letter writers, or in the columns of newspapers, devoted to bank interests.

What did the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON,] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] mean by the general allegation that the friends of the Administration in that body were in favor of abolishing the banking system in the States? Do they mean to charge the friends of the Administration with hostility to the banking and credit system, because they are opposed to a government of banking corporations, instead of a government of the people? Do they mean to charge them with hostility to the banks because they are disposed to correct their abuses, and to arrest that system of swindling and outrage which has been practised to such an extent on the people of this country? Is it this that they call hostility to banks, and an attempt to suppress the credit system? Are they themselves willing to uphold and to tolerate such abuses? If so, let them boldly avow it, and the people would then understand the value of that credit system, in behalf of which, so many eulogies had been uttered, and so much alarm had been expressed.

Mr. B. said that, so far as he had understood the views of the friends of the Administration, both in Congress and elsewhere, their leading object was, in regard to the banking system, so far as the indirect agency of the Federal Government could effect it, to regulate, not to destroy it; to enforce a sound and honest system of banking, instead of that system of fraud and abuse which had been so extensively and injuriously practised on the country, under the miscalled credit system. They believed, and the great body of them, there and elsewhere, had so argued, that the Constitutional Treasury system was the measure, of all others, best calculated to effect these important objects. They believed that the fiscal transactions of the Federal Government should be confined to a metallic currency, leaving to the States the undisturbed right of chartering and regulating banks, and authorizing the circulation of bank paper, in such manner as they might deem proper.

Indeed, the clamor constantly raised against the friends of the Administration, that they wished to destroy banks, and introduce an exclusive metallic currency, was, to say the least of it, absurd and ridiculous. How could they put down the system in the several States by federal legislation? They could not interfere with or restrain the State Legislatures in chartering banks. No legislation had been proposed, nor could any be proposed here, consistently with the Constitution, to prevent the people from using paper money int heir pecuniary transactions with one another.

But, said Mr. B. because the bill to establish the Constitutional Treasury did not authorize the receipt of bank notes in the payment of Government dues, it was therefore a circumstance conclusive to show, according to the logic of gentlemen in opposition, that the entire system was to be abolished! This kind of argument, if argument it was entitled to be called, might suit for the purposes of misrepresentation, but it would not answer to establish the truth of a proposition.

Another mode of argument, equally conclusive, to prove that the Administration and its friends were in favor of abolishing all the State banks, and introducing an entire metallic currency, was the practice, by the Opposition, of holding up to the public view the opinions of a few of its friends as the opinions of all the Democratic party.

He would put a few cases to prove, not merely the fallacy, but the extreme injustice, of such reasoning. Some of the friends of the Opposition, whose opinions had often been quoted in that quarter, on financial matters, as oracular, had advocated the heresy that banks were strong in proportion as their quantity of specie was small; but would it be fair to charge this new discovery in the credit system to the Opposition, as a party? Again, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] had introduced a proposition in that body, during the former bank suspension, to compel the Secretary of the Treasury to receive in payment of the public dues, the depreciated notes of those banks, which was advocated by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY;] but would it have been fair to have held the whole of those in opposition answerable for a proposition so subversive of public credit? And, again, some of the leaders of the former Federal party avowed a preference for monarchy, while some of the partisans of the same party, of the present day, have expressed similar sentiments. He alluded to Mr. Hamilton, and some other distinguished leaders of the Federal party of that day, and also to an individual of the present day, of the Opposition, who had, in a series of essays in a Federal paper, advocated a monarchy. Mr. B. said that he had put these cases, not to fix upon the Opposition party the political heresies they contain, but to show the extreme absurdity of one party endeavoring to hold the other responsible for the opinions of a few only of its members.

But, said Mr. B. the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] had not been content with imputing opinions of declared hostility against all banks to those friendly to the Administration in that chamber, but had thought proper to extend the same charge to the President of the United States. With how much justice this charge has been made, a reference to the messages of the Chief Magistrate would show. A leading argument, in his recommendation of the constitutional Treasury system, was its tendency to correct the abuses of the paper system, and establish a sound and honest system of banking, in place of that which has produced such disastrous consequences to the people of the United States. If the wish to bring about a reform in these abuses by the indirect agency of the powers of the Federal Government, constitutionally exerted, be hostility to banks, then the President, in common with the great majority of the American people, was obnoxious to the charge. So far from furnishing proof of hostility to the system, it afforded the only means of preserving it. Those in reality are its enemies, who are in favor of perpetuating its abuses.

Why, he would ask, all this alarm about the banking system, and patriotic indignation at the idea of a hard money currency? Did any one believe that the banking system in the States—he meant an honest banking system—was really endangered? On the contrary, was there any candid and intelligent individual, taking into view the universality of the existence of the system in our country, and the powerful interests enlisted in its behalf, that did not believe that the real danger was not that the system would be destroyed, but that it would not be sufficiently regulated, whether it existed in the form of a National Bank, or of State banks.

Mr. B would not say that these alternate exhibitions of alarm and indignation which we had witnessed here were affected, or intended to answer political purposes. That a pressing emergency, however, existed in the ranks of the Opposition, which required the use of all such means, none could doubt, who daily witnessed the extraordinar expedients that were resorted to for the purpose of sustaining a cause that can only exist by extraneous and artificial means. The effort to operate on public opinion by panics and misrepresentation, was an old expedient, which had been tried on former occasions, much more favorable to success than the present period. They had failed then, and he predicted that they would fail again.

Mr. CALHOUN. I rise to say that no one is authorized to speak for me. I speak for myself. I have changed no opinion. On the contrary, every day's experience confirms me in the opinion that the banking system, as it stands—I mean banks of circulation—has proved to be one of the greatest calamities that ever befel the country.

I make no war on the banks. The system wars against itself, and is destined to fall by self-slaughter. It contains within itself the elements of its own destruction; and gentlemen on both sides may combine to save the system, but it will be in vain. Its true character is now in a course of rapid development. We witness this day its baneful effects on the currency and the business of the country; but we have much to learn of its desolating consequences on its morals and politics. If I should stand alone, I shall be found in opposition to the system.

Now let me say that I know nothing of the views of the Senator from Pennsylvania, further than than as they are developed in his resolution. I wish to be understood to be utterly opposed to its object. With my present conviction, I shall never consent to engraft the banking system on the Constitution.

REMARKS OF MR. REYNOLDS, OF ILLINOIS.

In the House of Representatives, April 17, 1840.—In Committee of the Whole on the Civil and Diplomatic Appropriation bill.

Mr. REYNOLDS said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I am not at all opposed to this manner of political discussion. In the Committee of the Whole, we feel free and easy. It is carrying out, in practice, that freedom of debate which is guaranteed to the people by the nature and form of our Government. This practice will not be amiss for myself, as I am not celebrated for my punctilious observance of strict parliamentary rules. It is like going into one of our vast prairies in the State of Illinois, with which, Mr. Chairman, you and I are well acquainted. There is no obstruction. We may travel in them in any direction that may suit our fancy or inclination. So will I, on this occasion, although in a very humble manner, enter the prairie of political discussion, in Committee of the Whole, and pursue the course that may be my own choice. I will do this without giving to the subject before the committee the least consideration whatever.

Great political subjects are now before the people, and are undergoing that discussion which their importance seems to demand. These subjects have also entered this hall, and are receiving the deliberate attention of the representatives of the people.

Parties, in all countries, have existed, and I have no doubt always will exist. All history confirms this position. And if we believe one of the greatest of the British poets, (Milton,) parties existed even in Heaven; and can we expect to be clear of them on earth?

I condemn for myself, Mr. Chairman, the violence and rancor we often witness in these party discussions. The crimination and recrimination which are so often charged, and never proved, in this hall, are unbecoming the dignity and order of discussion which ought to grace this assembly. No good reason can exist for this course of proceeding. Each party is composed of American citizens, and have equally the good of their common country in charge. Both parties are formed of the blood of the same Anglo-Saxon race, and are raised and educated under the influence of the same Government, laws, and religion, and therefore neither party can be guilty of that baseness of purpose with which parties here so often charge each other in turn.

Gentlemen in opposition to the present Administration urge various arguments, and make many charges, to convince the people that the policy of the party and the Administration should be changed, and that other men and other measures should be brought into power and action. On the other hand, the friends of the Administration are equally confident, that the measures and policy of the party are the most wise, and best calculated to advance the prosperity and happiness of the whole people.

No Administration since the days of Washington existed without opposition, and I presume none will ever exist without it.

I can testify, Mr. Chairman, in any court of justice, that against the present Administration an Opposition is arrayed that is strong and energetic. It is sleepless in its vigilance, and powerful in its action. On this consideration, I consider it the duty of each one who has at his heart the principles of Democracy, to throw into the contest his mite, be it great or be it small.

"In the beginning," parties were organized on great and fundamental principles, and have been continued down to the present time, without change or alteration. The principles and policy that formed the basis of political action in the days of Jefferson, are the same that govern the present Administration. This proposition is susceptible of political demonstration, and it may become necessary for me, on some other occasion, to enter more fully into the demonstration than at present I can do.

These two parties, equally honest, patriotic, and, I may add, equally talented, were organized in the convention that framed the Constitution. They were denominated Federal and Republican, and existed in principle. These principles were widely and essentially different. One party had for its model the British Government. This was reasonable and rational; we had recently obtained our independence, and had amongst us the laws and the governmental forms of the British people. This party, therefore, advocated a powerful and energetic central Government, with a President and Senate for life, and the power to appoint the Governors of the States. The other party prevailed in the convention, and we have a faithful and limited National Government.

These parties continued to exist in the administration of this new Government. They advocated, as honest men, those principles which, in the honest convictions of their minds, would best advance the prosperity and happiness of the people. The Federal party decided that the Government possessed the power to do any thing that might be considered to promote the "general welfare" of the people. The other party assumed no such power, and decided that the General Government was limited in its action to a few simple national objects, and the balance of power retained to the States or the people.

These parties had, in the administration of the elder Adams, a severe and desperate struggle, which resulted in the overthrow of the Federal dynasty, and placing in power the Republican party, headed by Thomas Jefferson.

The important principles on which the Government was administered by Mr. Jefferson are comprised in the celebrated Virginia resolutions, and are the same principles which govern the present Administration; therefore, the opposition to these principles, in the days of Jefferson, must be the same, as they are to the same principles at this day.

The Federal party waged an efficient war against

Jefferson's administration. They opposed his purchase of Louisiana, and wished to deprive the nation of that vast territory to the West and Southwest, and of the outlet of the Mississippi river. They also opposed the embargo, and, in fact, all the important measures of his administration.

In Mr. Madison's administration, the same party opposed the war which was declared against Great Britain. In opposition to this measure, that party acted with deadly hostility to the Republican party, and was like a wet blanket around the shoulders of the President during the whole war. The history of the war measures will show that the party lines were exactly defined and acted on throughout the whole contest.

A charge is made against Mr. Van Buren, that he supported Mr. Clinton for President and not Mr. Monroe, and, therefore, he was not for the war.

The journals of the proceedings of the Senate of the State of New York, and the history of the war measures of that State, prove those charges that he opposed the war to be unfounded.

Mr. Clinton was, at that time, high in the estimation of the Republican party in the State of New York, and, in fact, throughout the Union, and received the support of that party (Mr. Van Buren being a member of it, and bound by the party nomination) for the sole object that the war might be prosecuted with more vigor and brought to a more speedy conclusion.

The important situation in which Mr. Van Buren was placed enabled him to act efficiently in the struggle with Great Britain. It was the great energies of the State of New York exerted to the utmost extent in the prosecution of the war, that presented an efficient barrier against the opponents of the war in the New England States. The Democratic party in the United States, and particularly in the State of New York, was more harassed and annoyed by the Hartford Convention, and the Blue Light Federalists, than they were by the common enemy. This treasonable convention had many friends throughout the adjoining States; and their daring expressions of rebellion showing a determination, almost matured, that they would recede from the Union, and join the enemy, rendered this party extremely formidable. It was, in fact, a domestic enemy raging in our bosom at a time that the nation was achieving her second revolution. We were in a struggle with the most powerful nation on earth, and our means of men and money extended to the utmost; yet these Federalists were opposing all the war measures, and declaring that it is unbecoming a moral and religious people to rejoice for the victories achieved over the enemy.

The position of the State of New York being adjoining this domestic enemy, gave her more opportunities to act efficiently in the war than perhaps any other State, and she acquitted herself with honor and glory.

In all these proceedings to carry on the war with vigor and energy, Mr. Van Buren acted a decided and efficient part. He was the most conspicuous actor in classifying the troops of the State for active military operations, and was, in fact, first in all war measures of the State, during the whole struggle.

To prepare the minds of the people for war, to declare it by law, and to provide the means to carry it on with energy and vigor, is more important to the nation than to fight the battles.

The patriots and statesmen who headed the Democratic party in Congress, and demonstrated to the nation that our honor and character would be tarnished if we did not defend ourselves against British insults, deserve the same honor, or even greater, than those who were triumphant in battle. The same is due Mr. Van Buren for his exertions in his sphere in the State of New York, and he is entitled to the same honor, as the most victorious general.

The same organized Opposition that opposed the administrations of Jefferson and Madison, continued down against the administrations of Monroe and Jackson, and is now waging the same political warfare against the present Administration.

Although it became necessary for the present Administration to recommend the Independent Treasury system, in order to carry out the Democratic principles of the Constitution, and being the same principles as formed the basis of Jefferson's administration, yet the Opposition are denouncing the measure from one end of the continent to the other. They are almost as clamorous against it as the Opposition party were to the war. Each measure was forced on the Government by circumstances over which they had no control. They could not control British insults, and they cannot control State bank suspensions. The faults of others ought not to be laid at the door of the Administration.

The Opposition party contend that the Independent Treasury has deranged the currency, and is at war with the banks. The use and adoption of the Independent Treasury were inevitable; and without the consent of the Government, it was forced on them.

The banks suspended specie payments without any, the least, hostility from the Democratic party; but, in fact, were receiving the full confidence and pecuniary patronage of the Government, and left the Treasury without one dollar of legal or constitutional money. Under these circumstances, what could be done? The Constitution and laws prevented the President from the use of bank notes which were not convertible into specie, and the whole machinery of Government was committed to him. He was accountable to carry it on, and this he could not do without money. He was therefore compelled to adopt the principle of the system, and to use specie alone, as he could get no other currency but inconvertible paper, which was prohibited by law. For doing his duty, and for doing what he could not avoid, he and his party are denounced by the other party from Dan to Beersheba.

Although this measure was forced on the Administration, yet it would be found to be just and correct in principle. I will not pretend to go into the entire defence of the system, as the people have decided on it by having a majority in both Houses of Congress in its favor: I will only demonstrate the fallacy of some of the objections which are urged against it.

The great and leading objections of the Opposition party are, that it has deranged the currency, and are hostile to the banks and credit system. These charges are entirely unfounded.

Not the least suspicion or hostility existed in the Government against the banks at the time they suspended, and became insolvent as it respects the Government. I pretend not to say they are in fact insolvent, but they are quasi insolvent as to the Government. The utmost confidence was reposed in their honesty and capacity to preserve the public funds. The whole revenue, at that time amounting to millions and millions of dollars, was deposited with them. This feeling of friendship and confidence, and this vast deposite of money, cannot be construed into hostility to the banks. While acting under the influence of the support of the Government, and having the public deposites in use, they suspended, and left the Government without one dollar of legal or constitutional money. These are facts, for the truth of which records and history will sustain me.

Mr. Chairman, no one in his sober senses can say that the Government caused the suspension. Not only they did not cause it, but it was not their interest, nor for the benefit of the country, that the suspension should take place. It is a calamity caused alone by the banks, and the operaction and trade of themselves with the community.

As I see the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] is in a first rate humor, I will take the liberty to ask him what would General Harrison and he do under the circumstances which caused Mr. Van Buren to adopt the Independent Treasury? supposing that the General was elected President, and you appointed his Attorney General. The Constitution and laws prevented you from using broken banks, and your Government must be carried on. You would be forced to adopt the same system, or let the Government be suspended, which would be much worse than a bank suspension. You would not deposite the public money in broken banks.

I would, Mr. Chairman, respectfully suggest to Opposition gentlemen, that it would be more becoming at this time to propose some measure for relief and reform, than to denounce and oppose all the measures of the Administration that have those objects in view. Simply and solely to elect Gen. Harrison President will not of itself cure the evils of which his friends so much complain. "Harrison and reform" are in their mouths from one end of the Union to the other, while we are not enlightened at all as to the "reform" or relief which are to be given us. The intelligence of the people will not permit these syren songs, without measures, to draw them away from the Democratic principles which they have sustained for so many years. These principles have caused us to triumph in war, and be happy in peace. Under their influence our nation has flourished in an unparalleled degree, and are we to abandon them for only vain and idle promises of "reform and relief?"

That there is less paper in circulation than in former years no one will deny; the voice of the people, and correct calculations, establish the fact. The Secretary's report shows, that, on the 1st January, 1839, $135,170,995 were in circulation; and on the 1st of January of the present year, 1840, only $106,963,423 were in the hands of the people. This statement exhibits a deficiency this year of upwards of twenty-eight millions of dollars.

The question arises, and ought to be answered, who caused this deficiency? Has the Government done any act that has caused it? "On this hang the law and the prophets." And before I demonstrate the proposition that the Government had no agency in this matter, but in fact tried to prevent it, I will be permitted to say that the people of the United States are in a more properous and vigorous condition than they have experienced since the formation of the Government. It is true that there is not such excess of paper money in circulation as heretofore, which is one of the most substantial reasons to establish this position: these empty promises, without specie in the vaults, in the manner of bank currency, do not constitute wealth, but a debt to the banks, which the people have to pay for its use with a heavy interest. Any people are better without a debt than with it. This excess of bank paper being withdrawn from circulation, the people are not excited by it into wild and extravagant speculations. They are now turning their attention to substantial and real business, and relieving themselves from importations of useless and extravagant articles of luxury from foreign countries.

The people are resuming their sober senses again. The resemble a person regaining his vigor after a wine frolic. We will, in a few months, recover our accustomed strength and vigor.

In the first place, Mr. Chairman, permit me to say it is difficult to prove a negative. It is hard to prove that the Government did not act in any manner to injure the banks, or the legitimate credit system, although it is true they did not. It would be much easier to establish the fact that the banks, by improper conduct, caused their own suspension, and thereby the scarcity of money in the country. Yet, in my opinion, I can demonstrate by documents, acts and statements of the President, and the Democratic party, that neither the President nor the party is hostile to sound and legitimate banking operations—not hostile to the proper credit system, but only desire to correct the abuses of those systems, and sustain a sound and substantial currency in the country.

On this very interesting subject, which the Opposition to the Administration have so much perverted, I must be permitted to refer to the opinions of Mr. Van Buren, contained in his last message. In all his previous messages the same sentiments are expressed. This will suffice for all:

"In a country so commercial as ours, banks, in some form, will probably always exist; but this serves only to render it the more incumbent on us, notwithstanding the discouragement of the past, to strive, in our respective stations, to mitigate the evils they produce, to take from them as rapidly as the obligations of public faith and a careful consideration of the immediate interest of the community will permit, the character of monopolies; to check, so far as may be practicable, by prudent legislation, those temptations of interest, and those opportunities for their dangerous indulgence, which beset them on every side, and to confine them strictly to the performance of their paramount duty—that of aiding the operations of commerce, rather than consulting their own exclusive advantage. These and other salutary reforms may, it is believed, be accomplished without violating any of the great principles of the social compact, the observance of which is indispensable to its existence, or interfering in any way with the useful or profitable employment of capital."

In none of the messages, since or before the first bank suspension, are found any expressions in hostility to the legitimate operations of banking, or to the sound and safe credit system. These sentiments all strike at the abuses, and at nothing more.

I will introduce the opinion of a distinguished Senator from the West, [Mr. BENTON,] as reported in the speech of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BOND,] to show that the opinion of this Senator, whose consistency, as well as his talents, is acknowledged by all, is in strict accordance with the views I have above espressed. Says Mr. BOND, in his speech:

"Let the country hear Mr. BENTON speak the sentiments of the Administration on this subject, and submit. In his speech in the Senate, delivered on the 22d of September, 1837, he says:

"'I have repeatedly given it as my opinion—many of my speeches declare it—that the French currency is the best in the world. It has hard money for the Government, hard money for the common dealings of the people, and large notes for large transactions.'"

In confirmation of the above creed of the Democratic church, I will refer to all the speeches and writings of the members of the party to establish the fact. It is, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion, the safe and sound doctrine, founded on the Constitution, and strict Democratic principles. The Independent Treasury bill itself, as it passed the Senate at the present session, recognises banks, and provides for the reception of convertible paper into the Treasury of the United States. The bill provides for only the fourth, each year, of the payments to be made to the Government in specie, and the rest in convertible paper. This is a most wise provision, as Congress will convene each year, and witness the operation of the measure, so that changes may be made as to the character of the funds to be received for the dues to the Government. This will be a direct reward offered to the banks to resume specie payments, and the Government most cheerfully will receive their paper. Does this look like hostility to the banks? It is directly the reverse; it is friendship and confidence in honest banking.

The above is the opinion expressed by the President in his last message. These are the words: "If the change (from paper to hard money) was gradual, several years would elapse before that sum (four or five million) would be required, with annual opportunities, in the mean time, to alter the law, should experience prove it to be oppressive or inconvenient."

These are the doctrines and the creed of the Democratic church, which is founded on a rock, and which will prevail against all her enemies. The Independent Treasury is the simple, plain, constitutional policy, and is in strict conformity with the Virginia resolutions. It is in direct hostility to the old school of the party which was headed by the celebrated and talented Alexander Hamilton.

It is extraordinary that the banks which have suspended specie payments, are not content with the laws made in most of the States to legalize the suspension, but are determined to make the General Government responsible for their sins. In very ancient times, we read of the sins of the father being visited on the children for the third or fourth generation. This doctrine would seem hard at this day; but it would be still more unjust for the sins of strangers to be visited on one another. This would be just as reasonable as to make the Government responsible for the suspens on of the banks.

The most enthusiastic Whig cannot be made to believe, for a moment, that the United States Government created the State banks, or has any direct control over them. As the Gove nment has no direct or indirect agency in their operations, it is certain the banks themselves are entitled to all the honor, or all the dishonor, that may arise from their own conduct. They must be judged, like all mankind, and all institut ons—by their actions.

Two positions are, Mr. Chairman, incontestably established by the banks in the city of New York, and other parts of the Union, remaining firm and sustaining themselves, while many others in the country have suspended: If the Government had injured the banking system, or waged war against them, all would suspend alike—none would be left to tell the story of their death. The other position is also proved, that if they observe a legitimate course of banking they can sustain themselves with the Independent Treasury system. This position has been verified; as that system has been in operation for some years. Those banks in the city of New York and other places deserve great credit for their firm and patriotic course in sustaining themselves amid the other banks that have suspended all around them.

Can the most ardent friend of General Harrison and "reform" take the suspended banks into communion and fellowship, and place them on the same footing of those that have acted with more wisdom and propriety? or are right and wrong to be confounded?

This "relief and reform," which is so dazzling to the eye, must be based on reason and the Constitution. We cannot relieve the people with broken banks, nor can the Government compel the banks to resume and circulate their paper. This must be their own operation, free and independent of the General Government.

In order that this subject shall be clearly understood, and not a single doubt left remaining on the mind of friend or foe to the Administration, I will present an extract from the circular issued by the Hon. Levi Woodbury, Secretary of the Treasury on 1st June, 1838, requiring all collectors and receivers of public moneys to receive convertible bank paper for the public lands and other debts due the Government, and the certificates of two public officers which demonstrate that this is the course and practice of the Government:

"Important changes have also taken place since July, 1836, in the condition of the banks and of business generally, which have diminished the necessity for unusual checks on excesses and overactions.

"Influenced by these considerations and by a desire to accommodate the public debtors as far as is compatible with the restrictions of law and the safety of the pecuniary interests committed to my care, I feel bound to enforce the uniformity now required, by availing myself of the permission given in the resolution of 1816, to receive the notes of banks, and by extending, under suitable limitations, the receipt of such notes equally to all branches of the public revenue."

Given under my hand at Burlington, I. T. this twenty-ninth day of February, 1840.

A. DODGE, Register.

Mr. Chairman, I have presented some of the most important facts and reasons to establish the negative, that the Administration has done nothing to cause the banks to either expand or contract their issues. The reason must be found in the nature of the banks themselves, and in the nature and course of commerce. The main object of the stockholders in a bank, is to make money on the loan of their capital; and, as gain is the exclusive and express object, the desire of such men has no bounds. As long, therefore, as a person to borrow can be procured, who is able to pay, money will be afforded him. There being no check, an excess of paper in circulation is the consequence. This excess of paper cannot be redeemed in specie, and therefore a suspension takes place. Thus we see, in the very nature of banks, is this inevitable tendency of having either too much or too little paper in circulation.

The Independent Treasury system is intended to correct this abuse of the banks, and to render the currency better and more permanent. It will introduce into the country a broader basis of specie on which to place the paper currency, and then we will have better and more settled prices for labor and its products.

I have submitted only the outlines of this great and important subject, for the consideration of this committee. Their good sense will enable them, from the view I have taken of it, to raise a superstructure on this basis against which the enemies of Democracy cannot prevail.

The Independent Treasury is a great and leading measure, which places the Administration, in this respect, on the Constitution and on the principles of the Republican party, which are coeval with the Government itself.

After the expiration of some few years, and when party feelings have subsided, posterity will be as much astonished at the opposition of the present party to the Independent Treasury, as we are surprised now at the opposition to the war or to the purchase of Louisiana. They are all Democratic measures, carried on under the guidance of the Constitution, by the same party.

Another subject, Mr. Chairman, claims the attention of the people I represent in an eminent degree. There is nothing so near and dear in the article of property to a farmer as the land on which he resides. It is the home and fireside of himself and family, and the means of their support and comfort. Hence the subject of acquiring a home out of the public domain is important and interesting to many of the citizens of Illinois, and they have found friends at the head of this nation, whose policy and whose official recommendations have secured to those citizens the greatest blessings.

General Jackson, when acting as President of the United States, recommended that the price of the public lands should be reduced to a nominal amount; and the same wise and benevolent measure, almost the same in principle, is also strongly urged on the consideration of Congress by Mr. Van Buren. These recommendations are hailed in the West as the most wise and most benevolent measures that could be extended to the people. They see and know that the chief magistrates of the nation feel and know the condition of a poor man; and they know, also, that these Presidents are willing and anxious to ameliorate the condition of the people.

In the last message of President Van Buren is the following strong and warm language used in favor of pre-emption laws and the reduction of the public lands to actual settlers:

"On a former occasion, your attention was invited to various considerations in support of a pre-emption law in behalf of the settlers on the public lands, and also of a law graduating the prices of such lands as had long been in market unsold, in consequence of their inferior quality. The execution of the act which was passed on the first subject, has been attended with the happiest consequences in quieting titles and securing improvements to the industrious; and it has been, to a very gratifying extent, exempt from the frauds which were practised under previous pre-emption laws. It has, at the same time, as was anticipated, contributed liberally during the present year to the receipts of the Treasury."

"The passage of a graduation law, with the guards before recommended, would also, I am persuaded, add considerably to the revenue for several years, and prove, in other respects, just and beneficial.

"Your early consideration of the subject is, therefore, once more earnestly requested."

At the present time there are many industrious and respectable families residing on the public domain, and are not sufficiently provided with the means to purchase their labor and homes. And moreover, the pre-emption law, which is now in force, will expire on the 22d June next, and thereby these families will be left in a very precarious situation.

At the time the Government acquired the public lands, the country was thinly populated, and weak, and was also laboring under the pressure of a heavy public debt. These lands were pledged for its payment, and the attention of the nation was directed considerably towards this source of revenue to relieve the people from the distress occasioned by the Revolutionary war.

Under these embarrassing circumstances, a revenue arising from these lands, to relieve the people, must have been the first and greatest consideration with the Government, and, in the next place, to improve and settle the country in which the public domain is situated.

These must have been the cardinal objects with the Government, and they are yet of the greatest importance to the people.

The unparalleled increase of population in the country since the acquisition of these lands, and the improvement, wealth, and prosperity of the whole nation, since that period, have relieved the people from the distresses alluded to, and enabled them to pay off the public debt. At this time, the country is in a situation not to depend on this source of revenue so much as it did in former days; and thereby the Government is left more free to act as to the improvement and settlement of the new States and Territories. Yet the settlement of the country, and the revenue arising from the sales of the public lands, are so intimately connected with each other, that one cannot be separated from the other. To advance one interest, the other will also be benefited. A revenue cannot be raised from these lands if the country be not settled and improved. Wild lands without people, and without a market, most evidently will not sell, but remain on hand, to the great injury both of the people and the Government.

It must therefore be the duty of the Government, in an equitable and reasonable manner, to advance the settlement and the growth of the country in which the public lands are situated.

Acting under the influence of these considerations, the policy of the Government has been, for a series of years past, to secure the actual settler in his possessions on the public lands, and experience has proved the course to be just and equitable.

This policy is so just and equitable that it seems strange that any one would oppose it. And although there may be some frauds practised on the Government under the pre-emption system, yet they are not common, and not more frequent than will be found in other transactions. This can furnish no argument against the system that has done so much good in securing to the farmer the soil which he cultivates, and the Government their price fixed on the public domain.

All the pre-emption laws heretofore passed have had a retroactive operation, and provided only for cases then in existence. There can be no good reason for this course of policy. The Government for so many years providing and securing the rights of actual settlers, have entirely established public opinion in their favor, and encouraged them in relying on the bounty and liberality of the Government. By this course the Government has, in effect, repealed the law making it a trespass to settle on the public lands, and nothing now remains to carry out the enlightened and liberal views of the Government, but to repeal the law above alluded to, and make the pre-emption law prospective in its operation.

*The following "exhibit," received from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, will show the sales of the public lands, under the auction, the pre-emption, and the private sale systems. This statement commences the 22d of June, 1838, at the date of the last pre emption law, and continues the sales down for a considerable time.

This statement shows that the average price of all the lands sold during the period above mentioned was only one cent and eighteen-hundredths of a cent per acre more than the minimum price. In a pecuniary point of view, the Government will be more than compensated for this small difference in the price, by the increased sales of the lands.

Mr. Chairman, the graduation law, as the President recommends it, with the proper guards to confine it to actual settlers, would be hailed as a law, in many of the new States, the most beneficial that could be passed. This measure would bring into market lands that are not first rate in their quality, and have been in market for many years. It would settle the country, and afford many an industrious and honest man a good home on his own soil.

I will barely remind the committee of the rtions of Colonel Richard M. Johnson Congress some years since, in favor of the btors to the Government for the public lands. In 1824, under the credit system, an immense debt had accrued to the Government on the sale of the public domain, and a scarcity of money also pervaded the country at the same time. If the Government had forced the payment, many an industrious, good man, would have been ruined. The Vice President had then, as he has now, that humane and kind feeling for his fellow man in distress, and he labored night and day in Congress for those who were indebted to the Government for their lands, and procured the passage of an act of Congress, which permitted all those who had purchased lands of the Government, and had not completed the payment, to receive the quantity of land for which payment was made, and to relinquish the balance to the United States. He also exerted himself, with others, to reduce the price of the public lands from two dollars to the present price of one dollar and twenty five cents per acre. Colonel Johnson had no direct interest in this measure, as he resided then, as he does now, in Kentucky; but he was influenced by those kind feelings of humanity, which strongly predominate in his character. The people residing on the public domain, or living in the new States, know well that they have a steadfast and warm friend at the seat of Government in the person of Colonel Johnson.

Mr. Chairman, before I conclude my remarks, I will present one other subject to the consideration of this committee, and to the people in the State of Illinois whom I represent.

The continuation of the Cumberland road is of the utmost importance to the people that you and I represent; and some of them have desired us to address them on the subject. I consider it my duty, in the relation in which I stand to them, to give them a plain narrative of the life and death of the Cumberland road.

People residing in a section of the Union remote from the vicinity of this road, take very little interest in it, and think we take too much.

This work has been carried on for a series of years, so that the business and habits of the people are identified with it, and therefore they are extremely anxious that it should be continued.

The General Assembly of the State of Illinois have passed resolutions insisting that this road should be extended to the Mississippi, at the city of Alton, and at no other point. I have presented them, this session, to the proper committee. Under the influence of these resolutions, the people of this city became very much excited and interested in the location and termination of the road at this point.

In order to carry out their views, and to advance what I sincerely believe to be the best interests of the people generally, I was, and am still, extremely anxious that this appropriation should be made. It is scarcely necessary to remind this committee of this fact, as they all recollect that I urged this measure on their consideration, to such extent that my exertions become rather offensive. I will still vote for the appropriation on any bill, or in any shape which it may assume, and I pretend not that I have done more than my duty, or more than any other of its friends.

The instructions which you offered, Mr. Chairmain, failed in the House of Representatives by a vote of 88 to 109, as reported. It will be seen by the journal, that a majority of those who supported the appropriation were of the Administration party.

I recollect well the eloquent speech of the gentleman [Mr. HOFFMAN of New York] in opposition to this appropriation. His voice, manner, and gestures, have made a lasting impression on my mind; and, although he opposed a vital interest of ours, yet he did it in an open, gentlemanly manner, so that this "lasting impression" is not an unfriendly one. I thought then, as I do now, that his speech, together with that of Mr. BELL of Tennessee, defeated the appropriation in this House. Other gentlemen of the same politics joined, also, in the debate, and the votes demonsirate that a majority of those who voted for the road were Democrats.

In the House the discussion was not directly on a bill for this measure—it was on instructions to report a bill; but, in the Senate, the judgment was pronounced directly on a bill for this object, and the vote stood 20 for it, and 22 against it. This the record will exhibit. Out of the 20 votes given for the bill, 13 were of the Administration party, and 7 of the Opposition; and out of the 22 against it, 12 were of the Opposition, and 10 of the Administration party.

This decision, no doubt, was the result of the labored exertions of the most influential and talented gentleman of the Whig party. We have seen the speeches of Messrs. SOUTHARD of New Jersey and CLAY of Kentucky, and they speak for themselves on this subject. These gentlemen are the pride and ornament of their party, and with their friends have great controlling power in politics.

On the other hand, we see the exertions of Messrs. Grundy, Wright, Buchanan, and others of the Administration party, in favor of this measure. These facts stand recorded in the history of this transaction; and although it may appear unimportant in some sections of the Union, yet with us, in the State of Illinois, it is of vital interest to the people.

It is justice to say, that the Opposition members in both Houses of Congress, from Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, did not join with their party in the death and murder of the Cumberland road, but acted with the Democratic party in supporting the appropriation.

In conclusion, I can say, that the facts from the journals justify me in stating that it was the Whig party in Congress that defeated the Cumberland road.

The reason urged by many of the party, which guided them in their opposition to this measure is, that the President did not recommend it. This is to me a most extraordinary objection coming from them. The Administration has, on former occasions, recommended it; and the President has signed a bill appropriating money for this improvement. It may be the reason with the President that it was not urged on the consideration of Congress this year, that Congress refused last session to make an appropriation for it when it was recommended to them. Let this be or be not the reason, it is no excuse for the failure. The Administration, although it did not recommend the measure, is not opposed to it, but leaves it, as it should be, to the free action of Congress.

It is stated in the last message that the revenue is not so abundant as heretofore, and that "there are circumstances that impose the necessity of rigid economy, and require its prompt and constant exercise. With the Legislature rest the power and duty of so adjusting the public expenditure as to promote this end.

"By the provisions of the Constitution, it is only in consequence of appropriations made by law that money can be drawn from the Treasury. No instance has occurred since the establishment of the Government, in which the Executive, though a component part of the legislative power, has interposed an objection to an appropriation bill, on the sole ground of its extravagance. This duty, in this respect, has been considered fulfilled, by requesting such appropriations only as the public service may be reasonably expected to require."

These expressions show that the President is not unfriendly to the measure, but leaves it entirely to the wisdom and discretion of Congress, as he should do.

To settle the question forever, and to convince "a man against his will," I would refer the committee to an act of Congress, approved by Mr. Van Buren, as President, on the 25th May, 1838, making an appropriation expressly to continue the Cumberland Road. This solemn official act will do away the fears of the most timid as to the views of the Executive.

I would appeal to the good sense of every member of Congress, let him be Whig or let him be Democrat, if he be not a free man competent and capable to act on this, as well as all other subjects, as becomes the Representatives of the people.

Is it possible that the descendants of freemen must wait their action for the dictation of a President? or had they not better "act well their part, there all the honor lies?" I dare any man to return to his constituents and tell them that "he was not independent enough to support this measure, because the President did not recommend it."

We have heard much said in this hall against the dictation, and party discipline of the President, and that the Democrats were not free, but bound neck and heels by Executive shackles. Is it possible that the Whig party, after making these expressions, wish to be forced to make this appropriation by Executive dictation? Or will it not be better for both parties to take the responsibility that is just and proper, and act with that fearless independence that is becoming the Representatives of a free and enlightened people?

Taking the facts as contained in the journals, and to which I respectfully refer the committee, no other conclusion can be drawn, except that the Cumberland Road bill received and experienced a Whig death in the Congress of the United States, in the year of our Lord 1840.

SPEECH OF MR. WELLER,

OF OHIO.

In the House of Representatives, April 18, 1840—In Committee of the Whole, on the General Appropriation bill.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I have not risen for the purpose of discussing the merits of the bill now before the committee, but with a view of saying a few words upon some of the incidental questions which have been introduced into this discussion. It is, perhaps, to be regretted that in the debates of this House, members are not confined to the immediate question under consideration. Such a course would facilitate the public business, and shorten very much the period of our sessions. I am, however, too young a member of this House to attempt a reformation of its customs. I must take things as they are, and endeavor to suit myself to the company in which I am thrown; and if other members wander from the question, I, too, must be permitted to do so. It is not my intention, then, to examine this bill, but to reply to some of the arguments of gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate.

The Independent Treasury bill has been dragged into this discussion, and a portion of the distress which now pervades the land has been attributed to the anticipated passage of this measure. Holding a seat in this hall under a direct and positive pledge to support this measure, I have deemed it proper to defend it from the attacks which gentlemen have been pleased to make upon it. I do this now, Mr. Chairman, because I am unwilling that the denunciations of gentlemen should be circulated from one extremity of this Union to the other, without something being said in its favor. It is, sir, a favorite measure with me, and whenever and wherever unjustly assailed or misrepresented, I feel bound to defend it.

What, then, let me ask, is the Independent Treasury, which has been so bitterly denounced by Whig orators on this floor? It is simply a proposition to effect a separation between the revenue of the Government, or the public money, and the business of individuals, or incorporations, and especially between that money and the business of banking. In other words, it is a proposition to divorce the General Government, in its fiscal operations, from all connections with banks, and to collect the revenue in the constitutional currency, gold and silver. The Administration proposes that the public money shall be collected by officers appointed by the Government, and amenable for their conduct to the Government. That these officers shall safely keep the money of the people until disbursed by law: That suitable places shall be provided for its deposite: That the officers thus appointed shall act under the solemnities of an oath: That they shall give bonds in a sufficient amount to secure the Government against loss. That they shall be punished by imprisonment in the penitentiary if they use a dollar of the amount deposited with them for own private purposes: That not a cent shall be used or drawn from that Treasury, except in pursuance of appropriations made by law. The Whigs propose to place this money in the hands of the local banks; and between these two propositions we are called upon to decide. The Government, through its own officers, must take care of the public treasure, or it must be entrusted to the keeping of the banks.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that experience has fully demonstrated that the banks can never be made the safe depositories of the public money. Enough has been already seen to prove that a connection with them must be attended with the most disastrous results. We have seen them, in 1837, in a time of profound peace and general prosperity, closing their doors against their creditors, and refusing to pay the Government the amount deposited in their vaults for safe keeping, and thus crippling and embarrassing it operations. If the experiment has been tried, and we have been cheated and defrauded by these institutions, is it not the part of wisdom to avoid them in future? Shall we not profit by the lesson experience has taught us? Will we renew a connection which time has proved must be destructive to the best interests of the country? I trust we will not thus madly involve our country in ruin.

[Mr. WELLER was here called to order, and objections were made to his proceeding upon the ground that he had no right to discuss a measure not now before the committee. A desultory debate ensued, in which Mr. W. declared his willingness to yield the floor and close his remarks, if the committee would then take the vote on the bill. Several Whig members objecting to this, Mr. W. proceeded in his remarks.]

I assure gentlemen that it is not my intention to enter into an elaborate discussion of the Independent Treasury bill at this time. When that measure is properly before the House, if my health permits and an opportunity is presented, I shall be pleased to express my views fully upon it, and to meet all the objections which may be urged against it. My only object now is to explain so much of its provisions as may be necessary to correct the misrepresentations of gentlemen who have preceded me. If it was in order for gentlemen on the other side to denounce this measure, and charge the Administration with having produced the distress which now exists in the country, it certainly ought to be in order to respond to these charges. If you, Mr. Chairman, had confined the gentlemen who have preceded me in this debate, to the question before the committee, I certainly should not have deemed it necessary to submit any remarks on this occasion. Sir, it is strange, yea, passing strange, that after a Whig orator has occupied the attention of the committee for three days in vilifying the Admnistration and discnssing the civil and military character of General Harrison, that I should be considered out of order in briefly noticing a question which has been dragged into this discussion. I hope, sir, that I shall be permitted to proceed without further interruption.

Will any man tell me that it is expedient to place the Government in such a situation that the suspension of the banks will operate as a suspension of payments on the part of the public Treasury? The Government ought to be able, at all times, to comply with its contracts and meet its engagements. Its ability to pay its debts should not be made dependent upon the solvency, or insolvency, of the banks. The preservation of the public faith requires that the Government should be ready, at all times, to pay the honest claims which may be presented against it. The Independent Treasury would place the Government in a situation where its solvency could not be effected by the swindling practices of bankers or the failure of banks. Besides, sir, these banks are the creatures of State legislation—accountable to the States alone for their conduct; and every attempt, on the part of the General Government, to control them, is a direct invasion of the rights of the States. I have said that it was of the utmost importance that the General Government should be ready, at all times, to pay its debts in a constitutional manner. If the public revenue is collected in paper and deposited in the banks, how, I ask you, can the Government discharge its obligations in a constitutional manner? The Constitution will not permit you to force paper upon the public creditor, and consequently, if specie is demanded, the Government must violate its contracts.

Again, sir, when you have placed the public treasure in the vaults of the banks, and suffered it to become a part of their funds, have you not, in effect, levied a tax on one portion of the people for the benefit of another? Do you not violate every principle of common justice, as well as the spirit of our institutions, in collecting revenue from the people for the benefit of bankers? Why, this would be enabling the banks to fleece and swindle the people with the people's own money! Besides, in this way you make the banks directly interested in every question presented to Congress in relation to the collection and disbursement of the revenue. You build up, by legislation, a power, the interest of which is directly adverse to the interest of the people. It is to the interest of the people that the amount collected from them, by way of revenue, should be as light as possible. It will be to the interest of the banks that it should be as heavy as possible, because the larger the amount collected, the greater will be the amount deposited with them, and the larger will be the profit derived from its use. In every question, then, connected with the adjustment of the tariff, or the collection of revenue, you make them directly interested. Their influence would soon be seen and felt to a greater extent than it now is, in our national councils. This hall would be filled with bankers and bank dependants. They would have their attorneys here to watch over the legislation of this House. In this way the stream of legislation would become corrupted, and our Republican institutions endangered. Let them once become identified, by law, with the Government, and they would soon control its politics and wield its destinies. The Government would then be in the hands of a corrupt, irresponsible moneyed aristocracy, and the original simplicity of its institutions destroyed.

It is a lamentable fact that there is not a legislative council in our country where the influence of these banks may not be seen in its deliberations. Their agents have found their way into our State Legislatures, and so shaped the course of legislation, as to fasten them more firmly upon us. Every effort at reforming their abuses is defeated, and men who have been recognised at home as sound uncompromising Democrats, have fallen under the influence of these institutions, and supported measures calculated to sustain them in their swindling practices. What wholesome change can be expected in these incorporations, so long as the people send into their legislative halls men who are identified with the frauds of bankers? How long will my countrymen submit to see their rights trampled upon, and odious monopolies cherished and sustained by State legislation? If you want to change the system, you must kick out of your legislative councils the attorneys and emissaries of the banks.

The Constitution expressly provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, except in pursuance of appropriations made by law. Is not the plain meaning of this, that a "Treasury" shall be established, in which shall be kept the public money? Will any one undertake to say that the framers of that section ever contemplated that that "Treasury" should be the vaults of an hundred bank? Such a supposition is too ridiculous to be entertained for a moment. Our fathers, who gave us that Constitution, obviously intended that a Treasury should be established by Congress, under the immediate control of the Government, in which the public money should be safely kept, by the officers of that Government, until disbursed by law. They surely never imagined that banks, created by State legislation, should be made the purseholder of the Government, and permitted to derive profit from the use of its friends.

The Independent Treasury, I have said, simply proposes that the Government, through its own officers, should take care of its own funds. This system has long existed in our State Governments; and, so far as I have been enabled to judge, no loss or inconvenience has resulted from it. In my native State, (Ohio,) we have a State Treasurer appointed by the Legislature, who, through the different county treasurers, collects the taxes from the people, and retains the money in safe vaults, until disbursed by law. Now, sir, if you call the State Treasurer a Receiver General, and the county collectors Sub-Treasurers, and collect the revenue in gold and silver, you have the Independent Treasury in full operation. If this system has worked well in the State Governments, why, I ask, can it not be applied to the General Government? Can any one who has not already determined to oppose the Administration, right or wrong, and denounce all its measures, see in this plain system a "Government Bank in disguise?" Do Whig gentlemen on this floor think that, with all their ingenuity, all their sophistry, and all their declamation, they can make the honest freemen of this country believe that a simple proposition that the General, like the State Governments, shall take care of its own funds, is a "Government Bank?" Sir, those who resort to such logic as this, underrate very much the intelligence of their countrymen. The day has long since passed by, when the people of this country can be imposed upon by such shallow trickery. The people will examine the bill for themselves; and then the vociferous denunciations of artful demagogues will pass by them as the idle wind. Though few of the Whig presses have dared to publish that bill, yet, sir, it will make its way to the people. You cannot suppress it; and, my word for it, when it is dead, the incorruptible yeomanry of this country will rally to its support. But, sir, we are told that this bill will make one currency for the Government and another for the people! I confess, sir, I have not been able to comprehend this argument. My political creed teaches me to believe, that in this country the people constitute the Government; that they are the source of all political power. They have adopted a written Constitution, and require that each department of the Government shall confine itself within the limits of that instrument. That Constitution recognises no no other currency but gold and silver, and it seems to me to follow, as a necessary consequence, that the Legislative department of the Government ought not to recognise any other. If the State Governments see proper to issue a paper currency, will that authorize the Federal Government to treat it as money? In short, sir, for I must not detain the committee with these desultory remarks, I ask that the legislation of Congress shall conform to the Constitution; and if that Constitution recognises no other currency but gold and silver, I would have your laws to correspond with that, and leave the State Governments to manage their own affairs in their own way.

It is the usual practice for the orators of the Whig school on this floor to attribute the present scarcity of money, and the consequent diminution in the price of produce and of labor, to the policy of the Administration. The ingenious demagogue will go amongst the honest farmers of our country, and tell them that if they will aid in defeating the re election of Mr. Van Buren, the agricultural interests will again prosper, and the products of their farms command a high price! I know, Mr. Chairman, that these misrepresentations will not have the indended effect. The farmers are too deeply interested in the preservation of Democratic principles to abandon them. It is to the honest yeomanry, and to the industrious and enterprising mechanics, rather than the bankers, vill ge politicians, and city loafers, that we are to look for the maintenance of our free institutions. A change in the price of produce cannot effect a change in their principles. If they will look at the matter in its true light, they will not fail to discover that the present state of affairs is attributable to the banks, which, a short time ago, flooded the country with their paper, and run the prices of labor and produce up, and now have reduced those prices, by diminishing the amount of their circulation. Panic and pressure constitute a part of the machinery by which the Whigs expect to attain power, and alarm the Democracy; and we may expect, so long as banks exist in their present form, to see this state of things immediately preceding a Presidential election. The great mass of them being under the control and management of the Whigs, they can make money plentiful or scarce, as may suit the policy of that party. Sir, the great evil of the times is the establishment of irresponsible corporations, with power to manufacture a currency. If you would strike at the root of the evil, you must strike here. These banking institutions have engendered a spirit fatal to Republican principles, and destructive to Republican virtue—a spirit to live by any means but those of honest industry. You must put bounds to that spirit which seeks wealth by every road except the plain and regular path of honest industry and honest favor. By the incorporation of these institutions, with exclusive privileges, you build up one class, at the expense of all others—you enable one man to live by the sweat and toil of another's brow. I know, Mr. Chairman, that we are sometimes charged with agrarianism, and it is said we are in favor of an equal distribution of property, &c. The charge is too contemptible to merit a serious reply. I would not take from the rich man the property which his honest industry had enabled him to accumulate. The spirit of Democracy protects him in the enjoyment of that property. But I am in favor (and I trust in God I always shall be) of an equal distribution of political rights. This is the fundamental principle of our institutions, and every law that violates it endangers the safety of our Government. All laws, to be just, must be equal; and every law which tends to build up and enrich one portion of the community at the expense of another, is a palpable outrage upon the genius of our Constitution. We have, in theory, the most excellent Government that ever attracted the attention of man; and if our legislation had always been confined to the letter and spirit of the Constitution, our country would have presented a different scene from that which we now witness. I cannot believe, with the Whigs, that Government should "take care of the rich, and leave the rich to take care of the poor." I would have the blessings of this Government, like the dews of Heaven, to descend upon the poor man as well as the rich. I would so shape the legislation of the country as to build up no moneyed aristocracies here, who are to procure a livelihood by the sweat of the poor man's brow. Exclusive privileges should not be conferred by law upon one class because they had been more fortunate in the acquisition of property than their neighbors.

Legislators would have acted wisely if they had respected the opinion of the father of his country, (the illustrious Washington,) as expressed in his letter to Thomas Stone, under date of the 16th February, 1787, the year of the adoption of our Federal Constitution. In that letter he says:

"To assign reasons for this opinion, would be as unnecessary as tedious. The ground has been so often trod, that hardly a place remains untouched: in a word, the necessity arising from the want of specie, is represented as greater than it really is. I contend that it is by the substance, and not by the shadow of a thing, that we are to be benefited. The wisdom of man, in my humble opinion, cannot, at this time, devise a plan by which the credit of paper issues would be long supported; consequently depreciation keeps pace with the quantity of the emission, and articles for which it is exchanged rise in a greater ratio than the sinking value of the money. Wherein, then, is the farmer, the planter, the artisan benefited? The debtor may be, because, as I have observed, he gives the shadow instead of the substance; and in proportion to his gain, the creditor or body politic suffers. Whether it be a legal tender or not, it will, as has been observed truly, leave no alternative. It must be that or nothing. An evil equally great is the door it immediately opens for speculation, by which the least designing, and perhaps most valuable part of the community, are preyed upon by the more knowing and crafty speculators. But, contrary to my intention and declaration, I am offering reasons in support of my opinion—reasons, too, which, of all others, are least pleasing to the advocates of paper money. I shall, therefore, only observe generally, that so many people have suffered by the former emissions, that, like a burnt child who dreads the fire, no person will touch it who can possibly avoid it—the natural consequence of which will be, that the specie which remains unexported will be locked up."

Sir, if General Washington had lived at this day, and come into this hall and expressed such opinions, the Whigs would have denounced him as a "distinctive"—an enemy to their beautiful "credit system" and every Federal orator in the land would have shouted "down with the 'Loco-Foco.'"

The evils of the banking system, as it has long existed in our country, were seen and felt at an early period in our history. In 1791, Thomas Jefferson, the great apostle of American Democracy, speaking of the banks, says:

"The abundance of paper has produced a spirit of gambling in the funds which has laid up our ships at the wharves, as too slow investments of profit, and has even drained the tailor of his needle and thimble. They say that the evil will cure itself. I wish it may, but I have rarely seen a gamester cured even by the disasters of his vocation."

The same great statesman, in 1796, held the following language:

"I had always conjectured, from such facts as I could get hold of, that our public debt was increasing about a million of dollars a year; you will see by Gallatan's speeches that thing is proved. You will see further, that we are completely saddled and bridled, and that the banks are so firmly mounted on us that we must go where they will guide. They openly publish a resolution, that the national property being increased in value, they must, by an increase of circulating medium, furnish an adequate representation of it, and by further additions of active capital, promote the enterprise of our merchants. It is supposed that the paper in circulation in and around Philadelphia, amounts to twenty millions of dollars, and that in the whole Union, to one hundred million. I think the last too high. All the imported commodities are raised about fifty per cent. by the depreciation of the money. * * * Mechanics here get from a dollar to a dollar and a half a day; yet are much wore off than at the old prices."

In the forty-fourth No. of the "Federalist," written by Mr. Madison, I find the following in relation to the effect of these institutions upon the public interest:

"The extension of the prohibition to bills of credit must give pleasure to every citizen, in proportion to his love of justice, and his knowledge of the true springs of public prosperity. The loss which America has sustained since the peace, from the pestilent effects of paper money on the necessary confidence between man and man; on the necessary confidence in the public councils; on the industry and morals of the people, and on the character of Republican Government, constitutes an enormous debt against the States, chargeable with this unadvised measure, which must long remain unsatisfied; or rather an accumulation of guilt, which can be expiated no otherwise than by a voluntary sacrifice on the altar of justice, of the power which has been the instrument of it. In addition to these persuasive considerations, it may be observed that the same reasons which show the necessity of denying to the States the power of regulating coin, prove, with equal force, that they ought not to be at liberty to substitute a paper medium in the place of coin. Had every State the right to regulate the value of its coin, there might be as many different currencies as States; and thus the intercourse among them would be impeded; retropective alterations in its value might be made, and thus the citizens of other States be injured, and animosities be kindled among the States themselves. The subjects of foreign powers might suffer from the same cause, and hence the Union be discredited and embroiled by the indiscretion of a single member. No one of these mischiefs is less incident to a power in the States to emit paper money than to coin gold or silver. The power to make any thing but gold and silver a tender in payment of debts is withdrawn from the States, on the same principle with that of issuing a paper currency."

Amongst the early statesmen in our country who turned their attention to the subject of banking, I know of no one who defined the evils of the system with more clearness and ability than John Taylor of Caroline, one of Virginia's most distinguished sons. In 1794, he wrote a pamphlet on this subject, which I should like to see republished, and in the hands of every American citizen. It contains as much good sense and sound Republicanism as any document of the same length in our language. I will take the liberty of reading a few extracts from this work:

"The free industry of the people, if suffered by the Government to operate fairly upon the commercial world, will rapidly supply us with a better currency than the involving, fluctuating, counterfeiting currency of corporations. If banks can pay their debts, we have a sufficient specie currency on hand. If they cannot, their credit ought to cease."

Of paper money, he remarks:

"A paper system can transfer property, transform parties, and change the nature of Governments. It is an engine that has no resemblance or interest to land, labor, or talents, therefore it can be a friend to neither."

In another place, he says:

"However ingeniously a paper system can manage artificial danger for its own emolument, it is neither able nor willing to meet real danger; and however rich it is made by a nation, the nation must still defend itself or perish.

"A corporation of merchants and of the rich, possessing an unlimited monopoly of the great mass of the circulating medium, can raise or diminish the price of all commodities, and in this enormous power is contained an unlimited scope, not only for reimbursement, but for profit. Now labor produces and pays for the consumption of all commodities; and out of commodities, both the reimbursements and profits arise."

The extract which I will now read, shows the manner in which our legislation is corrupted by the influence of these institutions:

"If a number of members of Congress are stockholders, or bank directors, then an illegitimate interest is operating upon the National Legislature. Then the banks have seduced away from their natural and constitutional allegiance, the representatives of the States—and then even foreigners—our late most malignant enemy, have obtained an influence on our national councils, so far as they have obtained bank stock. The English, who could not conquer us, might buy us." . . . . .

"When paper men get into Congress, or members are, by secret appliances, metamorphosed into paper men, it is obvious that they will be influenced by their personal private interest producing them an immediate profit in cash, rather than the public good. If the latter suffers, they will consider their own acquisitions in money as so much boot, compensating them abundantly for their portion of the common loss. One partner may thrive and the rest be ruined."

Again, speaking of the absolute power which the banks exercise over the prices of every thing, he says:

"The bank, having the monopoly of the bulk of the circulating medium, may occasionally increase or diminish the quantity. It may diminish the quantity, thus enhance its value, and purchase with its own paper, certificates on other property which are depreciated in the same proportion as the medium is appreciated. It may then increase the quantity of this circulating medium, lessen its value, appreciate certificates, or other property of course, and then sell a portion of the same certificates, or other property, to take in the paper which the whole cost. . . . . The circulating medium is the soul and food of commerce. A corporation possessing a power over the soul, can animate or annihilate the body at pleasure. By withholding its food, they may starve commerce—by glutting it, they may produce a mercantile plethora. A foreknowledge of these effects is an unlimited power of taxation. In a civilized society, the circulating medium is also the soul of agriculture, arts, and manufactures. All the faculties of the nation are subject to the regimen of an incorporated quackery, instead of pursuing a natural impulse in search of their own subsistence. If the physician was honest, yet the artificial regimen, in a state of health, produces debility, and hastens dissolution; but when his fees depend upon the irregularity of his prescriptions, and when he is a mere Hiccius Doccius of a fellow, he will soon destroy the strongest constitution."

There are a number of other passages in the book before me, which I had intended to read; but enough has already been heard to show the principles upon which these institutions are established, the evils inseparably connected with them, and inherent in the system. My only object in introducing this subject, has been to awaken, if possible, the attention of my countrymen to its importance, and to the absolute necessity of an entire and radical change in this system. I have also deemed it necessary to refer to these matters, in order to show the danger of identifying the General Government, in its fiscal operations, with such institutions.

The banks were first fastened upon the Government by a direct and palpable violation of the law, as was shown by an eloquent friend [Mr. ALLEN] a few weeks since, in the other end of the Capitol. He proved by the journal, that a few days after Congress had passed a law declaring that the public revenue should be collected in gold and silver "only," Alexander Hamilton, the first Secretary of the Treasury, and the leader of the Federalists, issued an order to the collectors, authorizing them to take the paper of the banks in payment of public dues. This palpable violation of the law, committed in the face of the Congress that enacted it, ought to have subjected him to immediate impeachment and removal. The Federalists of this day, acting upon the same principle which actuated their former leader, are now endeavoring by law to connect the Government with these institutions.

I confess, Mr. Chairman, that I have not charity enough to believe that the Whigs seriously think that the local banks can be made safe depositories of the public money. It does seem to me that no man, who has paid any attention to the past, can entertain such an opinion. Some movements have been made during the present session of Congress, which show satisfactorily to my mind that the ulterior object of the Whigs is the establishment of a National Bank. A few weeks since a distinguished Whig member of this House, from Kentucky, [Mr. POPE] introduced a proposition for the creation of a National Bank, with a capital of seventy millions of dollars. Another proposition, looking to the same object, was introduced early in the session, by a Whig gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WILLIAMS] I hope these resolutions will not be permitted to sleep upon the table, but that they will be brought up for consideration, and members compelled to record their votes upon them. In addition to this, I have frequently heard Whig gentlemen, in this, as well as in the other, branch of Congress during the present session, advocate such an institution, and declare that the General Government never could manage its fiscal concerns without the aid of a National Bank. Besides, some of the members of the Opposition on this floor have had the candor to admit that the issue now presented was the Independent Treasury or a National Bank. This, then, is the favorite measure of the Whigs—this their plan for relieving the Government. I desire that my countrymen should distinctly understand that the true issue now presented is an Independent Treasury or a National Bank.

Previous to making a few remarks upon this subject, it may be well enough to stop and inquire what was the great question upon which the political parties in this country divided, directly after the adoption of the Constitution? We may derive profit from looking back, and examining the point from which we started. What then, I ask, was the great question upon which the Federalists and Democrats divided? It was the establishment of a National Bank. Alexander Hamilton, the leader of the Federalists, was the author of this project. Thomas Jefferson, the leader of the Democratic party, was opposed to it, and lent the mighty energies of his mind to its overthrow: he warred against it because of its unconstitutionality, as I will show directly. Here, then, the two great political parties were, at an early period in our history, divided upon this question. Well, Mr. Chairman, where are we now? Look around, and see whether the parties are not now at issue upon this same question; and yet I have heard some gentlemen in the Opposition claim to be "Jeffersonian Democrats." "Jeffersonian Democrats," indeed! How can they claim this appellation, when they are warring against his principles, and supporting the doctrines and measures of Alexander Hamilton? Why, sir, they must think the people are fools, if they expect to practise such an imposition upon them.

One word more. I have nothing to say now about the military services of General Harrison. I support Mr. Van Buren because he is the ardent friend and advocate of popular freedom—the supporter of principles which I believe to be inseparably connected with the prosperity of my country. I oppose General Harrison because he is opposed to my principles, and because his election, in my opinion, would entail upon the country the curse of a moneyed aristocracy—destroy the Republican simplicity of our free institutions, and eventually lead to the downfall of the Government. It is not necessary for me, then, to examine his conduct at Tippecanoe, Fort Meigs, or the Thames. The House has been entertained upon several occasions with the certificates of his subordinate officers, to prove his military exploits. I shall not stop to explain how these certificates were procured, but I desire to say that this is novel evidence for a military chieftain to rely upon. Sir, if you wish to see the real hero of the Thames, go to the other end of the Capitol and look at the President of that body, [Col. Johnson.] Ask him for his certificates, and he will point you to his body covered with the scars of wounds received in that battle—he will hold up a hand shattered by the bullets of the enemy, and tell you there is the evidence of his chivalry and noble daring in defence of his country's rights. Sir, he is identified with the great West, and she will never forget his gallant deeds in defending her soil. No—no—though he may be calumniated by the hireling press of a corrupt faction, the confidence which the people repose in the brave soldier who poured out his blood in driving back the invader of these rights, can never be destroyed. His certificate was written on his body with the tomahawk, the scalping knife, and the bayonet, of our enemies. The record of his military exploits is not to be found in the vague and indefinite certificates of subordinates, but upon the imperishable page of his country's history. But I ask pardon for this digression.

I am opposed to the favorite measure of the Whigs, (a National Bank,) because I believe it both unconstitutional and inexpedient. There is sufficient evidence on record to satisfy me that the framers of our Federal Constitution never designed that Congress should exercise the power of creating a National Bank. In the writings of Mr. Jefferson, vol. 4, page 525, I find the following passage:

"It is known that the very power proposed as a means, was rejected as an end by the Convention which formed the Constitution. A proposition was made to them to authorize Congress to open canals; and an amendatory one to empower them to incorporate. But the whole was rejected, and one of the reasons of rejection urged in debate was, that they then would have the power to create a bank, which would render the great cities where there were prejudices and jealousies on that subject, adverse to the reception of the Constitution."

Mr. Jefferson not having been a member of the convention which framed the Constitution, obtained his information of course from others. The source from whence it was obtained is explained in another portion of his writings, which I ask leave to read. It may be found in volume four, page 506-7:

"Baldwin mentions at table the following fact: 'When the bank bill was under discussion in the House of Representatives, Judge Wilson came in and was standing by Baldwin. Baldwin reminded him of the following fact which passed in grand convention,' [to form the Constitution.] 'Among the enumerated powers [proposed to be] given to Congress, was one to erect corporations. It was on debate struck out. Several particular powers were then proposed; among others, Robert Morris proposed to give Congress power to establish a National Bank. Gouverneur Morris opposed it, observing that it was extremely doubtful whether the Constitution they were framing could ever be passed at all by the people of America; that to give it its best chance, however, they should make it as palpable as possible, and put nothing into it very essential, which might raise up enemies; that his colleague (Robert Morris) well knew that 'a bank' was, in their State, (Pennsylvania,) the very watchword of party; that a bank had been the great bone of contention between the two parties of the State, from the establishment of their Constitution, having been erected, put down, and erected again, as either party preponderated; that, therefore, to insert this power, would instantly enlist against the whole instrument, the whole of the anti-bank party in Pensylvania. Whereupon it was rejected, as was every other special power, except that of giving copyrights to authors, and patents to inventors, the general power of incorporating being whittled down to this shred.' Wilson agreed to the fact."

Alexander Hamilton sent in his report in favor of a National Bank, on the 13th of December, 1790. In the fourth volume of the Debates in Congress, for the years 1790 and 1791, may be seen the discussion which ensued upon this measure. The prominent Republican members were bitter in their hostility to it. Mr. Madison, who had been one of the framers of the Constitution, made an able speech against it. In the course of his remarks, he said:

"In making these remarks on the merits of the bill, he had reserved to himself the right to deny the authority of Congress to pass it. He had entertained this opinion from the date of the Constitution. His impression might, perhaps, be the stronger, because he well recollected that a power to grant charters of incorporation had been proposed in the general convention, and rejected."

This quotation fully sustains Mr. Jefferson in the declaration, that the power to create such an institution was expressly denied to Congress; and yet we hear gentlemen claiming, by implication, to do that which the framers of the Constitution have forbidden them to do. In another part of the same speech, Mr. Madison, in remarking upon the inexpediency of such an institution, says:

"It appeared, on the whole, that the power exercised by the bill was condemned by the silence of the Constitution; was condemned by the rule of interpretation arising out of the Constitution; was condemned by its tendency to destroy the main characteristic of the Constitution; was condemned by the expositions of the friends of the Constitution, whilst depending before the public; was condemned by the apparent intention of the parties which ratified the Constitution; was condemned by the explanatory amendments proposed by Congress themselves to the Constitution; and he hoped it would receive its final condemnation by the vote of this House."

Mr. Madison was sustained by many of the most eloquent men in Congress in his opposition to the Bank. I had intended reading extracts from the speeches of Mr. Stone of Maryland and Mr. Jackson of Georgia on this subject, but it is perhaps unnecessary. The debate to which I have alluded took place on the 2d February, 1791. The bill finally passed the House by a vote of 39 to 28.

In 1811, it is well known that a distinguished member of the other House, [Mr. CLAY,] made one of his ablest speeches against the constitutionality of such an institution. He has changed his opinion—but that does not change the Constitution. I am not, however, disposed to rely upon the opinions of others. I take the instrument and examine it for myself; and, if I cannot find the power delegated to create such an incorporation, I am opposed to the exercise of it. I am one of those who believe that the perpetuity of the Union depends upon confining the General Government to the exercise of those powers which have been expressly delegated, or which are absolutely necessary to carry some delegated power into effect. If you once admit that Congress can, under that section of the Constitution which provides that we shall have power to pass all laws "necessary for the common defence and general welfare," create a National Bank, you give the General Government unlimited power; you take off all restraints, and enable it, at pleasure, to swallow up the sovereignty of the States; you create a grand consolidated Government upon the ruin of the States, and break down every barrier which the Federal Constitution has raised against unlimited legislation. The people have given us what they supposed to be ample powers; but if, upon experience and a fair trial, they have been found inadequate, they have provided means for enlarging those powers by amending the Constitution; but, in the meanwhile, they have said you must not dare to usurp the powers which we have reserved.

But, sir, I oppose such an institution because of the dangerous powers which must be conferred upon it. The character of such an institution has been well described by Mr. Jefferson in his letter to Mr. Gallatin in 1803. He says:

"From a passage in the letter of the President [of the U. S. Bank,] I observe an idea of establishing a branch bank of the United States in New Orleans. This institution is one of the most deadly hostility existing, against the principles and form of our Constitution. The nation is, at this time, so strong and united in its sentiments, that it cannot be shaken at this moment. But suppose a series of untoward events should occur, sufficient to bring into doubt the competency of a Republican Government to meet a crisis of great danger, or to unhinge the confidence of the people in the public functionaries; an institution like this, penetrating by its branches every part of the Union, acting by command, and in phalanx, may, in a critical moment, upset the Government. I deem no Government safe which is under the vassalage of any self-constituted authorities, or any other authority than that of the nation, or its regular functionaries. What an obstruction could not this Bank of the United States, with all its branch banks, be in time of war? It might dictate to us the peace we should accept, or withdraw its aids. Ought we then to give further growth to an institution so powerful, so hostile? That it is so hostile, we know: 1st, from a knowledge of the principles of the persons composing the body of the directors in every bank, principal or branch, and those of most of the stockholders: 2d, from their opposition to the measures and principles of the Government, and to the election of those friendly to them: and 3d, from the sentiments of the newspapers which they support. Now, while we are strong, it is the greatest duty we owe to the safety of our Constitution, to bring this powerful enemy to a perfect subordination under its authorities. The first measure would be to reduce them to an equal footing only with other banks, as to the favors of the Government. But, in order to be able to meet a general combination of the banks against us, in a critical emergency, could we not make a beginning towards AN INDEPENDENT USE OF OUR OWN MONEY, towards holding our own bank in all the deposites where it is received, and letting the Treasurer give his draft or note for payment at any particular place, which, in a well conducted Government, ought to have as much credit as any private draft, or bank note, or bill, and would give us the same facilities which we derive from the banks?"

It will be seen, by the extract which I have just read, that Mr. Jefferson was a "Sub-Treasury man." He speaks of the necessity of "an independent use of our own money," being the very principles involved in the measure now proposed by the Administration.

Gentlemen here, who are the advocates of a National Bank, have told us that General Jackson, in vetoing the bill for the renewal of the old Bank, disregarded the expressed will of the people! Sir, I have frequently, since I had the honor of a seat in this hall, been compelled to sit and hear that distinguished patriot, for this act, denounced as a bold usurper, and a lawless tyrant. I confess, Mr. Chairman, that the application of these epithets to that illustrious statesman, has at times made the blood boil in my veins; and it has been no easy matter for me to repress my feelings. But, sir, these charges will have no other effect upon the public mind, than to excite the indignation of the people. Andrew Jackson is above the reach of his slanderers. His name and his virtures will be remembered long after the miserable slang-whangers who are now traducing him, shall have sunk into oblivion, and been forgotten forever. He has retired from the busy scenes of political life, its turmoil, and strife, and gone to his Hermitage, to spend the remainder of his days amongst his old friends, the warm-hearted companions of his early life. The prayers of the American Democracy have accompanied him to his retirement; and when it pleases an all-wise and superintending Providence to remove him to another state of existence, his grave will be watered by the tears of his grateful countrymen—his monument will be a nation's gratitude. When the party excitement which now prevails shall have subsided, and reason and patriotism are permitted to act upon the mind, common consent will award him a niche in the temple of fame next to that of the illustrious Washington. Often, in after years, will the young patriot, in whose bosom the sacred fire of Democracy has been kindled, make a pilgrimage to his tomb, and then, over the grave which contains the bones of the illustrious statesman and warrior, recount his deeds of noble daring upon the field of battle, and his firmness and moral courage in the councils of the nation. Sir, the howling denunciations of the Whig orators cannot injure him. His fame is fixed, unalterably fixed, in the hearts of his countrymen.

Mr. Chairman, I have a few words to say in relation to the charge here preferred against him of having disregarded the public will. I think I can find abundant evidence in a report referred to on yesterday by my eloquent friend from Virginia, [Mr. STEENROD,] to show the manner in which that bill passed Congress. I allude to the report made by John Tyler of Virginia, the present Whig candidate for the Vice Presidency, in the Senate of the United States, in December, 1834. That will furnish us a clue by which we may understand how this bill came to pass in Congress. That report shows, that, in 1832, (being the year the Bank was vetoed,) there were forty-four members of Congress indebted to that Bank; that the amount of their indebtedness was four hundred and seventy-eight thousand and sixty nine dollars! These were the Representatives of the people, who were sitting in judgment to decide whether the public interest required a renewal of the charter of that Bank! A renewal of the charter would secure a renewal and extension of their loans, and consequently they had no doubt about the expediency of the measure! Here you find men voting on a question in which they had a direct pecuniary interest. It is fortunate for the country that we had in the Executive chair a man who had moral courage and firmness enough to meet the crisis here presented, and defeat the machinations of a corrupt faction. The whole amount loaned to members of Congress, as shown by this report, in the four years preceding 1834, was nearly a million and a half of dollars. The whole number of members to whom loans were made in that period was two hundred and twenty-three!

The Bank was vetoed by Gen. Jackson in June, 1832. In his message, returning the bill, he told the people that he had discharged what he conceived to be his duty, and if he had erred, they would have an opportunity, in a few months, of applying the corrective at the ballot box. The Bank openly entered the political field against him, with its numerous branches, its hired orators and pensioned presses. The same report to which I have already alluded, shows that the Bank expended, in the publication and distribution of Whig speeches and pamphlets, denouncing Gen. Jackson and his administration, during the year 1832, the sum of eighteen thousand four hundred and ninety dollars and seventy-nine cents! Here you will see the tremendous power of that Bank and the extraordinary means resorted to in order to defeat the re-election of the old chief. The contest was a warm and a violent one, but the people triumphed. At the ballot box they endorsed the act for which the Whigs have denounced him as a lawless tyrant. The fact that the people re-elected him, proves conclusively that he did not disregard their will in the exercise of the veto power. That veto will reflect honor upon his name long after you and I have passed from the stage of action.

A few words more, Mr. Chairman, and I have done. A National Bank must necessarily, from the very principles upon which it is established, exercise a powerful influence not only over the commercial, but over the political, interests of the country. Give such an institution the power to regulate the currency of the Government, and it will have the power to control the politics of the country. Like the old bank, it would enter the political arena, corrupt the elective franchise, destroy the freedom of the press, and soon draw within its voracious maw the rights and liberties of the people. Believing, with Mr. Jefferson, that such an institution is of the most most deadly hostility to our free Government, I could never be induced to give my support to it. Knowing, as I do, that if the Whigs obtain the ascendency, they will charter such an institution, I would this day, if I had a voice that could be heard by the whole American people, urge them to activity and vigilance in the approaching contest. I would tell them that this was not a time when freemen should be found slumbering upon their posts; that the safety of our Republican institutions requires them to prepare for the approaching election. I would entreat them, in the name of their Revolutionary fathers, who perilled their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honors, to secure to us the inestimable blessings we now enjoy, to watch well the movements of the Federal aristocracy. I would ask them to swear their children, ere they have left the lap of their mothers, and been contaminated by the selfishness of corruption of the world, to wage unceasing warfare against every institution calculated to build up and sustain a moneyed aristocracy amongst us. I would tell them that, if this Government, which for more than half a century has attracted the wonder and admiration of the world, is to remain unchanged, they must lay the foundation of their legislation broad and deep in an equality of political rights. And if it were the last word I had to utter this side of eternity, I would implore them to discountenance the efforts now making by the Whigs to establish a National Bank. God grant that the hour may never come, when the great mass of my countrymen shall be made the serfs and slaves, the hewers of wood and drawers of water, to a haughty, purse-proud, and insolent aristocracy.

SPEECH OF MR. PETRIKIN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

In the House of Representatives, April 17, 1840—In Committee of the Whole, on the General Appropriation bill.

Mr. PETRIKIN observed: Mr. Chairman, I perfectly agree with several gentlemen who have condemned the waste of time occupied in discussing subjects which have no reference to the question now properly under consideration before the committee, and I shall not follow their example, with the exception of noticing some remarks made by my colleague from Pennsylvania, [Mr. OGLE,] who has indulged himself in what I suppose he thought a specimen of his wit, and which I think illiberal and unfounded, and which he travelled out of his way to make. I shall, therefore, ask the indulgence of the committee for a few minutes, while I notice them.

I was not present when my colleague made his remarks, but a friend has been kind enough to furnish them to me. My colleague said "his colleague [Mr. PETRIKIN] had lately been at home for upwards of two weeks, and finding an expression among the log cabins there, had returned, and brought his cue back with him; and we had evidence this morning of some misgivings and waverings in his support of the spoilers."

I have been home, Mr. Chairman, and visited many of my constituents—some of them in their log cabins—and have returned with my "cues." Not one "cue" only, for I can assure my colleague that I have two "cues:" one which I wear appended to my head, which follows me; the other is the cue of political principle and common homespun Democracy, which I follow. The first "cue" I have carried for thirty-three years; the latter I have followed for forty years, and which I got in the times that tried men's souls, during the reign of terror, during the days of the Alien and Sedition laws, and have followed it ever since. I retain them both as matters of pride; I wish I could say as much for my colleague. But I am sorry to say that I have never known my colleague to follow any "cue" long, neither one of hair or of principle. He never possessed stability enough to follow any thing long at a time. My colleague and myself have rarely followed the same "cue." His "cue" of Antimasonry, Federalism, and Abolition, I feel proud to say, I never did follow. He has been, within my knowledge, at every point of the political compass—a Jackson man, an Adams man, a Clay man, and what in my county we call an amphibious politician—an Antimason and Abolitionist Harrison man. Ay, sir, he is one of that fanatical sect which does not vegetate in my county—a sect that would carry rapine, robbery, and murder amongst the peaceable inhabitants of the South, to gratify their malign purposes or lust for office and power. Mr. Chairman, I can inform my colleague that I have been home; that I have visited my constituents, as I before observed, many of them in their log cabins, in which I have often, very often, partaken of their hospitality—yes, for the last thirty-one years—and found them as I left them, sound, true Democrats, without change or shadow of turning. They are not composed of such turnable, or changeable, materials as my colleague. They are steady, inquiring, sensible men, who will not disgrace themselves and the country by aiding to elevate to the Presidency a poor, weak, imbecile old man, such as they know General Harrison to be, but will show their attachment to the principles of their forefathers, by voting for Mr. Van Buren—voting for him, not because he is called Van Buren, or any other name, but because he is the candidate of the Democratic party, and has satisfied them that he is honest, capable, and devoted to Democratic principles. Although my constituents have not been corrupted by what my colleague and his decency party would call refinement, yet I can assure my colleague they possess manly independence; and I, as their representative, shall truly represent them. If I do not, it shall not be for want of the will to do so. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that my constituents despise the party that thinks so meanly of the intelligence of the people as to suppose they can be induced to vote for an imbecile old man, merely because it is said that he lives in a "log cabin," and drinks "hard cider," and without being possessed of any other qualification to recommend him to their favorable consideration. I am well acquainted with the people of the county I reside in, and can say that there are but few men who have resided in it for four years past that I do not know; and no county in the State, of equal population, contains a greater number of intelligent, sound, unwavering Democrats. I therefore repel the insinuation thrown out by my colleague, that they were turning to be "log cabin" men, (as he terms his party,) as not having the least foundation in fact. My colleague, I am told, has undertaken to slander another county, which I have passed through twice during my absence. I did not distinctly hear him, but I understood him to say that "old Berks" had been a Federal county. This is not true. The people of old Berks have always been decidedly Democratic, whenever party lines were drawn, and are now, what they always have been, and were four years ago when they (as they often have done before) carried terror and despair into the ranks of the Federal banklites; and they will do so again at the next election. Columbia and old Berks are allies in Democracy, and always go together in political strife for victory. Columbia has deservedly gained the appellation of "the star of the North," and will retain her place along side of old Berks, to the mortification of my colleague and his brawling "log cabin" partizans. I could, Mr. Chairman, if I chose to follow the example of my colleague, bring up reminiscences of the gentleman's political course for the last fifteen years, that would startle even himself; but I will not occupy the time of the committee with a theme of so little consequence, either to them or to myself.

Mr. Chairman, if the observations of my colleague were only to be confined to Pennsylvania, where we are both known, I would have despised answering them; but as they are intended to be circulated over the Union for the purpose of deception, (and if I did not contradict them, might induce strangers to suppose that my constituents and myself were becoming, like my colleague, renegades from Democracy,) I considered it my duty to trespass on the strict rules of order, and notice them. I feel grateful to the committee for their indulgence, and shall cease to make any further comment upon what concerns myself personally.

My colleague, in the course of his three days' speech, has occasionally endeavored to induce others to believe he was an economist, at the same time clearly proving the contrary, by the occupation of the time of the committee and country so great a length of time, at an expense of seven thousand five hundred dollars of the people's money, not in discussing a subject under consideration, but indulging himself, for the most part, in attacks on individuals, or in ridiculous buffoonery, in doing such dirty work of the Harrison party in this House as they were ashamed to do themselves, and would be probably ashamed of it, when done. This is economy after a fashion; but when he reflects that the seven thousand five hundred dollars he has wasted would have bought several good lots of land for honest farmers, who would really have been glad to live on the land, in even "a log cabin," will not his conscience tell him he has done wrong? I am sure, if his constituents hear of it, they will condemn this waste of money. One other matter, and I shall dismiss my colleague for the present. He has said a great deal about the furniture of the White House, and the plate used at the President's table. That sounds very fine indeed, when coming from a member of the party which arrogates to itself the title of "all the decency party." Why the banks, their favorites, gave their officers more costly plate than the President's. I would ask my colleague if he was a director of the United States Bank when those in the direction of that institution voted a service of plate, valued at twenty thousand dollars, to Mr. Biddle? Whether he was or was not, I certainly do not name this with a view to cast any imputation of disrespect or blame on Mr. Biddle, for I know him to be an honorable man. I wish my colleague was like him. I merely wish to remind my colleague that many private individuals have plate more valuable that that he finds so much fault with in the White House, belonging to the nation, and not to Mr. Van Buren. As respects the furniture of the White House, my colleague has been so handsomely and ably reproved by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings, [Mr. LINCOLN,] who truly named the observations of my colleague as being "small game," and "little mean matters," I shall pass it by with this observation, that, as a member of that committee, I have always found the chairman a highly liberal and honorable man.

I shall now, Mr. Chairman, ask the indulgence of the committee while I make some remarks on a few items of appropriations contained in the bill now under consideration, to which, at the proper time, I intend to propose some amendments, and review the objections made to those appropriations by members of the Opposition party. In the course of the speech made yesterday, by the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, [Mr. LINCOLN,] he had censured the President for transferring the appropriations made for some light-houses proposed to be built at the mouths of inconsiderable creeks, toward the finishing of the Treasury building. I contend that the transfer was made conformable to law, as will be found by referring to the act of Congress, approved 3d March, 1839. The President having it certified to him that the erection of those light-houses was not necessary, had not only a right, but it was his duty, under the act of Congress, to transfer the money appropriated for them to some other useful work. Many of these light-house appropriations made for the last four or five years, are useless and not intended for public good, but for electioneering humbugs, brought before Congress and advocated by Whig members, or to get fat jobs for speculators; and it is perfectly right before they are built that there ought to be careful inquiry as to the utility, before such vast sums of money are expended.

It is very questionable whether the numerous light-houses, built along the coast, not only on the ocean, but on the lakes, have not a tendency to make navigation more dangerous, by embarrassing navigators, owing to the difficulty of discriminating or distinguishing one from another. Every session of Congress there are bills asking for large sums of money to build light-houses; and so fully have I become satisfied of the impropriety of this kind of appropriations, that in nine cases out of ten, I am startled when I hear the word "light-house" named in a bill, considering it synonymous with the word "plunder." It is not the first cost of building the light-houses alone, but the constant expense of oil and salary of keepers, which is burdensome to the country and tends to swell the amount of the expenditures of Government every year, and furnish a theme of complaint for Whig members of Congress, although they are the authors of all this expense themselves. The very careless and loose manner in which laws appropriating money for any kind of public buildings are passed, has a tendency to invite and encourage peculation. That, however, is the fault of Congress, whose members, instead of examining each item of the bill, and carefully guarding the expenditure of the money by checks on the public agents, pay no attention to them, but take up the time that ought to be devoted to this duty in talking about matters totally irrelevant, I have often thought for the purpose of preventing a careful examination. In fact, all that contractors and speculators have to do, is to keep up the cry of "give, give," and Congress, without much inquiry whether the object the money is asked for is necessary or not, passes laws giving all that is asked. When the report of the expenditures is made to Congress at their next session, those members who are the most ready to vote for all such appropriations, are the first to join in the unjust cry of "extravagance, waste, and profligacy" against the Administration. Who are always foremost in voting those extravagant and often useless appropriations? I answer, without fear of contradiction in truth, that they are a large majority of those members who call themselves in this House Whigs, together with enough of easy-conscienced Democrats to make a majority of this House.

As an evidence of this, let me draw the attention of the members of the committee to the items in the present bill making appropriations for the new Treasury building, Patent Office, and Post Office. These appropriations never have been before the Committee on the Public Buildings and Public Grounds, as they ought to have been, and as the rules of the House require, for investigation; but they have been brought before the Committee of Ways and Means, by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the estimates furnished by an architect, without any examination or inquiry. If this House had enforced its rules, the Committee of Public Buildings would have ascertained what was the actual amount necessary, and endeavored to have recommended measures to prevent the improper use of the appropriations. Now, sir, I have some little experience as to the reliance to be placed on estimates of engineers and architects generally employed by Government. An architect does not expect to give the truth when asked to furnish an estimate for the money necessary to erect a building or public work, lest, if the truth was told, it might startle the public, and even frighten the members of Congress entrusted with the project, and the work would not be commenced: of course their services would be no longer required.

The immense cost of public buildings erected by the Government is to be attributed wholly to the defective legislation by Congress, and that often the effect of the management of designing men filling seats in that body. This loose and improper mode of legislating is the cause of laws being passed voting millions of dollars, to be expended by agents without any limit, guards, or checks and without any one being responsible or accountable for the proper expenditure of the money. Extra duty is imposed on the President, which does not belong to his station, and which it is impossible, from the nature of his other duties, he can discharge; no power is given him to transfer this duty to any one. From this results a great loss of money and a very great increase of cost in erecting the buildings. Members of Congress take great care to avoid all labor or responsibility themselves, but by their own act place the burden on the President's shoulders and then denounce him for extravagance and waste. Whereas, if these men would discharge the duty which they are sent here to do, by providing by law for the appointment of proper persons to superintend the expenditure of those appropriations, with proper restrictions, we would find less cause of complaint of extravagance in the expenditures necessary to complete the works of the Government. I will prove what I say by the relation of a fact.

The plan on which the new Treasury building is now being built, is not the plan approved of by General Jackson, as the law authorizing its construction required. When the plan was submitted to the General for his sanction, he took his pen and very properly expunged the colonnade, which is now being erected before the building—not by black lines drawn around it, but across its length and breadth; and not only did he do so, but he went on the ground, and with his cane showed where the building was to be erected, forbidding any interference with the present State building. Why the present plan was adopted, or by whose order, no one can tell—the original plan, approved of by General Jackson, has, by some mysterious means, disappeared. I have, as a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, repeatedly asked for it, but can get no account of it from the architect, nor any reason why it could not be found. This has certainly given room to suspect fraud somewhere. But certainly President Van Buren could not be blamed for an act which took place before he was inaugurated, and of which he could not be expected to have any knowledge. Could it be expected that he could watch the architect in a matter of which there was no record left, except what the architect had in his own possession, and might show him or not, as he chose? There is another exception taken to the President accepting the voluntary offer of the workmen at the public buildings to go on with the work of the Treasury building and Patent Office after the appropriations were expended, at their own risk, without incurring any claim against the Government, if Congress should not make an appropriation. Certainly there is nothing improper in this when it was the voluntary offer of the workmen themselves; on the contrary, I think it was the mutual interest of both the workmen and Government that the work should be continued. A great loss of time and money is always the necessary consequence of such work being suspended It matters not how the workmen disposed of the certificates which were given them for this work—whether they were shaved, or jewed by banks or brokers, was no business of the President's; and I am surprised the gentlemen from Vermont [Mr. EVERETT] should ask the question, or complain if the banks did shave them, as he and his party profess to be such warm friends of banks

The observations made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN,] respecting the building about being erected for the Post Office Department, were, in part, very correct, particularly as to the discrepancy of the architect's estimates, made at different times, and the great increase of cost of the proposed building. With a view of showing how little reliance is to be placed on an architect's estimate, I will give the estimates made at different times for this building by the architect:

First estimate made for first plan, February, 1839 - - - -	$280,000
Second estimate, made for second plan, one story lower, in June, 1839 -	413,000
Third estimate, made for second plan, December, 1839 - - -	400,000
Fourth estimate, made for second plan, March, 1840 - - - - -	450,000

And these estimates are made by the man whom the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] thought so very meritorious an artist and an honest man, on whom he [Mr. WISE] placed so much confidence that he defeated the plan and views of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. LINCOLN,] respecting the Treasury building in 1838; and for this architect's sake he [Mr. WISE] assumed the responsibility, and claimed the credit for himself, of erecting the present Treasury building, which is a monument of the ignorance, if not dishonesty, of the architect, and a disgrace to the nation.

But to return to the Post Office building. The principal cause of all this monstrous increase of expenditure originated in this House. When the bill to authorize its erection was before the House of Representatives, in March, 1839, I attempted to have a clause added, limiting the cost of the building to three hundred thousand dollars, although the estimate was but two hundred and eighty thousand dollars; but I was defeated by the votes of gentlemen, (Whig members of Congress,) who are now joining in the cry of extravagance against the Administration. I again attempted to add amendments to insure a strict accountability for the expenditure of the money, and I was again defeated by the votes of a large majority of those very Whigs who wish to make the people believe they are the friends of retrenchment and reform; in fact, I was opposed by nearly all the Whigs in the House, in every attempt I made to save the money of the people.

Something was said about the Postmaster General's agency in the erection of this building. I can assure the committee that Amos Kendall has had but a very small share in the management of it. There are indeed no responsible agents acting under any legal authority. There is a commission composed of the five heads of Departments; each of whom may, if he chooses, give his opinion on subjects connected with the erection of the building, but neither of them are required, by any law, to assume any responsibility which ought to attach to such a plan. Of course Mr. Kendall had but one voice out of five. His official duties are very arduous, his health bad, and I have no doubt he can spare but little time to examine into the details of a work so extensive to the new Post Office building. He also feels a delicacy in attempting to use a controlling power over his associates, where they differ with him, on account of the building being for his own Department. If the act of Congress had given him the entire and sole control of the erection of this building, I have no doubt he would then have assumed the responsibility. He is a working man, both honest and capable, and in the language of the Proverbs, "what he findeth for his hands to do, he doeth it with all his might, whilst it is yet to day, knowing that the night cometh when no man worketh"

If there is any waste of the public money in the erection on the public buildings, it is the business of the standing committee of this House, "on the expenditures of public buildings" to investigate and report them. The President is not be blamed for this species of waste and extravagance. If it exists, why do not those argus-eyed gentlemen find it out, and expose it, who tell us so often of their knowledge and belief of the extravagance of the Administration and its agents.

I hope the committee will, before it rises, adopt the amendments I have suggested; for without the increase proposed, the buildings, for which they are proposed, cannot be progressed with, nor the workmen paid. If the House had ordered the proper reference of those estimates to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, agreeably to the rules, then would that committee have furnished the Committee of Ways and Means with the proper amount in the first place, and precluded the necessity of my making the motion to amend. The whole course of the legislation of this House is loose and irregular; standing committees are constituted by the rules of the House, but the business provided by those rules for the consideration of those committees, are scattered about to suit the caprice or whim of the persons making the motion for reference; and when matters are done wrong, the cry is raised by members against the Executive branch of the Government, to secure their own negligence own negligence or dereliction from duty. As an instance of this, it will be found that the business properly belonging to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is generally referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, or the Committee of Ways and Means. I hope we shall hear less of this everlasting cry of extravagance, and see some attention paid by members to consistency, by their assisting to apply the proper remedy to prevent this kind of legislation, which has been so prevalent of late years in this House, and which is the real cause of a very great waste of public money. For my part, I cannot conceive how members can reconcile their conduct to their own consciences, or satisfy their constituents, for their thus dishonestly, as I say, voting for millions of appropriations every session of Congress, and then endeavoring to lay all the blame of the burdens they impose upon the people or the President, when the President, at the commencement of every session of Congress, endeavors to impress upon them, in the most earnest manner, the necessity of economy and retrenchment.

I am daily amused, Mr. Chairman, to see those croakers about extravagance day after day attempting to get millions of dollars appropriated to make harbors at places in their own districts, where there is no water, and fortifications at places where there is nothing to defend, and where no enemy would think of going. All that matters nothing. The money is the object. I can tell these gentlemen the common people read of those matters, and reflect upon them more frequently than some of our short sighted politicians imagine.

SPEECH OF MR. NORVELL, OF MICHIGAN.

In Senate, Tuesday, April 21st, 1840—On the third reading of the bill making a grant of land to aid the State of Michigan in the construction of a canal around the Falls of St. Maria.

Mr. NORVELL said, that he had heretofore described the bill as containing a grant of one hundred thousand acres of land, to be selected any where in Michigan, to aid that State in the construction of a canal around the Falls of St. Maria, to connect, by a navigable communication, the waters of Lake Superior with those of Lake Huron, and with the other northwestern lakes. It provides that the canal shall ever be and remain a highway for the use of the Government of the United States, free from any toll or charge, for the transportation of troops and public property, and, by an amendment, no toll or charge whatever, except for repairs and attendance, was to be imposed after the completion of the canal. The lands selected would not be sold under the minimum Government price. The selection must be made within two years, and the canal completed within five years. He had, moreover, no objection to a further amendment, requiring the State to pledge her faith to complete the canal, or to return the grant to the United States.

The report of the civil engineer of Michigan, with the surveys and estimates, in relation to this canal, had been printed and laid on the tables of Senators. It was probable, however, that notwithstanding the call for authentic information, and the production of that information, the report had attracted little or no attention from the Senators who had made opposition to the bill. Gentlemen determined in their objections to a measure, indulge themselves in throwing out suggestions of all sorts against it, and were seldom disposed to be corrected by documentary or verbal statements of fact The survey and estimate contemplated the construction of a ship canal. The engineer states that no difficulties, of a serious nature, exist to the success of the work; that the portion of the line of canal, where rock is indicated, will not, from its peculiar quality and position, require blasting; and the expense will consequently be much less than would otherwise be incurred. The whole length of the canal is 4,560 feet, less than a mile, about 700 feet of which only will require excavation. His survey and estimates, as before remarked, contemplated a ship canal. But it was desirable that the work should be so expanded, that the largest steamboats might pass from lake to lake upon it. This would require an increased magnitude of the locks, and a consequent increase of expense. The fall to be overcome by the locks is eighteen feet, and the number of locks three. Large masses of granite are found immediately along the line of the canal, and the cost of hauling that heavy material entirely saved. The estimate for the ship canal amounted to not quite 113,000 dollars. He should suppose, however, that the estimate was not sufficiently large. At the utmost, he was of the opinion that a steamboat canal would not cost more than 250,000 dollars. The land proposed to be granted might, by judicious selection and disposition, be made to yield that sum. He could not, however, doubt that the State would apply her own resources to the completion of the work, if the grant proposed to be made in this bill should prove inadequate to the purpose.

It had been objected to the present construction of this canal, that the population in the country surrounding it was sparse, and that consequently, the work was premature. Sir, the sparseness of the population constitutes a strong argument for the immediate construction of the canal. That would at once increase the population of the neighboring country, settle and cultivate it, and rapidly develope its immense resources. When that most productive and splendid of all words of the kind—that great canal which first united the magnificent inland seas of the Northwest with the waters of the Atlantic ocean—was commenced by the State of New York, scarcely a white man dwelt along its western line for nearly two hundred miles. It was now dotted from one end to the other with beautiful farm houses and villages, with flourishing cities, and with a dense and prosperous population. What but the great Erie canal had caused this rapid conversion of the wilderness into cultivated fields, and into the ready means of subsistence and wealth to hundreds of thousands of people? From Fort Wayne to the Wabash, a distance of sixty or seventy miles, not a civilized inhabitant, as he had been informed by a Senator from Indiana, resided near the Erie and Wabash canal when its construction was begun. In the vicinity of the Delaware breakwater, a very sparse population was even at this time to be found. Sir, the objection proceeds rather from a disposition to indulge in the flashes of wit and merriment, than from the sober and sedate views which become the statesman.

But, said the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] the other day, why should these grants be made to Michigan, with a population of only two or three hundred thousand, because similar grants had been made to Ohio, with a population of two millions? Sir, that is the very reason why these grants should be made. Michigan was comparatively young and weak as a State, and required to be strengthened. Were she as populous and rich as Ohio, her own resources would enable her to march on without the aid of the General Government. It seemed, however, that the honorable Senator desired to make the rich richer, rather than to give his fostering aid to the comparatively poor. But when the earlier grants were made to Ohio, she too was weak, and needed extraneous aid. She received it from this Government; and that has accelerated her growth and prosperity. He was glad of it, and only wished the same measure of liberality and justice to be meted out to the other new States.

Sir, you have, in the upper peninsula of Michigan, a public domain of fourteen or fifteen millions of acres, which could never be successfully brought into market, without the construction of the proposed canal around the Falls of St. Maria. Without that work, the country could not be settled and cultivated. It had neither military nor any other roads to it, or within it. The only medium of communication to it, the only channel of access to Lake Superior from the lower lakes must for years be this canal. You have also an extensive public domain in the northern part of Wiskonsin, which that canal will enable you the sooner to sell, settle, and cultivate. Open that important work and you immediately realize the creation and successful prosecution of a new and extensive commerce from Lake Superior to six States of this Union. From the information which he had gathered, he believed that he was within bounds when he stated that the fisheries of Lake Superior could, as soon as the canal should be finished, be made to produce annually one hundred thousand barrels of fish, worth from seven to ten dollars per barrel, and yielding altogether nearly one million of dollars every year. These fisheries were thought to be inexhaustible. The fish caught in the upper lakes were of the most delicious sort. They were various, but the principal was the white fish, superior to the shad, and susceptible of being salted and cured, so as to render it far better than the salted mackerel, which entered so largely into the consumption of the country. The white fish was so prepared and sent to market, in considerable quantities, from the lakes below Lake Superior. One fishery in the vicinity of Detroit had some seasons produced two thousand barrels. In the country bordering on the southern shore of Lake Superior, copper ore and other minerals were believed to exist in abundance. Forests of the finest pine timber pervaded that country. It was known that the pineries in other parts of the Union were rapidly diminishing; and he had no doubt that, in less than a half century, the Atlantic States would be indebted to Upper Michigan for that essential material in the construction of their ships. But these rich sources of wealth and prosperity could only be made available by means of a navigable communication between the lower lakes and Lake Superior In such a communication, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Wiskonsin, had as deep an interest as Michigan. It was a national work in all its aspects and results. It was important in a military point of view. The country, for hundreds of miles, was bordering on the British colonial frontier. A military station had, for a long succession of years, been kept up at the Falls of St. Maria. It might, in the event of war, be necessary to send both a naval and military force on Lake Superior, both for the suppression of Indian hostility, and for defence against British aggression. The proposed canal could alone enable us to accomplish these purposes.

But, said the Senator from Kentucky, on what ground should you make this grant to Michigan? Why should this Government make it, when they had been already so liberal to that State? Sir, this Government have been liberal to Michigan with a vengeance! They have refused to comple the roads which they themselves had commenced in that State. They have despoiled her of a rich and fertile territory on her southern borders. They have received into their Treasury nearly eleven millions of dollars from sales of the public lands lying within her limits; and, sir, they have graciously expended not quite four hundred thousand dollars, all told, on harbors and roads within those limits! These have been the evidences of the liberality of this Government towards Michigan; and she may chiefly thank the honorable Senator and his friends for the generous amount of that liberality! But this canal is in the moon, or beyond the extremest verge of civilization. Sir, the honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] ought to have known the country better. Gentlemen have, on this occasion, made a sorry exhibition of their geographical and statistical attainments. The honorable Senator seems not to have learned that ships and steamboats, freighted with merchandise and civilized passengers, have for years ploughed their way to the very foot of this canal. He seems to have yet to learn that a civilized settlement and an American fort have existed there for nearly half a century. It is a pity, sir, that we cannot once in a while peep out of our own narrow shells, and look abroad on that broad and magnificent fabric of nature, comprised within the boundaries of the great lake States. The genius of the enlightened patriotic statesman surveys every part of his country, his whole country, its various wants and interests. He strengthens and guards the vulnerable points. He extends the ægis of his protection where that protection is most wanted. The waters of the great lakes are under the special charge of the Federal Government; and the man fit to govern the country will neither close his eyes to their importance, nor will he affect to want, or in reality want, some degree of knowledge, at least, of the just claims of that quarter upon the constitutional care of the public councils which he may be called upon to guide and direct.

But the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] had pronounced this bill to be the revival of a magnificent system of internal improvement by the General Government. It was no such thing. It had been the practice of this Government, almost ever since the Constitution was adopted, to grant lands for the construction of roads and canals in the new States. This policy had been pursued upon the ground that it was a necessary means of bringing the public lands of the United States into market, of gaining access to them, of improving their value, and of enriching the Federal Treasury. Grants of lands for these purposes were no part of a system of national internal improvement. No money was taken from the public coffers. On the contrary, grants of land to make roads through the public lands, brought large sums into the Treasury, which it could not otherwise realize. Such grants had not been considered as an infringement of the Constitution; because Congress, by that instrument, have power to dispose of the public domain in such manner as to them shall seem proper for the common benefit of the Union; and that disposition of it which brings money into the common Treasury of the Confederacy is, unquestionably, constitutional. A stranger, coming into this Senate, and listening to the honorable Senator, would have supposed that the proposed canal was a most expensive and magnificent work. Magnificent it might and would be in its results, but the extent of the work was extremely limited, and the expense too small to deserve even a passing objection.

The honorable Senator had said, that the Senate had been put in possession of no authentic information, no surveys or estimates from a responsible source. They were called upon to make this appropriation on the judgment of a single State; a State interested in the work, and perhaps with a paramount interest in the expenditure of the public money within her limits. Sir, the Senator professed to be a peculiar supporter of State rights, and of the honor of the States. Was the language in which he had indulged towards a sovereign State of this Union, such as became the champion of State rights and State honor? Was no credit due to the legislative enactments of a State? Were surveys and estimates made by her civil engineers, under her direct authority, irresponsible, and unworthy to constitute a basis for the action of this Government? Was it becoming in an honorable Senator, claiming to be the guardian of State credit, to impute sordid motives to a State of which he seemed to know so little? But the Senator was opposed to entangling alliances, to co-partnerships, between the States and the Federal Government. This bill proposed no copartnership, no alliance, on the part of the State of Michigan, with the Federal Government. She simply asked for it an unqualified cession of public lands for a specific purpose. The United States were to own no stock in the canal. They would not be a copartner. The canal was to be a free and public highway to all the people of the United States. Michigan desired no partnership with the General Government. She asked and she expected equal and exact justice. To this extent she went—no more. But the lands were not asked for in alternate sections. How was that possible in this case? Here was a canal not one mile in length. Could one hundred thousand acres of land be located, in alternate sections, on so limited a space of ground? Besides, the land there had not yet been brought into market; and the bill proposed to locate where lands had been surveyed, put up at public auction, and were now subject to sale by private entry. How could such lands command the extraordinary prices intimated by the honorable Senator?

But the honorable Senator alleged, that on this side of the Senate, we had lately denounced the States for their extravagant and profligate expenditures on internal improvements; and here we were about to create and carry on a new scheme of internal improvement within the States. Now, sir, if the denunciations alluded to by the Senator had been uttered, they certainly met with no response from a large majority of the members on this side of the Senate; and it was a little extraordinary that the honorable gentleman should treat the grant of one hundred thousand acres of land by the United States to a canal within a State as a continuance of State extravagance and State prodigality. On the contrary, the grant would supersede the necessity of State expenditure.

The Senator, in the excess of his zeal for State credit, had declared that he justified the States in all that they had done. Well, sir, the State of Michigan commenced this canal in May last; and, but for the improper interference of the United States military officers at Fort Brady, the work would have gone on. Upon the principle avowed by the Senator, he was bound to justify what the State had in this case done; and the best justification he could extend to her would be to vote her the lands, which would enable her to complete what she had begun.

He would add, that the large grant of lands to the Illinois canal was made without either survey or estimate of any sort; and the grant to the Miami and Dayton canal was made before the route of the canal was designated.

He considered all the difficulties and objections interposed, on loose and imperfect information, to have been conclusively removed; and he hoped that the bill would be permitted to pass without further opposition.

REMARKS OF MR. CHAPMAN, OF IOWA.

In the House of Representatives, April 29, 1840.—In Committee of the Whole, on the amendment offered by him, "to supply the deficiency in the appropriation for the year 1839, for defraying the expenses of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Iowa, $14,000."

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I rise not to make a speech for home consumption, but, if possible, to sustain the proposition which I have had the honor of submitting for the consideration of the committee. And I very much regret that the chairman of the committee of Ways and Means has thought it necessary to oppose this appropriation, because his influence here is very great, both as a gentleman and as being at the head of the most important and responsible committee of this House.

Generally, the Territories are looked upon in the light of begging the crumbs that fall from the rich man's table; but I base this proposition upon more substantial grounds. You established the Territorial Government; it is a creature of your own; and, by every principle of justice, human and Divine, you are bound to support it. In the organic law of Iowa, which passed Congress and became a law the 12th June, 1838, may be found the following clause: "And there shall also be appropriated, annually, a sufficient sum, to be expended by the Secretary of the Territory, and upon an estimate to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, to defray the expenses of the Legislative Assembly, the printing of the laws, and other incidental expenses."

Now, sir, Congress made a pledge to appropriate annually a sufficient sum to defray the expenses of the Legislature of Iowa. Heretofore you have failed to make this appropriation, because you were not advised of the necessary amount. Now when the expenses have been incurred, and it is found there is a substantial deficiency, we are told by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that the deficiency, actual and substantial as it is, must not be supplied, because the Secretary of the Treasury refuses to sanction it. Sir, you have been told by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, that my letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing a copy of the resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, was submitted to his committee, but that as the Treasury Department had failed to recommend the appropriation, the papers were returned for the opinion of the Secretary. What answer does the gentleman say he received from the Department? Why, sir, "that he (the Executive) does not feel inclined to go beyond the estimates furnished by the Governor." This, sir, is the answer, as read by the honorable member. Well, sir, the Committee of Ways and Means rejects the appropriation; and the result is, the chairman of the committee, with his acknowledged abilities, is here opposing this appropriation because the Secretary of the Treasury says he cannot sanction it.

Mr. Chairman, it is not because the Legislature of Iowa have exceeded in their expenditures the amount usually appropriated to defray the expenses of the other Territories, but because, from some cause or other, you have appropriated a less sum to defray the expenses of Iowa than Wiskonsin, with precisely the same form of Government.

What are the relative appropriations for those two Territories? I invite the attention of the House to facts, and challenge the gentleman to account satisfactorily for the difference.

The whole amount of appropriations for Wiskonsin for the year 1838, was $38,725; for the year 1839, the sum appropriated was $41,825; and the estimate and amount in the bill now under consideration for 1840, is $43,535; making in the aggregate the sum of $124,075 appropriated to defray the expenses of the Government of Wiskonsin, including Governor, Judges, &c. Now, sir, what were the appropriations on Iowa for the same objects? For the year 1838, the sum of $24,675, and for the year 1839, the sum of $28,950, was appropriated, and the estimates for the year 1840, being the amount now contained in this bill, the sum of $36,500: amounting in the whole to the sum of $90,125, including the salary of Governor, Judges, &c. which shows a difference in the appropriations for the two Territories of $33,950. Why this distinction in Governments precisely similar in every respect? I mention this, Mr. Chairman, not by way of complaint against the treatment towards the other Territories. No, sir; far be it from me to complain of them. They do not receive half as much as they deserve. Rest this proposition alone upon the estimates of the Governor, and in justice it must succeed; because, for the expenses of the Assembly, printing, fuel, &c. for the year 1839, the Governor estimated the amount of $20,400; for the same object in 1840 his estimate is $27,050; requiring for 1840 a larger sum by nearly $7,000, than for 1839. These sums of course do not include the salary of the Governor, Judges, &c. We see by comparing the estimates of the Governor, that the increase is at the rate of nearly seven thousand dollars per annum. And I ask why is it so? Is it because the necessary expenditures of 1840 will be larger than 1839, or is it because experience has taught him that the estimates of 1839 were not sufficient? Sir, it is plain to every gentleman that the latter is the cause of the increase. The sessions of 1838 and of 1839 were the first two sessions of the Legislature of Iowa. The Government was to organize, a new code of laws to make, print, and publish, unless the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means should think it proper to restrict fifty or sixty thousand inhabitants, dispersed over a territory nearly three hundred miles in length, to the use of three or four copies of the Michigan code. Buildings for the sitting of the Legislature must be secured, and various other expenses incurred, always greater in organizing a Government, than at any other periods. All these expenses were incurred in the first two and only sessions yet held.

To defray the expenses of 1839, the sum of $20,400 was appropriated upon the estimates of the Governor. To defray the expenses of 1840, the Governor's estimates are $27,050. Now, sir, although the latter sum will be scarcely sufficient, yet I am sure the causes for expenditure in the annual session of 1840 will be less than in 1839 by at least $5,000. Because the code of laws will have been made, printed, and published, the Government organized and under way, and the expenses consequently much less than in former years. Then, sir, take the estimates of the Governor for 1840 as the standard, and compare the necessary expenditures of 1839 with those of 1840, and it will at once be perceived that if the sum of $27,050 is necessary for 1840, that the expenditures of 1839 being necessarily greater by at least $5,000 than the succeding year, this appropriation is just and proper, and will not, when it is added to the sum of $20,400, exceeds the standard fixed by the Governor. Thus, sir, meeting the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means upon his own ground, I think the proposed amendment to the bill should be agreed to.

The honorable member seems to argue as though the sanction of the Governor is indispensable to the success of this proposition, and that he cannot think of going beyond the sum contained in his estimates. If I could be certain that it would satisfy him, I would show that the presumption is that the Governor has sanctioned this sum. The letter now in my hand will show that the Legislature, at the close of the session, after expending the sum of $20,400, when alone it could be ascertained how much money was necessary, passed a resolution requesting the sum I propose as an amendment to the bill under consideration:

"BURLINGTON, Jan. 14, 1840.

"DEAR SIR: Among the resolutions which have passed both branches of the Legislature, now in session, the enclosed copy of which is deposited in my office, I find the following:

"Resolved by the Council and House of Representatives of the Territory of Iowa, That our Delegates in Congress be instructed to apply for an additional appropriation of fourteen thousand dollars, to defray the expenses of the present Legislative Assembly of Iowa Territory.

"Signed by the presiding officers.

JAMES CLARK.

"Hon. W. W. CHAPMAN."

This resolution, if not returned by the Governor to the Legislature, in law is considered as sanctioned by him, and is to be filed with the Secretary of the Territory. Sir, what difference is there between an estimate submitted before the expenditure is incurred and afterwards? There is this difference in my opinion: the first is based upon mere supposition—the latter upon actual expenditure, and should, therefore, be the one to govern legislation. What would be the state of your public buildings, if the estimate, in advance of the expenditure, should fix the bounds of appropriations. Look to your estimates for public buildings, and compare them with subsequent legislation. Why they have never been sufficient. This very bill proves that fact beyond dispute.

Then, sir, I have sustained this proposition, not only upon the ground that it requires as much to defray the expenses of the Iowa Legislature as that of Wiskonsin, but also, under the rule which the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means wishes to establish, that the estimates of the Governor and Secretary of the Treasury should form the basis of the appropriation.

Mr. Chairman, I propose to answer one other objection raised by the gentleman who opposes this amendment; that is, that instead of $20,400, as stated by me, he says there was the sum of $36,000 appropriated for 1839. It is true that that sum was appropriated in 1839; but if he will examine the act of last session, he will see that upwards of $16,000 of that sum was specifically appropriated to defray the deficiency in the appropriation for 1838, which, taken from the whole sum, leaves, applicable to the expenses of 1839, the sum only of $20,400

Sir, if the honorable gentleman will turn his attention to the letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, which I now send to the Clerk to be read, he will perceive very strong inducements to continue the support of the Territorial Government of Iowa:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE,
February 6, 1840.

SIR: I have the honor to make the following statements in reply to your inquiries of the 3d inst. to wit:

Amount paid by purchasers of public land in Iowa, from the earliest period of the sales to 31st December, 1839, - - - - - - $716,844 72

Quntity of public land offered for sale during the same period, acres - - - - - - - - 1,240,468.68

Quantity now under proclamation, to be offered for sale in March and May next, viz. at the Burlington land office - - 895,706 66

At the Du Buque land office - - 1,337,053 10

Quantity remaining to be proclaimed for sale, acres, - - - - - - - 1,497,312.59

And that the period of bringing this last named quantity into market, will depend upon the action of Congress in regard to the mineral lands of the United States.

With great respect, sir,
Your obedient servant,
JAS. WHITCOMB,
Commissioner.

The Hon. W. W. CHAPMAN,
House of Representatives.

It is from that country you are receiving large sums of money—an amount calculated, in the present state of the Treasury, to do much good. I have before me a table, which shows the number of acres of land proclaimed for sale in this year.

Amount offered in March, 1840 895,000 acres.
Money received at the sales in March, 1840, as stated in the newspapers, $476,000.
Number of acres proclaimed for 1840, 1,337,000.

Amount received at sales, exclusive of private entry	$1,192,844
Probable amount to be received this year	500,000
The amount which will probably be received from the sale of mineral lands, if the bill now before the House for the sale of those lands should pass	400,000
Probable amount which will have been received for sale of lands at private entry, by December, 1840	400,000
Making in the whole	$2,492,844

I inquire of every gentleman whether it is just to establish this Territory, and then refuse to support it, especially when you have derived so much revenue from the sale of lands within its limits. Well, sir, debts have been incurred; and if you refuse to pay them, the people must necessarily be taxed to raise the money. With what countenance can I meet my constituents, if this proposition is rejected? And in such event, what must be the feelings of the people towards the General Government? If you intend to cast us off, say so at once, and we will cut loose from you.

Mr. Chairman, to whom are these debts owing? Not to the members of the Legislature, against whom an unjust prejudice has been excited here. No, sir—laboring men, merchants, and mechanics. The church is your creditor, and you refuse payment, not because you are unable, but because you are unwilling, to pay. The building of the Methodist church was finished under very embarrassing circumstances, to accommodate the Legislature with a place to hold its sessions. Their schools were turned out of doors, and members of the church put to great expense for your convenience; and yet this proposition is opposed. Sir, I put it to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, a high minded and honorable gentleman, as I know him to be, whether he could reconcile it to his feelings to have the benefit of the labor and property of hard working men, and refuse a just compensation. Some of these debts are due to printers, for printing and publishing the laws. One of them is a Democrat, and the other a Whig. Therefore, so far as political considerations can have any bearing, I shall expect the support of both parties.

REMARKS OF MR. WRIGHT, OF NEW YORK,

In Executive sessions of the Senate, upon the several days when the treaty with the New York Indians was under consideration, commencing on the 18th and ending on the 25th day of March, 1840.

Mr. WRIGHT said he must precede the direct discussion of the treaty by a few preliminary remarks, calculated to show the grounds upon which he acted, and the considerations which had governed him, in the examination of the complicated case presented in the book of printed documents which had been laid before the Senate.

And his first remark of this character was, that, if he knew himself, his principal motive, in urging the final consummation of this treaty upon the Senate, was his deep conviction of the benefits, present and future, which would be conferred upon the sinking bands of Indians, who were parties to it, from its final confirmation. He was well aware that, in making this declaration, he was subjecting himself to double suspicion. These Indians were within his own State, and it would be assumed that the whites were anxious for their final removal out of their way. Not so in fact, to an extent which would warrant a removal in any degree unjust. The bands had become too small, too much worn away by that contact with the whites, which is destruction to the Indian, to leave any fear from their remaining, upon the minds of their white neighbors. The territory they retain, too, had become too small to excite an extensive cupidity for its possession, or any strong hope of profit from its purchase by the white man. Then the treaty contained no provision for the forcible removal of any of these Indians, and therefore considerations of this character could have but a qualified influence in the matter.

The real truth was, and he owed it to his constituents to state it, that a just and rational sympathy for this perishing remnant of a once mighty savage Confederacy prevailed much more strongly in favor of the treaty than any motives of individual or associated interest. True it was that all the bands were in the midst of a dense population, and that one portion of one of them was upon the border of a large and growing city, imbibing its vices with the readiness with which the dry earth absorbs the rain which falls upon it; and yet all that dense population, even that incommoded city, would be the last to urge a removal of these Indians against their interests, and the first to censure him, if he should urge the proclamation of a treaty for that purpose, which was not palpably beneficial to the suffering red men.

He was liable to suspicion, too, as favoring the interests of the company, who held the pre-emptive right to the lands of the Seneca band of these Indians, when they shall surrender the possession. He believed the members of this company were mostly, and perhaps entirely, residents of his State; and hence it might be believed that his action was influenced by their persuasion, or influence, or interest. It would become his duty, in the course of the discussion, to speak more particularly of this company and of their rights; but it was enough now to say, that but one single member of it, to his knowledge, had ever mentioned the subject of this treaty to him: that this was a call within the last two or three days, and since his opinions had been formed, his course marked out, and his preparations made for this discussion: that the individual was Thomas L. Ogden, esq. of the city of New York, a gentleman of the legal profession, of advanced age, and great eminence, and whose call was made upon him as a known friend of the treaty, and not to persuade him to become so.

If, then, he should hereafter be able to show that the treaty was beneficial to the Indians, he hoped he should be credited in the declaration that his anxiety for its final confirmation was predicated upon their interests, rather than upon the interested wishes of his constituents, or the selfish desires of the pre-emption company.

His next preliminary remark was, that, in discussing the merits of this treaty, he should pass entirely over that mass of evidence which had been collected against it by those mistaken philanthropists—mistaken in his judgment—who opposed its confirmation upon the ground that they were, at some future day, to civilize these Indians in their present locations. To the purity of the motives of these enthusiasts he yielded the fullest belief; but in the reality of their hopes he had long since lost all confidence. The idea of civilizing the Indians of our continent had once been a rich source of hope to him; but practical observation and experience had compelled him to abandon the delusion. Many worthy and good men yet retained their confidence in the practicability of the undertaking; but he could only say to them that, when he should see the deer of the forest the domestic animal of the farm, and the partridge of the woods the familiar fowl of the barn yard, then, and not till then, should he again hope for the practical civilization of the Indian.

A further remark was, that he should enter upon the discussion with a full and perfect understanding, assented to upon all sides of the Senate, that the character and standing and credit of the commissioner who negotiated the treaty on the part of the United States, remained unimpeached and unimpeachable, and that his statements of fact were to be implicitly relied upon in all matters touching the execution of the treaty by the Indians.

[To this position the honorable chairman of the committee and all the dissenting members assented.]

Another rule for the discussion on his part would be, that the commissioner on the part of the State of Massachusetts, General H. A. S. Dearborn, was present at all the transactions, the validity of which are now in dispute, and is a respectable, credible, and disinterested witness to every fact to which he gives testimony.

With these preliminary remarks, he would proceed to the discussion of the treaty, and the facts upon which it rested.

A question had been raised, as to the right of the New York Indians to their "Green Bay lands," so called; but inasmuch as the history of that matter had been fully gone into by the honorable chairman of the committee, [Mr. SEVIER,] and by his honorable friend from Georgia, [Mr. LUMPKIN,] he would not consume time with it here. The treaty between the United States and the Menomonee tribe of Indians, of the 8th of February, 1831, by which the latter ceded to the United States, for the benefit of, and "as a home to, the several tribes of New York Indians," five hundred thousand acres of land in the now Wiskonsin Territory, and the former paid in money, for that cession, the sum of twenty thousand dollars, was sufficient for his purpose. It established the right of the New York Indians to that land, independently of any action of their own; though certain of the bands, the Senecas not included, had, long previously, purchased of the Menomonees, for the benefit of the Six Nations, a much larger tract of country, and had paid some twelve thousand dollars in cash as purchase money therefor. Yet disputes arose between them and the Menomonees, as to the authority of the persons with whom they contracted, either to sell the lands, or receive the pay therefor; and, the proceeding having taken place in pursuance of a consent previously obtained from the President of the United States, [Mr. Monroe,] by the New York Indians, the treaty of 1831 was negotiated by the United States as a compromise between the Six Nations of New York and the Menomonee tribe. Hence the estate of the New York Indians in their Green Bay lands.

He was aware that the original cession from the Menomonees required that the New York Indians should remove to the lands, and reside thereon as their home, within three years from the date of the treaty; but the cession to the United States was positive and perfect; the condition of forfeiture, a forfeiture to the United States, and not to the Menomonees; and hence the whole title was in the United States and the New York Indians. This being the fact, the United States had, since the treaty of cession from the Menomonees, and before the expiration of the three years, entered into a further treaty with the New York Indians, by which they were released from the condition of removal to the lands within three years, and the time of their removal was to be fixed by the President. That time has never been fixed, and therefore their right remains precisely what it was after the execution of the treaty of 1831, with the Menomonees.

It is now said that this right depends upon the mere indulgence of the President, and that the known determination of these Indians not to remove to Green Bay, places it in his power to terminate the right at pleasure, by fixing a day for their removal to these lands. The soundness of this position, in technical law, is freely admitted, and does any body fear a sacrifice of the interests of the New York Indians from the admission? Had such been the policy of this Government as to Indian claims and Indian title? If physical power and technical law were the rules by which these people were to be dealt with, they had no rights. We had never recognised in them any other estate in lands than that of simple occupancy, a mere possessory title; and if we were to canvass that right by the rules of the courts, the Indian might as well abandon his claim. His occupancy would be too limited, or too questionable, to give him a resting place, and might would make right on the side of the whites, when such rules came to govern the questions. Such, however, was not, and was not to be, our Indian policy; and no technical action of the President was to forfeit the right of these Indians to their Green Bay lands. The treaty, therefore, upon this point, required no more support than was given to it by former compacts of the same character.

What then was this treaty, in its essential provisions, so far as the rights of the United States and of these Indians were concerned? The entire instrument was too long to trouble the Senate with, while a very short statement would give the points upon which the discussion must rest.

Article 1 cedes to the United States the lands of the New York Indians, at Green Bay, not otherwise disposed of, computed at 435,000 acres.

Article 2 secures to these Indians a country in the Indian territory, west of the Mississippi, equal to 320 acres of land for each soul, the whole computed at 1,824,000 acres.

Article 15 stipulates to pay to the Indians from the Treasury of the United States $400,000, "to aid them in removing to their new homes, and supporting themselves the first year after their removal; to encourage and assist them in education, and being taught to cultivate their lands; in erecting mills and other necessary houses; in purchasing domestic animals and farming utensils, and acquiring a knowledge of mechanic arts."

These were the principal provisions of the treaty, in a property sense, as affecting the pecuniary interests of the Government or the Indians. Some other articles there were stipulating for the payment of small sums to some of the smaller bands, but the amount, in no single case, exceeds $5,000, and the aggregate amount is but about $20,000.

As connected with this branch of the subject, however, are two separate treaties: the one between the Seneca band of Indians, the pre-emption company, and the State of Massachusetts, and the other between the Tuscarora band and the same parties. The first conveys to the pre-emption company all the remaining lands of the Senecas within the State of New York, consisting of four reservations, as follows:

The Buffalo Ceeek reservation, containing - - - -	49,920	acres
The Cattaraugus reservation, -	21,680	"
The Allegany reservation, -	30,469	"
The Tonawonda reservation, -	12,800	"
In all, - - -	114,869	"

As the consideration money for the purchase, the pre-emption company stipulate to pay to the Seneca Indians the sum of two hundred and two thousand dollars in money, and the tenth article of the treaty with the United States, now under consideration, stipulates that the United States will receive, hold, and invest for these Indians, one hundred thousand dollars of this money, and will pay them the annual interest thereon for ever; and that the improvements upon the reservations, being the property of individual Indians, shall be appraised, and the one hundred and two thousand dollars be paid to the owners thereof in just proportions.

The treaty with the Tuscarora band cedes to the pre-emption company their small reservation of 1,920 acres, called "the Tuscorora reservation," or "Seneca grant," for which the pre-emption company stipulate to pay the sum of nine thousand six hundred dollars in money.

The title of the respective bands to the lands last mentioned, was the ordinary Indian title of possession and occupancy; the company, as will hereafter appear, having long since purchased the pre-emption right from the State of Massachusetts.

By the fourteenth article of the treaty with the United States, the Tuscarora band cede to the United States 5000 acres of land which they own in fee, situate in Niagara county, in the State of New York, to be held for them in trust, and to be sold at the value as appraised and the money to be paid to them, so far as the value of the improvements are concerned, and invested for their benefit, and the annual interest thereon paid to them forever, so far as the value of the soil, separate from the improvements, shall be realized, the expenses of survey, appraisement, and sale, being first deducted.

This was a concise view of the pecuniary stipulations of the three treaties, and upon them the discussion had hitherto rested, and must rest, as he had heard of no complaints from any quarter, as to the other stipulations with any portion of these Indians.

It would now be proper to examine the condition of the question before the Senate, in order that a clear understanding of the case presented may be had. What, then, is the real question before the body, and how has it come here?

We find the first printed paper, in the large file upon our tables, to be a message from the President of the United States, transmitting this treaty to the Senate, with the volume of papers which accompany it, and expressing his clear convictions upon the following points:

1. That the removal of these Indians is essential to their prosperity and welfare, and even to their preservation as a people.

2. That the true interests of the sections of country where they are, require that they should be removed.

3. That the terms of the treaty are liberal towards the Indians in every respect.

Yet it is not proclaimed by the President, but returned to the Senate for a further expression on its part; and what expression is sought? Whether, in its judgment, this liberal treaty has been assented to by the Indians, in conformity with the rule established by the Senate for giving that assent. This is the single point presented, and upon which an expression of the Senate is desired.

How have doubts arisen upon this point? Certainly from the peculiar action of the Senate upon the treaty at some former stage of that action, or from the peculiarity of the assent which the Indians have, in fact, given, or from both. An examination of the history of the treaty will show where rest the difficulties.

The original treaty, which forms the basis of this discussion, was concluded between the New York Indians and the United States, on the 15th day of January, 1838. About the due execution of that treaty by the Indians, there has not been, and is not, any question. It was presented to all the bands, convened in a common council, and was assented to by all, to the satisfaction of the Senate.

That treaty, thus made on the part of these bands, was subsequently, and during the annual session of the Senate of 1837-38, transmitted to this body for its ratification, by the President of the United States, in the usual form of transacting such business. It was referred to the proper committee of the Senate for examination and advisement. The committee found many of its provisions objectionable to them, from being too vague, and presenting too uncertain a responsibility on the part of this Government. The removal of the Indians, their subsistence for one year, the erection of mills, school houses, blacksmith shops, churches, and many other expenditures, were stipulated, without any amount stated as the maximum of expenditure to which the Treasury of the United States might be subjected. The committee as he understood at the time, and now believes, referred these matters of ordinary expenditure to the head of the Indian Bureau, for an estimate of the amount of money required to meet them, and framed their 15th article of the amended treaty, upon the estimate returned from that officer; thus giving, for the objects enumerated in that article, the full amount of that estimate, but limiting the amount which could be called for, to the $400,000 therein stipulated to be paid, that being the amount estimated.

There were other articles in the original treaty, stipulating for the payment of gratuities to individual Indians by name, providing funds for a university, and the like, which the committee wholly rejected, without proposing any equivalent.

Thus an amended treaty was formed by the committee on Indian affairs of the Senate, and reported to the body for its acceptance, which met with its unanimous concurrence. It was ratified on the 11th of June, 1838, and returned to the Indians for their assent, with a special resolution, which has laid the foundation for the present controversy.

It was proper here to remark that the resolutions of the Senate of the 11th of June, 1838, were a complete ratification of the amended treaty on its part; that the instrument, in all its parts, was thus made perfect, so far as the constitutional action of this body, in the formation of a treaty, was concerned, and that the only thing which remained to be done was, the giving of the requisite assent, by the several bands of Indians, according to the resolutions for that purpose which the Senate adopted. That resolution was made part of the proceedings of ratification on the part of the Senate, was, upon its face, to be adopted by a vote of two-thirds of the Senators present; and was, therefore, if met by the Indians with the assent required, the final close of our action on the subject of the treaty in our Executive character. The resolution was in the following words:

"Provided always, and be it further resolved, (two-thirds of the Senate present concurring,) That the treaty shall have no force or effect whatever, as it relates to any of said tribes, nations, or bands of New York Indians, nor shall it be understood that the Senate have assented to any of the contracts connected with it, until the same, with the amendments herein proposed, is submitted, and fully and fairly explained, by a commissioner of the United States, to each of said tribes or bands, separately assembled in council, and they have given their free and voluntary assent thereto; and if one or more of said tribes or bands, when consulted as aforesaid, shall freely assent to said treaty as amended, and to their contract connected therewith, it shall be binding and obligatory upon those so assenting, although other or others of said bands or tribes may not give their assent, and thereby cease to be parties thereto: Provided, further, That if any portion or part of said Indians do not emigrate, the President shall retain a proper proportion of said sum of four hundred thousand dollars, and shall also deduct, from the quantity of land allowed west of the Mississippi, such number of acres as will leave to each emigrant three hundred and twenty acres only."

With its full ratification, and this conditional resolution, the Senate returned the treaty to the President as amended, for him, as the Executive of the nation, to carry its orders into effect, but most clearly without any thing further on its part to be done, to make the whole a valid and operative treaty.

The President, during the vacation of Congress, caused the treaty, as amended by the Senate, to be again submitted to the Indians for their assents, according to the resolution of the Senate above given.

On the 21st of January, 1839, the President, by a message, returned the amended treaty to the Senate. For what? For ratification again by this body? No; but for this body to say whether the assents given by the various bands of Indians, was in conformity with our resolution of the 11th of June, 1838, and was sufficient to authorize him to proclaim the treaty. As to all the bands, except the Senecas, the President expresses the opinion, in his then message, that the assents had been "entirely satisfactory." As to the assent of the Senecas he seems not to have been satisfied, and for that reason to have returned the treaty and papers to the Senate.

The whole matter was then again referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs of this body, and underwent before them a laborious investigation, including the examination of numerous witnesses. The result was an inability, on the part of the committee, then consisting of four members, to come to any conclusion, or to recommend any specific course of action to the Senate.

Under these circumstances, the subject first came up for the consideration and action of the body, on Saturday, the 2d day of March, 1839; at that time, universally supposed to be the last legislative day of the session. It was immediately apparent, as all who were then here will recollect, that no decisive action could take place, without protracted debate, as the documents were voluminous, the statements complicated and contradictory, and the opinions of Senators, as well as of the different members of the committee, strongly conflicting.

The public appropriation bills, also, with a large share of the other legislation of the session, remained in an unfinished state, and it was impossible for the Senate to devote its time to a subject of this character, at that period of a short session.

To pass the subject over, therefore, and not permit the treaty, and the whole negotiation, to drop, for want of consideration and action, the Senate passed its resolution of the 2d of March, 1839. That resolution was offered by his honorable colleague, a friend to the treaty, and after a very little conversation and some slight verbal modifications, suggested by others and promptly accepted by the mover, was adopted, as his present impression was, by two-thirds of the Senators present. It was in the following words:

"Resolved, That whenever the President of the United States shall be satisfied that the assent of the Seneca tribe of Indians has been given to the amended treaty of June 11th, 1838, with the New York Indians, according to the true intent and meaning of the resolution of the Senate of the 11th of June, 1838, the Senate recommend that the President make proclamation of said treaty, and carry the same into effect."

With this resolution the treaty was remanded to the President for the further action of the Executive Department. In as much as the President had returned the amended treaty to the Senate for an expression of its opinion as to the sufficiency of the assent of the Seneca band, and as the resolution above given did not express an affirmative opinion upon that point, that officer very naturally supposed that further efforts on his part to obtain the assent of this band were contemplated. During the vacation of 1839, therefore, he sent the Secretary of War, in person, to hold a council with this band, and again lay the amended treaty before their chiefs in council, for their more formal assents.

The council was held on the 13th and 14th days of August, 1839, and "talks" were interchanged between the Secretary, the agent of the New York Indians, and the chiefs and principal men, not of the Seneca band merely, but of several of the other bands. These "talks," on the part of the Indians, were principally strong recriminations between the friends and the opponents of the treaty, and resulted in nothing decisive, either in favor of, or against the measure, as applicable to the Seneca band, or to any other portion of the New York Indians. A full report of the proceedings of this council is found with the printed documents before the Senate; and is all the evidence of any efforts on the part of the Executive to obtain the farther assent of any portion of the Indians to the treaty, after the passage of the resolution of the Senate of the 2d March, 1839.

Under this state of facts, the amended treaty, with a mass of documents in favor of and against it, was returned to the Senate by the President, during our present session, accompanied by his message of the 15th of January, before referred to.

All the papers have been again referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs of this body, and, after full consideration, the committee unanimously report that the state of facts have not been changed, so far as the action of the Senate is concerned, since the treaty was last submitted to us; that the question now is, as it was in 1839, when the amended treaty was before the Senate, upon the submission of the President, with his message of the 21st of January of that year, have the Seneca band of Indians given their assent to this amended treaty, in conformity with the spirit and intent of the Senate's resolution of ratification of the 11th of June, 1838?

This is the simple question for the Senate to decide, and this long history shows in what manner, and under what circumstances, it has come before us.

Before proceeding to discuss this question, justice to the President requires a few words in explanation of his course. It has been already more than intimated that his reference of this question to the Senate is improper; that the point was one for him to decide, as his action alone is called for to render the treaty perfect and operative. Differing with the President, as he did, in reference to the sufficiency of the assent of the Senecas, within the fair intent and meaning of the resolution of the Senate of the 11th of June, 1838, yet his convictions were clear that that officer had discharged his duty most properly, in again referring the question of doubt to the decision of the Senate. Where was the doubt, and how had it arisen? Out of the acts of the Indians, by way of assent or dissent? No. But out of what should be considered the true construction of the resolution of the Senate, under which that assent was to be made. The President tells us he thinks we intended that the chiefs should assent "in council," and he says, "no advance towards obtaining the assent of the Seneca tribe to the amended treaty, IN COUNCIL, was made, nor can the assent of a majority of them, in council, be now obtained." This language refers expressly to the efforts made by the President, through the Secretary of War, after the passage of the resolution of the Senate of the 2d of March, 1839; and, while it shows the construction which he was inclined to put upon the resolution of ratification of the 11th of June, 1838, proves, also, that he supposed the resolution of the 2d of March, 1839, contemplated further measures on his part to obtain the assent of this band. Stil he was not confident, as his message abundantly shows, that his construction of the resolution of ratification was that which the Senate intended; and hence his reference again of the whole matter to this body, that we might put our own construction upon our own act. A different course on his part would necessarily have been a final rejection of the treaty, inasmuch as there is no pretence that a majority of the Seneca chiefs assented "in council." So long as there was doubt, therefore, it was his imperative duty to make the reference he has made, and to leave it to this body to say what it intended, and whether, from all the facts in the case, which he has most properly laid before us, the spirit and intent of our resolution has been complied with.

This brought him to the real question presented for discussion; and tedious as he had been compelled to be in his manner of reaching it, he hoped he had succeeded in so far clearing the ground as to render the position in which he now stood perfectly perceptible. Had, then, the New York Indians, and especially the Seneca band, given their assent to the amended treaty, according to the spirit and intent of the resolutions of the Senate of the 11th of June, 1838, by which the Senate ratified that treaty on its part and tendered it to these Indians for their assent? This was the question. If they had, the matter was at an end. The contract had received the sanction of both the contracting parties, and it was in the power of neither to annul it without the assent of the other. If they had not, it was no treaty as to the bands not assenting, and nothing which the Senate could do would make it valid as to them. The question was one of fact. The evidence was all before us, and we were the jury by which that fact was to be found, and the consequence, whatever should be our verdict, would necessarily follow.

What, then, was the fact? The resolution of the Senate contained two prerequisites to the consummation of the treaty by the Indians:

1. That it, with the amendments of the Senate, should be submitted and fully and fairly explained, by a commissioner of the United States, to each of said tribes or bands, separately assembled in council.

2. That each of the said tribes or bands shall have given their free and voluntary assent to the treaty as amended.

It is admitted on all hands that the first of these prerequisites has been fully and fairly and honestly complied with; that the commissioner of the United States has submitted the amended treaty to each of the tribes or bands, separately assembled in council, and has there fully and fairly explained the same to them, according to the terms and spirit and intent of our resolution. Here, therefore, he felt at liberty to dismiss that branch of the discussion.

It only remains to determine whether the Indians have given their free and voluntary assent to the amended treaty.

Here, again, the ground is narrowed down to the Seneca band, as all admit—the President, in his message of 1839, and the Committee on Indian Affairs, in their reports at the last and present sessions of the Senate—that the assent of all the other bands has been satisfactorily given.

The majority of the committee now report that the Seneca band have not so assented, and their honorable chairman has made a most able and forcible argument to sustain that report. He did not flatter himself that he could so well deserve the attention of the Senate, or that he could discuss the question so clearly and forcibly, as he could not pretend to have made himself so thoroughly acquainted with the volume of documents to be examined. Yet he would try to maintain the opposite side of the argument, and to trespass as lightly as possible upon the patience and attention which might be extended towards him.

To establish the number of chiefs of the Seneca nation entitled to be consulted, and authorized to act, in making treaties, was first necessary. It would appear singular to those who had not examined these papers, that this should be a question of dispute even among, not the Indians simply, but among their admitted chiefs; and nothing could more forcibly demonstrate the perishing state of these unfortunate remnants of the Indian race of the North than this single fact. They have lost the number, and are ignorant of the persons, of those who are entitled to exercise the supreme power of their nation. Yet he felt authorized to assume that the real number of chiefs, or in any event the highest number which the papers would authorize us to assume, was eighty-one. This was the number assumed by the President, by the head of the Indian bureau, by the committee, and by the honorable chairman in his argument; and this was the number he should assume as the proper one to test the execution of the treaty.

It was assumed that the assent of a majority of the chiefs was requisite to constitute a valid execution of the treaty on the part of the nation, and of course that the signatures of forty-one of the eighty-one chiefs was the least number which could constitute an assent. Without admitting that the action of a majority of all these eighty-one chiefs was requisite to the formation of a valid treaty, or even that it was necessary or proper, to call for the action of a majority of all the chiefs of all grades for such a purpose, he should argue the question upon the hypothesis that the concurrence of a majority of the whole was necessary in this case; and he should do so, because he felt entire confidence that even under that rule the Senate would be able to decide that the assent of the Seneca band to the amended treaty had been obtained.

To those, however, who, with the honorable chairman, had made up their minds that the signatures of this majority of the chiefs must have been given "in council," and that any assent of a chief given elsewhere, however freely and fairly, is to be treated as a nullity, he had no argument to make. There was no pretence that a majority of the chiefs signed the amended treaty "in council;" and if that was to be held as a prerequisite to a valid execution, the assent of the Senecas had not been obtained. He did not so read, or so construe the resolution of the Senate of the 11th of June, 1838. He had before divided the resolution according to his understanding of its meaning. The amended treaty was to be "submitted, and fully and fairly explained, by a commissioner of the United States, to each of said tribes or bands, separately assembled in council." This, it is admitted on all hands, was done with all the bands, and as well with the Senecas as the others. Then each tribe or band was to give "their free and voluntary assent thereto," to render the amended treaty valid as to it.

Has the Seneca band performed this condition on its part? Have this tribe, through a majority of their chiefs, acting in or out of council, "given their free and voluntary assent" to the amended treaty?

He was happy to observe, from the argument of the honorable chairman, that there would be no substantial difference between them as to the facts connected with the assents of the Seneca chiefs, in the manner in which those assents had been given, and that the differences were as to the conclusions to be drawn from admitted facts, and as to the fairness, good faith, and validity of the conceded acts of the chiefs.

This would enable him to state the facts very concisely, and relieve him from the labor of reading tedious extracts from the reports of the commissioner, and the other papers.

It is, then, conceded that sixteen of the chiefs signed the amended treaty "in council."

The commissioner states that subsequently thirteen other chiefs affixed their signatures at his room, in the presence of General H. A. S. Dearborn, the agent appointed by the State of Massachusetts to attend the negotiations with the Seneca and Tuscarora Indians, four of which thirteen signatures were affixed by attorneys of the chiefs duly appointed and empowered to perform the act, and the remaining nine by the chiefs in person. The commissioner adds that the signatures of two other chiefs, who were too unwell to attend in council, were taken at the rooms of the chiefs, also in the presence of the Massachusetts agent; that all the fifteen chiefs who thus signed out of council, were persons who well understood the subject, and that all the signatures "were freely and voluntarily given;" that the four who signed by attorney were well known as chiefs friendly to emigration—were persons who signed the original treaty—that three of the powers of attorney were properly acknowledged before a judge of the county, and the fourth executed in his own presence, before the amended treaty was submitted for signatures in council; and that he had no doubt that all the powers were fairly obtained.

Here is shown the assent of thirty one of the eighty-one chiefs, given, sixteen in, and fifteen out of council; and these were all the signatures obtained by the commissioner from chiefs of the Senecas during his first visit to obtain the assent of the several bands to the amended treaty.

The commissioner states, in his report to the head of the Indian Bureau, that he directed the local Indian agent to keep as accurate an account as was possible of the number of chiefs attending in council from day to day, and also of the entire number of chiefs which appeared in council at any time during the negotiations, inasmuch as chiefs and warriors attended in council together, and sat together, as did also individuals of the other bands, so that it was not in his power to tell which were Seneca chiefs, any farther than the prosecution of his duties made them known to him—that the agent reported to him that not more than sixty-one chiefs of the Senecas were present in council at any one time; and he then raises the question for the decision of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, whether, the thirty-one assents obtained, being a majority of sixty-one, the whole number of chiefs present in council at any one time, the amended treaty might not be considered as sufficiently assented to on the part of the Senecas. Upon this ground only did the commissioner intimate that the assent of this band could be considered as sufficiently given.

The next fact, which seems to be material here, is given by the commissioner in the following words:

"Since I commenced this report, I have received, by mail, the written assent of five persons known by me to be recognised by the nation as chiefs. They all signed the treaty last winter. These appear to have been proved and acknowledged before Hezekiah Salisbury, a commissioner of deeds in the county of Erie, in the State of New York. He is certified to be duly commissioned as such officer by the clerk of the county. The persons who have subscribed their names as witnesses are known to me to be respectable. I have no doubt these assents were fairly given. Added to those taken in my presence, they make thirty-six in all, and are probably a majority of the whole number who attended during the council. I observe in each of these papers is incorporated a power to you and to me to add their respective names to the assent which I now hand you. Whether these powers should be exercised or not, you can best judge."

This is an extract from the report of the commissioner to the head of the Indian Bureau, made at Washington under date of the 25th of October, 1838; and it presents the further question, whether, if the thirty-one signatures, being a majority of the number of chiefs who attended council at any one time, should not be considered a sufficient assent, the thirty-six, being a majority of the whole number which appeared in council at any time, would not be so considered?

He must be permitted here to remark that his friend, the honorable chairman, criticized these suggestions of the commissioner with what appeared to him to be undue severity, when he said that the commissioner appeared to have returned to Washington for the grave purpose of submitting to the War Department the question whether thirty-one, or thirty-six, were a majority of eighty-one. The suggestions were such as he had stated, and they seemed to him to have been very properly and very sensibly made. If a vote had been taken in council, and a majority of the chiefs present had approved of the amended treaty, and then signed it, the very ground upon which the honorable chairman rests his argument would have made that a valid and satisfactory assent "in council." Was there, then, any thing very absurd or censurable in the inquiry of the commissioner, whether that same assent, given partly in council, and partly out of it, was satisfactory? and if not, whether the assent of a majority of all the chiefs who at any time appeared in the council would be sufficient? He thought not.

Upon the facts here presented, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs made his report to the Secretary of War, under date of the 29th or October, 1838, strongly questioning the sufficiency of the assent, as to the Seneca band, and, under date of the 30th of the same month, he writes to the Commissioner as follows:

"Your report and the treaty with the New York Indians, assented to as amended in the Senate of the United States, have been submitted to the Secretary of War. He is of opinion that the consent of a majority of all the Seneca chiefs must be obtained, but that, as you have heretofore met the requirement of the Senate, by full explanations to them in council, you may proceed to the Seneca reservation, and there obtain the assent of such Indians as have not heretofore given it."

Thus instructed, the Commissioner repaired again to the Seneca reservation, to perform the additional duties assigned to him. Under date of the 11th January, 1839, at Washington, he thus reports his doings to the head of the Indian Bureau:

"On the receipt of those instructions I repaired to Buffalo, New York, for the purpose of carrying them into effect. On my arrival there, I was joined by General H. A. S. Dearborn, the superintendent appointed by the Governor of Massachusetts, who continued with me until the close of my visit there. He was present and witnessed every signature to the assent, except one, which was taken while he was confined to his room by indisposition. Soon after my arrival at Buffalo, I directed the United States sub-agent, residing there, to give public notice to the Seneca chiefs that I was present, and authorized to receive the signatures of such of their chiefs as desired to give them, and that the superintendent from Massachusetts was also present to discharge the duty assigned him by the authorities of his State. After this notice, ten additional names were received to the Seneca assent, making in all forty-one. Seven of this ten had previously signed separate assents, containing powers of attorney to execute such further papers as might be necessary to give validity to their assents. These papers were all proved and acknowledged according to the usual forms under the laws of New York. Five of this number personally came before me and signed the assent attached to the treaty. The other two signed by attorney. The reasons why they did not appear and sign in person are stated in two affidavits which I hand you, marked No. 1 and No. 2. From the character of the affidavits, and information verbally communicated to me by several respectable chiefs, I have no doubt that these affidavits are strictly true."

This completed the signatures, in fact, of forty-one out of the eighty-one chiefs of this band, all but two of whom signed in person; and the two who signed by attorney, account for their doing so as is seen above. In addition to these, one chief, James Shongo, signed his assent to a printed copy of the amended treaty, before the engrossed copy was laid before the council for signatures, but did not repeat it to the written copy. Another chief, Kenjuquide, gave his assent by attorney, after the amended treaty was returned to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, as is seen by the note to his report to the Secretary of War of the 15th of January, 1839. Thus, in the manner stated, the assents of forty-three of the eighty-one Seneca chiefs were obtained.

Still it is contended that the amended treaty has not been assented to on the part of this band, and is no treaty as to them; and upon what grounds?

First. That the assents should have been given "in council," and that those not so given are not to be regarded.

He had already given his interpretation of the resolution of ratification of the Senate of the 11th of June, 1838, and had but two other remarks to add upon this point.

He would refer the Senate to page 285 of the printed documents to show, upon the authority of two members of the body, that it was not the sense of the Senate itself, at the time of the passage of the resolution of the 21 of March, 1839, that these signatures must be given "in council," as it appeared from the communications of these two Senators that an amendment to that effect was moved to that resolution, proposing to add the words "in open council," and that, upon a vote, the amendment was not adopted. He was aware that this proceeding was had in committee, that the vote was taken by a count, and not by ayes and noes, and that nothing in relation to it appeared upon the journal. He was also informed that the recollections of all the Senators who were present did not agree as to the manner in which the amendment was disposed of, some believing that it was withdrawn without a vote. He could merely say that his recollection of the offer of such an amendment was very confident, and his impressions as to the disposition of it agreed with the printed statements made by the two honorable Senators to which he had referred.

His other remark was that it was competent for the Senate, if it believed that the assent of a majority of the Seneca chiefs had been fairly, freely, and properly given, to declare such assent satisfactory, though not given in the form and manner directed, or intended, by its resolution of ratification of the 11th of June, 1838. It was upon this broad ground that he principally rested his argument, and his support of the treaty as to the Seneca band. Without discussing the question whether it was the intention of the Senate that the assents should be given "in council" or whether the language of its resolution required that construction, all must admit that but one object was to be accomplished, viz. The "free and voluntary assent" of each separate tribe or band, to the amended treaty. Now if the Senate pointed out one particular place, or manner, for expressing those assents, and the Indians chose another place, or manner, for making the same expression, will it be contended that the treaty should fall, rather than that the forms prescribed by the Senate should not be complied with, while the substance of their requisition had been met by the "free and voluntary assent" of a majority of the chiefs? This was his view of the force of the objection that the assents had not been given "in council." To him it was immaterial whether the Senate intended that the assents should be given in council, or not, as it was whether they were given in council, or out of it. The only material inquiry to him was, had the majority of the chiefs, in fact, given their "free and voluntary assent" to the amended treaty? This brought him to the next ground upon which the sufficiency of the assents was resisted.

Second. It is contended that the assents of the chiefs, who have given their assents in the manner before related, have not been "free and voluntary," but have been obtained by bribery, fraud, and improper practices.

The charges of bribery are not preferred against the commissioner, or any of the agents of the United States, but against the company which had purchased the pre-emption right to the Seneca lands from the State of Massachusetts, and against the agents of that company. It was no part of his business to defend this company, or their agents, against these, or any other charges, or to justify the practices of the one or the other, but simply to see how far those practices, whatever they may have been, should be held to invalidate the execution of this treaty on the part of the Seneca chiefs.

The direct and specific charges of bribery are based upon eight several contracts made between an agent of the pre-emption company, and that number of the Seneca chiefs, all of which contracts were in writing, signed and sealed by the respective parties, and attested by one or more witnesses. The honorable chairman of the committee, in the course of his argument, caused two of these contracts to be read to the Senate, and to save a repetition, he would remark upon them, as samples of the whole.

The first was with John Snow, a Seneca chief of the Buffalo creek reservation. This contract recites that the Pre-emption Company are desirous to promote the policy of the United States in the removal of the Indians west of the Mississippi, and also to extinguish the title to their lands in the State of New York; that, in furtherance of these objects, the company had authorized negotiations to be opened with the Indians, and offers of money to be made to them as a permanent fund for the nation and to compensate them for their improvements, and also "deemed it advisable and necessary to employ the aid, co-operation, and services of certain individuals who are able to influence the said Indians to accept of the offers so to be made to them;" that Heman B. Potter, the first party in the contract, was authorized to act for the Pre-emption Company, and to contract with individuals for their aid and influence, and that Snow, the second party to the contract, had agreed to contribute his influence and services, and, in case of the extinguishment of the Indian title by the company, to sell to them his improvements.

The parties then go on to contract; first, that Snow shall "use his best endeavors and exertions" to induce the Indians to sell their lands and remove West, and that he shall co-operate with, and on all occasions aid the company and their agents "in talks and negotiations with the chiefs and other influential men of the said tribe; and in the active application of his whole influence at councils, and confidential interviews, for the purpose of effecting a treaty between the said tribe and the said proprietors, for the extinguishment of the Indian title to the said reserved lands." Second. That Snow shall and does convey to the company his buildings and improvements upon the Indian reservations, and not, in the mean time, to lease or in any other manner dispose of the same. Third. Potter, as the agent of the company, agrees to pay to Snow the sum of two thousand dollars, within three months after notice of the ratification of a valid treaty extinguishing the Indian title to the reservations, with these conditions:

1. That if the treaty shall contain provisions to pay individual Indians for their improvements, Snow shall receive, towards the two thousand dollars agreed to be paid to him, the sum he may be entitled to receive under the treaty for improvements, and the balance only, if any, shall be paid by the company within the time limited, or as soon thereafter as it can be ascertained.

2. That if, by the provisions of the treaty, Snow shall be entitled to receive more than two thousand dollars for improvements, the company shall be discharged from the payment of any part of the two thousand dollars, and Snow shall take all that is due to him under the treaty.

3. That Snow shall be entitled to a life lease, at a nominal rent, of a lot of land actually occupied by him, and called the "Whipple Farm," the lease to be executed by the company as soon as the lands can be surveyed after the treaty, and to have reference to the survey.

This is the substance of this contract; and were all the others like it, their character and objects would admit of a more satisfactory explanation. His acquaintance with the Indians of New York enabled him to appreciate this contract. These Indians were confined within very narrow reservations, and it had long been a practice with them to lease portions of their lands to the whites for cultivation and improvement. The improvements made by themselves, or their lessees, were held to be the private and individual property of the Indian, whose right of occupancy to the land in question was admitted by the band. Hence, as a necessary consequence, when it was proposed to make a sale of lands, the first object, to those who owned improvements upon the tract proposed to be conveyed, was to secure the value of their improvements, so that they should not, with the value of the soil, pass into the common national fund. This contract showed most clearly to his mind that this was the great inducement with Snow to enter into it. By the contract, the company guaranties to him two thousand dollars for his improvements, satisfied, no doubt, that the hundred and two thousand dollars, to be paid by them for the improvements of individual Indians, would give to Snow that sum. Indeed, the contract might be suspected of intentional fraud upon the rights of Snow, as a claimant to improvements, were it not that, in case his improvements shall entitle him to a greater sum than the two thoussnd dollars stipulated to be paid, he is to have the surplus, and the company are to pay nothing.

The other contracts, however, or certainly some of them, are for the payment of money, without any reference to the title of the chief to improvements, and in this sense he did not justify or defend them. They were not, in his opinion, defensible, either in principle or policy. He did not entertain a doubt that these very contracts had done more, much more, to prevent a cordial execution of this treaty, than to promote it. The knowledge, on the part of the chiefs not contracted with, that others were deriving money for their influence in favor of the treaty, which was not offered to them, was eminently calculated to turn their minds against it, and thus to engender an opposition much more powerful than the influence purchased would be able to overcome. That such had been the practical fact in this case he found no reason to doubt, while the opposition manifested gave the strongest ground for the presumption that it had this stimulus.

It was but just, however, to say that, as gratuities to Indian chiefs, in anticipation of a treaty, these proceedings were not new in substance to these or any other Indians. Many of the present opposing chiefs of the Seneca band were now, and long had been, the recipients of annuities from this very company, given as gratuities upon the execution of former treaties. He could not say that their opposition now proceeded from the absence of similar offers to them to become the friends of the present treaty. It was fair, however, to assume that their opposition could not be founded upon the vicious principle of giving gratuities to chiefs at the time of making a treaty, as they had manifested no disposition to surrender, either to their nation or to the pre-emption company, their personal claims of that character.

It was said that these contracts were secret, and therefore fraudulent and mischievous. He believed they were novel in their character, and he did not doubt that the honorable chairman was right in saying that a parallel case had never been exhibited to the Senate; but he could not concede that the novelty consisted in the secresy of the transactions. So far from it, he apprehended that the singularity here consisted in the open publicity of the contracts, the execution of formal deeds under seal and attested by witnesses. Was it the custom of men who deliberately undertake to practise bribery, to do it in this manner? Did they usually make a deed in writing, and call witnesses to its execution? He supposed not; and it seemed to him that these facts should rather be considered evidences of a mistaken consciousness of the pursuit of a legitimate and honest object, than of a disposition to practise secret bribery. Look for the paper evidence of the gratuities which have been given upon the execution of former treaties with this band of Indians. Look for the paper evidences of claim to the annuities which are yet paid, and some of which are not only for the life of the chief, but go to his heirs. Go to those treaties: and shall we find them? No, sir, no. Shall we find deeds minutely drawn, and formally witnessed? He had heard of no such papers; and yet the annuities existed, and were regularly paid.

He must not be understood as justifying, or defending these contracts. He did not do either; but he could not see that their turpitude was to be sought for in their secresy.

He could have but one object in referring to them, and that was to determine whether they should be held to vitiate the assent in fact given by the Seneca chiefs to the amended treaty now before the Senate. That point would be made more clear by a brief reference to the chronological order of the transactions.

The first of the eight contracts bears date on the 29th of July, 1837, and the last of them on the 16th of September of the same year. The original treaty was concluded at Buffalo creek on the 15th day of January, 1838, four months after the execution of the last of these contracts. That original treaty was laid before the Senate by the President on the 13th day of April, 1838, and the amended treaty, now under consideration, was substituted for it on the 11th day of June after, and as amended was, by the resolution of this body, of which so much has been said, directed to be submitted to the Indians for their "free and voluntary assent."

The contracts to bribe, therefore, if such these contracts are to be considered, were consummated four months before the making of the original treaty with the Indians, which was formed after full negotiations with them, and the ratification of which by them, if it ever was a question with the Senate, cannot certainly be so now, after this body has acted upon it as a treaty, has amended it, has ratified it on its part as amended, and has returned it to the Indians for their assent in its amended state. No allegation was found in the papers, or had reached him from any quarter, of any attempts on the part of the pre-emption company or its agents, or of any one else, to make contracts of this sort as an inducement to the assent of the Indians to the amended treaty. Indeed, he was not now aware that charges of bribery of any sort had been preferred in relation to the assents to the amended treaty, although the charges of that character relating to the formation of the original treaty had, so far as he recollected, been principally embodied and brought forward since the amended treaty had been submitted and assented to in the manner before related.

It was fair to say that all these contracts depended upon the final ratification and confirmation of the treaty by the United States, and that therefore the interest created under them in favor of the chiefs who were parties to them, might have continued to influence their conduct in relation to the assents to the amended treaty; but, to his mind, this was giving to the charges of fraud and secresy a meliorated influence, and greatly mitigated force. The contracts were completed in September, 1837. The amended treaty was submitted for assent in the fall of 1838, and again in the summer of 1839; and if the convictions upon the minds of these chiefs of the beneficial effects of the treaty to themselves and their nation, existing in the fall of 1837, whether produced by the contracts or otherwise, remained, and continued to govern their voices and acts in 1839, two years after; and, after the existence of the contracts had become known, if a sufficient number of their associate chiefs were willing to unite with them in assenting to the amended treaty to form a majority of all the chiefs of the tribe, the conclusion can but be evident that strong and good reasons for the ratification of the treaty on the part of the Indians, independent of these contracts, must have existed, and had their influence upon the minds and feelings and action of that majority.

Were then the assents of this majority of the chiefs fairly and freely and voluntarily given?

He had remarked, at the outset, and had received universal assent to the proposition, that he should commence the discussion with the assumption that the commissioner on the part of the United States, who negotiated this treaty, stood unimpeached and unimpeachable, and that all his statements of fact were to be fully credited. He was not about to draw heavily upon his testimony in relation to this point, but a single short paragraph from his last report became necessary to corroborate the evidence of the disinterested witness he was about to call upon the stand. The commissioner says:

"In every instance where a signature was received, either General Dearborn or I distinctly inquired of the person offering to sign whether he fully understood the subject, and whether he freely and voluntarily signed the assent. In each case a distinct affirmative answer was given."

He now turned to the statements of General H. A. S. Dearborn, the agent appointed, on the part of the State of Massachusetts, for the single and only purpose of seeing that the interests and rights of the Indians were protected in every part of the negotiation. He had made the preliminary remark that this was a disinterested witness, and one whose character and fairness had been endorsed as well by the opponents as the friends of the treaty. Upon the point now under discussion, therefore, he should rely wholly upon his testimony, and he should do it with the most perfect confidence that none of his statements would be even doubted.

Before proceeding to quote his remarks, he would, to prevent confusion and misunderstanding, remind the Senate that this gentleman did not represent his State at the making of the original treaty. A citizen of Buffalo, in the State of New York, of high standing, had the honor of being deputed to represent the State upon that occasion. Complaints having been made connected with that negotiation, as had been before abundantly seen, when the amended treaty was to be submitted to the Indians, the Governor of that Commonwealth, with a just regard to his own elevated standing, to the character and responsibilities of his State, and to the rights and interests of these dependant red men, appointed General Dearborn, the adjutant general of the State, to represent it upon the occasion It was from the official reports of that officer that he should make his quotations; and he would detain the Senate by such only as were pertinent to the question whether the assents of the Seneca chiefs to the amended treaty were fairly, freely, and voluntarily given.

In his report to the Governor of Massachusetts, under date of October, 1838, at Lewiston, New York, after the thirty-one assents had been obtained, he says:

'In previous conversations, I have represented the deplorable condition of the Seneca Indians, and the reasons why I have come to the conclusion that the only chance for their reformation and continued existence as a distinct people is an immediate emigration to the mild climate and excellent tract of land offered them by the National Government; and I am perfectly satisfied, were it not for the unremitted and disingenuous exertions of a certain number of white men, who are actuated by their private interests, to induce the chiefs not to assent to the treaty, it would immediately have been approved by an immense majority.

"Not an objection or complaint has been made, by a single Indian, during the whole progress of the council, as to the price obtained for their right of possession; and I have not seen an individual, other than the persons above named, who does not think the offer of the Government a most generous and favorable one for the Indians; and who does not concur in the opinion that it is not only for their individual and national interests to remove, but that their fate will inevitably be disastrous—that they will be overwhelmed with poverty and misery, and soon become extinct, from their idle, intemperate, and other vicious habits, if they do not abandon their present position.

"The same liberal terms which have been offered to these Indians, if extended to any county in New England, would nearly depopulate it in six months"

"The conduct of the Hon. Ransom H. Gillet, the commissioner of the United States, during the whole session of the council, has been such as to merit the confidence which had been reposed in him by the General Government, and to meet my entire approbation, from the unwearied pains he has taken to fully, fairly, and clearly explain the provisions of the treaty, and present the character of the soil and climate, and the advantages which the Indians would derive from accepting the territory which is offered them beyond the Mississippi. He appeared to be solely actuated by an earnest desire to advance their interests, and induce them to comprehend the beneficent objects of the Government in making such a munificent provision for the advancement of their present and future comfort, independence, happiness, and prosperity."

This is the testimony of General Dearborn as to the first effort to obtain the assent of the Senecas to the amended treaty.

In his report to the Governor, after his second visit, when the ten additional assents were obtained, under date of the 2d of January, 1839, he says:

"I invariably asked each of the chiefs, in the presence of all the persons present, whether they were perfectly satisfied with the treaty and the contract for the sale of their right of possession to the lands on which they resided, and willingly and freely came forward to sign the treaty, and they all answered in the affirmative; and I am fully of the opinion that they have done so from an anxious desire to avail themselves of the privilege of removing into the Indian territory, west of the State of Missouri, on the liberal terms offered them by the Government of the United States, and from the conviction that the condition of the nation would become annually more deplorable, so long as they remained on their present reservations, where there was no hope of amendation in morals or the habits of industry. I sincerely believe that nearly all the other chiefs would have cheerfully given their assent, were it not for the conduct of certain white men, who are interested in the continuance of the tribe on their several reservations of Allegany river, Cattaraugus, Buffalo, and Tonawanda creeks, and the danger they apprehended from the party of a few chiefs, who, from ambitious motives and political consequence, are adverse to a change of residence, having threatened with fatal consequences such as should give their assent, as stated in my former report, and illustrated in the deposition of John Jemison, marked F. and G."

He would not take the trouble to make further extracts upon this point. He had shown that a majority of the Seneca chiefs had, in fact, assented to the amended treaty, not in council, but with a full knowledge of the instrument, and a perfect understanding of the consequences of their acts, and here was the concurring testimony of two persons, whose duty it was to know the facts and who could have no possible interest in misrepresenting them, proving that those assents were fairly, freely, and voluntarily given.

From this state of facts it would seem to him to follow as a compulsory duty, that the Senate should declare these assents satisfactory; but if this was too strong a position to occupy, and there was yet discretion left to the body, it did appear to him impossible that he should be mistaken in assuming that he had shown enough to render it fully competent, within the sound discretion of the members, to make that declaration, in case it should appear that such a result would be greatly beneficial to the Indians, to the whites among whom they were now located, and not injurious to the interests of the United States.

There was one other view of the matter, however, which he would suggest, before he proceeded to the consideration of the pecuniary interests involved in the controversy.

Hitherto he had argued the question of the execution of this treaty upon the admission that the assent of a majority of all the Seneca chiefs, of every grade, was necessary to its validity. This was an admission which he did not make, except for the sake of the argument, because it was a position in the soundness of which he did not believe. So far as his acquaintance extended, it was a new principle connected with the making of Indian treaties, by this or the State Governments; and he believed, also, that it was new to the laws and customs of the Indians themselves.

He would call the attention of the Senate to two short extracts from the report of General Dearborn, of the 2d of January, 1839, which would enable him to express his opinion upon this point in an intelligible manner. The first extract is as follows:

"There are eight clans or families in each of the tribes of the Six Nations, which are designated by the names of Beaver, Turtle, Wolf, Bear, Snipe, Deer, Hawk, and White Crane, or Heron. It is expressly prohibited by a law of the tribes for persons of the same clan to intermarry; and it is considered as immoral and irreligious as would be a union within the forbidden limits of consanguinity among the Jews and Christians; and I have been assured that an instance of such a matrimonial connection, as would be considered by the humblest Indian a wicked and monstrous indecency, has never been known."

The second said follows:

'There are eight great sachems of the tribe in the Seneca nation of Indians, who are also chiefs. It is the highest title and rank, and the office is hereditary, like that of the other chiefs. The present sachems are Little Johnson, Daniel Two Guns, Captain Pollard, James Stevenson, and George Linsley of the Buffalo creek band, Captain Strong and Blue Eyes of the Cattarangus reservation, and Jemmy John of Tonawanda, six of whom have signed the treaty. Half of them are Christians, and the others Pagans."

Now if the agent had been more particular, he would undoubtedly have told us that, of these eight sachems, or principal chiefs, one belonged to each of the eight families, or clans, of which he had before spoken, and the symbolical names of each of which he had given. He would have learned that they were the great fathers of the nation, the civil chiefs, upon whom the transaction of the business of the nation is devolved; and he, Mr. W. did not doubt that, had this treaty been negotiated with the State of New York, the signature of a majority of these sachems would have been held sufficient to have constituted it a valid treaty, and that any other signatures of chiefs of a lower grade would have been considered a mere matter of personal gratification, and not of essential substance. He had, therefore, no doubt upon his own mind, that the concurrence of six of these sachems in this amended treaty was of itself a valid execution of it, according to the laws and customs of the Seneca nation.

Still he had argued the question upon the other hypothesis, because an examination of the papers had satisfied him that a majority of all the chiefs of all grades had given an assent which the Senate must consider satisfactory.

He would now consider, as briefly as he might, the pecuniary interests of the various parties to this treaty; and,

First. The interests of the State of Massachusetts.

According to his understanding in the matter, that State had now no pecuniary interest whatever in these questions. The charters granted by the Crown of Great Britain to the colonies of Massachusetts and New York, conflicted as to boundaries, and both colonies claimed the territory west of a meridian line, passing through or near the Seneca lake, and within the present limits of the State of New York. By an amicable adjustment between the two States, in the year 1786, Massachusetts released to New York the sovereignty and governmental control over the territory, and New York surrendered to Massachusetts the right of soil, subject to the Indian title, and the right to extinguish the Indian title in her own way. Not many years after this period, Massachusetts sold to private individuals her pre-emption right to the whole country, reserving that power of guardianships over the Indians which the old States have ever exercised within their limits, and which the United States has exercised without the limits of the States, and within those limits where the right of pre-emption from the Indians belonged to this Government. In this way, and for this reason, it is that Massachusetts has been represented in all the transactions with the Seneca and Tuscarora Indians in relation to this treaty, the reservations of these lands being within the limits of her original right of pre-emption; but since the sale from her to individuals, under whom the present pre-emption company hold, he did not understand that the State had any other interest than the duty remaining upon her, as a Government, to see that the rights of the Indians were fairly and faithfully protected.

Second. The interests of the pre-emption company.

The interests of this company would be seen from what had been said in relation to the connection of the State of Massachusetts with this matter. As purchasers from that State, they hold the exclusive right to extinguish the Indian title, whenever the Indians shall be induced to surrender the possession and occupancy of the lands. By virtue of that right, they have already extinguished the Indian title to an extensive and fertile country, and the present treaty proposes to complete the operation, by the extinguishment of that title to all which remains, being about 116,000 acres.

The interests of this company are direct and palpable. The purchase from Massachusetts was made in 1796 or 1797, and so far as these lands are concerned, the purchase money paid to that State has been unproductive capital to the company from that day to the present time. It is abundantly shown, too, that the present reservations are constantly becoming less valuable, by being stripped of their timber, which, in their natural state, constituted the chief value of two or three of them. This consideration renders it a matter of direct interest to the company to extinguish the Indian title, and obtain the actual possession at the earliest practicable day.

As much had been said of the vast speculation which this company would make by the ratification of this treaty, he had taken some pains to form an opinion upon that point, and had therefore endeavored to ascertain what had been paid to the State of Massachusetts for the right to extinguish the Indian title. As nearly as he could learn, from the documents which had come within his reach, about three hundred thousand pounds, New England currrency, equal to about $1,200,000, had been paid for the whole purchase, and that somewhere from four to five millions of acres of land were covered by the purchase. He therefore concluded that the price paid to Massachusetts for the right of pre-emption from the Indians, say in 1797, must have been somewhere from twenty-five to thirty cents per acre. He had not taken the pains to make a calculation to see what, at a fair rate of investment, that price would bring the cost of the land to at this period, but when added to the $212,000, or thereabouts, now to be paid, and the gratuities which have been and are to be given in case the treaty be finally ratified, he had satisfied himself that the speculation of the company would be much less than had been imagined, and that a prudent man, who had the money, would pause before he would take the property off their hands at principal, interest, and costs.

Still the interests of this company were nothing to him. It was not their advantage which he felt called upon to consult, or which induced him to urge the ratification of the treaty. As constituents of his, as he believed most of them were, and as highly respectable individuals, so far as he knew them, he would, as far as lay in his power, do them justice upon this as upon all occasions, but he would not urge this treaty upon the Senate, to the detriment of the Indians, because this company might be benefited by its ratification, as he certainly would not vote for its rejection to the detriment of the Indians, for fear this company might profit from its operation.

Third. The interests of the State of New York and her citizens.

The State, as such, had no interest in this question, separate from the interests of the citizens to be affected by the continuance or removal of the Indians. The extent of these interests would be best shown by brief statistical statements,

The Senecas are scattered through the six counties of Allegany, Cattaraugus, Chautauque, Erie, Genesee, and Orleans. This band of Indians, together with the Onondagas and Cayugas, who reside with them upon their reservations, number 2,623 souls, and the white population of the counties in which they are, as shown by the State census of 1835, was 244,144 souls.

The Onondagas at Onondaga number 300 souls, and are in the county of their name, which had at the same period a white population of 60,908 souls.

The Oneidas at Oneida are 620 souls, and are in the county of their name, with a white population of 77,518 souls.

The American party of the St. Regis number 350 souls, and are in the counties of St. Lawrence and Franklin, with a white population of 54,548 souls.

The Tuscaroras number 273 souls, and are in the country of Niagara, which has a white population of 24,490 souls.

The Stockbridges, Munsees, and Brothertowns, so far as they remain in New York, are scattered among the other bands, and number, together, 709 souls.

Thus it will be seen that all these bands and remnants of tribes of Indians are scattered through eleven counties of the State; that they number, altogether, 4,885 souls, and that the white population of the counties in which they are, was, in 1835, as shown by the State census, 461,608 souls, or almost 100 whites to 1 Indian.

From this it will be seen that nothing like apprehension from the presence of these Indians can be felt by the whites; that the inconvenience of the reservations to the white settlements, in many cases, the desire to bring into profitable settlement and cultivation the lands they occupy, and the injurious effects upon society, in all cases, and with both races, of familiar intercourse between them, are the prominent interests which the citizens and State of New York have in the ratification of this treaty. To the city and town of Buffalo, immediately bordering upon one of the largest and most populous of the Seneca reservations, and the city and town containing a white population of full 20,000 souls, this question was one of more deep and pervading interest, as it was also, properly considered, to the Indians residing upon that reservation. But he believed he should be justified by the fact, if he were to say that, even in the counties where these Indians are, the strong feeling for their preservation from the accumulated evils which surround them, and which, it is seen, are rapidly producing their extinction, creates a deeper interest with the whites for their removal to the Indian country, than any considerations of convenience or property anticipated from the accomplishment of that object.

Fourth. The interests of the United States.

Much of the debate had turned upon this point; and he was bound to confess that he thought it the strongest ground upon which the treaty could be resisted. Yet he hoped to show that even this ground of resistance was not well taken; and for that purpose he would recur to the facts in the case touching the national Treasury.

He had before remarked that the small sums to be paid to the various bands amounted to about twenty thousand dollars, and that the general payment stipulated to be made to all the bands, in a proportion per capita as they should remove west, was four hundred thousand dollars. These payments together, would be about four hundred and twenty thousand dollars, but of the whole sum he did not believe an amount exceeding ten thousand dollars would be called for during the present year. Such was the condition of all these Indians, that he did not suppose it possible that any considerable proportion of them, if even a single Indian, could remove, after this advanced period of the spring, and after the appropriations under the treaty could be made. Of the sums payable to the vairious bands, he recollected but one sum of one thousand dollars to the St. Regis, which was payable before removal, and that sum was not required to be paid until the expiration of one year from the final ratification of the treaty. The immediate demand upon the Treasury, therefore, was not to alarm any one; but the ultimate payment was considerable: and how was the Treasury to be compensated for it? This was the essential inquiry; and if it could be satisfactorily answered, he hoped this objection to the treaty would be considered obviated.

The answer, then, was, that the first article of the treaty cedes to the United States the tract of land owned by these bands of Indians at Green Bay, in the Territory of Wiskonsin, being 435,000 acres. At the present minimum price of the Government, for the public domain, this land will bring into the Treasury $543,750, while its location upon the Fox river, and its quality, are said to give it peculiar prominence, and to ensure its instant sale for immediate settlement. He thought it, therefore, fair to anticipate, in case of a prompt survey and sale, that this land would bring into the Treasury all the money required to carry the treaty into effect as soon and as rapidly as it would be wanted, and would afford a surplus more than equal to the expenses of the survey and sale.

To this extent, therefore, no argument against the treaty was to be drawn from the demands it would create upon the public Treasury. Another argument had been used, however, having the same tendency, which required examination. It was that the country stipulated to be given to these Indians west, was more than an equivalent for their Green Bay lands, inasmuch as three hundred and twenty acres for each soul was given in lieu of one hundred.

The answer to this was, that the country west was a part of that great country west of the States which the United States, in the prosecution of a wise and humane policy towards the remaining Indian tribes, have set apart for their permanent and peaceful and undisturbed homes, and for the appropriation of which forever to that object the faith of the nation has been most solemnly pledged. It was wholly immaterial, therefore, in a pecuniary sense, what Indians should occupy any particular portion of this territory. The whole was set apart for Indian occupancy; and in no treaty heretofore made with any Indians in the Union, with a view to their removal to the Indian country west of the Mississippi, had the value of that portion of that country to be assigned to them been taken into the account, or made a matter of estimate, in the purchase from them of their possessions within the States. This country had been set apart from the extensive domain of the Union, as a home for the red men, whom the cupidity of the whites had driven from the homes and hunting grounds of their fathers, and many of whom had not, for this cause, like many of these remnants of bands yet lingering in New York, any country to exchange for that quiet home thus offered to them. The policy, therefore, had been to purchase their possessions and pay the estimated value of them, independently of the new country to be assigned to them; and he believed, if the treaties were carefully examined, it would further appear that the expenses of their removal, and their subsistence for one year at their new homes, had been paid from the public Treasury, over and above the value of the lands purchased from them. Not so in this case. The value of the lands purchased was not problematical. They were already in the middle of a settled and rapidly settling country. Their quality was well known, and their location of the most desirable character, and yet at the minimum price of the Government lands they would bring more than a hundred thousand dollars beyond every sum to be paid under the provisions of the treaty. Nay, they would bring into the Treasury more money than was to be paid under the treaty, and the cost to the United States of the country to be given to the Indians west besides.

Was this treaty, then, to be rejected on account of its unfavorable influence upon the pecuniary interests of the United States? He trusted not.

There was another view of this point which would place the interests of the United States in a very different light. It was admitted on all hands that the treaty had been assented to, and was perfect and binding as to all the bands except the Senecas. It had been before seen that the Green Bay lands were the property of the New York Indians generally and equally. A portion of those lands, equal to 65,000 acres, had been, by a late treaty, granted in severalty to that portion of the Oneidas now at Green Bay, and they had ceased to be any longer parties to this treaty. The quantity of land remaining was 435,000 acres, the common property of all the bands, this portion of the Oneidas only excepted. The population of all the bands, as given in the schedule annexed to the treaty, and forming part of it, was 5,485 souls. Deduct the Oneidas at Green Bay, 600 souls, and there would remain a population of 4,885, owning the 435,000 acres of land. Of this population the Senecas and the Onondagas, and Cayugas, residing upon their reservations, numbered 2,633. These taken from the 4,885 would leave 2,252, as to whom the treaty was admitted to be ratified and perfect. Now the right of all these Indians in the Green Bay lands is a common, undivided right; and if, therefore, the treaty be not confirmed as to the Senecas, the United States will be the owner of the 2 252 shares in common with the Senecas, who will remain the owners of the 2,633 shares, the whole being in common and undivided, and the common interests of all the proprietors being in and to every part. The United States, therefore, will be unable to realize any thing for their interest, because they can neither convey nor give title to a single separate foot of the land.

Still, by the last article of the treaty, the United States must pay that proportion of the $400,000, which 2,258 bears to 2,633, because as to the 2,252 Indians the treaty is perfect. In other words, the United States must advance the gratuities to the small bands, amounting to $20,000, and must pay about half of the $400,000, and will have, as a compensation for these payments, a common and undivided right with the Senecas to about one half of the Green Bay lands, a right of which it cannot avail itself for any useful purpose whatever, while thus held in common with the Indians. On the contrary, confirm the treaty as to the Senecas, as it is confirmed as to the other bands, and the right to the Green Bay lands becomes perfect, and the Treasury will be fully indemnified for all the payments required to be made under the treaty.

Could any thing more be required to show the true pecuniary interests of the United States to be favorable to the confirmation of the treaty? It was due to the Territory of Wiskonson, too, if within the fair exercise of the powers of the Senate, that these Green Bay lands, within the immediate neighborhood of one of its most important trading towns, should be disencumbered and opened for a market and for settlement. This was an interest of the United States which could not be disregarded, whether it was looked at in reference to the sale of our other lands there, or to our duty towards the present inhabitants of that territory.

Last and most important. The interests of the Indians, parties to the treaty.

In a pecuniary sense these interests are clear, strong, and decided. They are, altogether, 4,885 souls, and they are to receive from the pre-emption company about $212,000 in money, and from the United States about $420,000 more, and at their new homes, secure from the encroachments of the whites, 320 acres of land to each soul, man, woman, and child, of all the bands. All this they are to have in addition to the annuities which they now annually receive from the United States and from the State of New York, and which are to be regularly paid to them by an express stipulation of the treaty. These annuities together cannot fall short of the sum of $20,000, and are believed to exceed that amount. Then all, or nearly all the bands, except the Senecas and Tuscaroras, have lands to sell to the State of New York, and for which, by the long established practice of the State, they will receive the full appraised value in money, or in permanent annuities, as they shall choose.

Was ever an entire community so rich as these Indians will be in lands and money? Well has General Dearborn said:

"The same liberal terms which have been offered to these Indians, if extended to any county in New England, would nearly depopulate it in six months."

If such are the clear and strong advantages to the Indians pecuniarily from this treaty, what are they to expect from the change proposed in their physi cal and moral condition? It was only necessary to look back to the days of the American Revolution, to answer this inquiry. Then the New York Indians were the mighty Iroquois, an enemy almost as terrible to our Revolutionary fathers as the civilized enemy with whom they were contending. Even in a divided state, and with one of their strongest bands, the Oneida, arrayed upon the side of the patriots in that glorious contest, the five remaining allied bands held our arms at bay for years, and rather advanced upon, than were driven from, the settlements, though opposed by some of our most brave and skilful generals. Some sixty or seventy years have passed, and now the New York Indians are the miserable, scattered remnants of these powerful nations, and also of the St. Regis, the Stockbridge, the Brothertown, and the Munsee tribes, and numbering in all less than five thousand souls. Some of the bands of the Six Nations have entirely disappeared, and others are reduced to a few families, and have no home but such as they enjoy from the generosity of their allied neighbors. The same generous attachment to their race has given a home among the Six Nations to the Stockbridges from Massachusetts, the Brothertowns from Rhode Island and Connecticut, and the Munsees from Pennsylvania, from the Wyoming country, all the remnants of once powerful Indian nations, driven from their lands and their homes by the (to them) desolating march of civilization, and having not where to rest their feet, until our faithful allies, the Oneidas, tendered them a resting place and a home in their country.

What has produced this startling change in these hardy children of nature, within the short space allotted to the life of a single man? The answer stares us in the face. Not war, nor pestilence, nor famine, but the friendly touch of the white man! The progress, not of arms against them, but of settlements and civilization around them. Look at the Senecas. They constitute a moiety of all the Indians now in New York. In the war of 1812, '15, they numbered their thousand warriors, and sent them to the field, led by the gallant Frasier, to strengthen our army upon the frontiers, and within the territory of the enemy. Where now are those thousand warriors of the Senecas? Did that war reduce their number? No, sir: peace and friendly intercourse with us has done it; and already that thousand has become reduced to four hundred, if not within that number.

He spoke from a statement given to him by two intelligent chiefs of the nation. The statement was too long to trouble the Senate with, but it gave a history of the perishing condition of that people, which could not fail to move all to their relief. They were perishing from their contact with the whites; while so far from improving from the civilization around and among them, they are, as a people, worse fed, worse clad, and worse provided, than they were when they had never seen a white man. The labors of philanthropists have been sedulously performed among portions of this tribe for a series of years, without being able to arrest their downward and rapid march towards complete extinction. While some are made wiser and better by their white associates, a vastly larger number are made more idle and more vicious.

The paper before him gives a description of the state of society upon the Buffalo creek reservation, produced by the proximity of the large and populous town of Buffalo, which cannot be read without pain and loathing. Superadded to all the other vices which have never failed to be imparted to the Indian from association with our cities, seduction and prostitution of the Indian females are said to have become frightfully common; and that the most dreadful of all the consequences of pollution of this sort has reached the tribe, and is rapidly spreading itself among this portion of it. Thus a scourge, more deadly and fatal than any other which has ever afflicted the Indian—a scourge unknown to the natives until the white man was known—is sweeping over this small remnant of the once proud Seneca nation, sowing the seeds of a slow and miserable and lingering death around the germs of life. The statement before him expressed the confident belief that a majority of the children born alive in the nation die within the age of twelve months, many from exposure, from want of proper nourishment and ordinary comforts, from the carelessness of parents, and not a few from disease inherited from the mother.

He would not, he could not, dwell upon this picture; and yet there are those whose mistaken sympathy would hold these people where they are, to perish under the load of vice which surrounds them, pervades their society in every form, and is sweeping them into the grave with unexampled rapidity. Not so with him. He would change their condition. He would remove them from the contamination which surrounds and is overwhelming them. He would place them where they may again be Indians; where they may again have the motives before them of ambition, of enterprise, of pleasure, of profit, which stimulate the Indian; and where, secure from the encroachments of the whites; they may again become independent and free and virtuous.

But, Mr. President, said Mr. W. reject this treaty; combine, as you will then combine, the cupidity of the pre-emption company with that of the white settlers, who now surround them, and, from interest, resist the company, and the execution of this treaty; for the common object of both is gain from the Indians, and from their lands; and when they find that a division of interest defeats either, a combination may be easily formed which will favor both. I say accomplish this, and then what will be the condition of the New York Indians? How long will they be able to withstand a combination of interests so strong and so strongly wielded? They cannot withstand it, sir; and a few years will show you their history in that of the Stockbridges, the Brothertowns and the Munsees. They will be found miserable wanderers among their red brethren in some remote part of the country, without a home, or the means to procure one; without the comforts of life, or provision for their future support, their members but a fraction of the present population, and their last hope buried with the last council fire which burned upon those reservations they have been compelled to abandon to their white neighbors to avoid perfect extinction.

May I not hope I have succeeded in proving that it is within the power of the Senate to declare the assents of the Senecas to this treaty satisfactory, and thus to save them from a fate so certain and so sad?

SPEECH OF MR. CLAY,
OF ALABAMA.

Senate, Thursday, April, 16, 1840.—The "bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," approved June 22d, 1838, having been taken up for consideration, and the amendments, reported by the Committee on the Public Lands, having been adopted by the Senate,

Mr. NORVELL, in obedience to the instructions of the same committee, moved, by way of further amendment, the following additional section:

"SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the 'act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands,' approved June 22d, 1838, be, and the same is hereby continued in full force till the 22d day of June, 1842; and the right of pre-emption, under its provisions, shall be, and hereby is, extended to all settlers on the public lands, at the date of this act, with the same exceptions, whether general or special, and subject to all the limitations and conditions contained in the above recited act, and with the explanatory provisions of the preceding sections of this act."

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said, as he had introduced the original bill, he would take occasion to explain its objects and effects, together with the amendment last proposed, in all of which he most cordially and fully concurred. He said the principles of the policy had been so often discussed, and were so well understood, that he would not detain the Senate by a formal argument in their support; he should principally confine himself to a mere statement of the effect and operation of the different provisions, and a few facts drawn from the General Land Office, showing the results of the late pre-emption law, now proposed to be revived and extended.

Mr. C. then proceeded to state that much of the public land had been settled and improved, at the passage of the act of 22d June, 1838, which had not then been surveyed. Consequently, settlers, not knowing the boundaries of the different sections, and quarter sections, had not had it in their power to confine their improvements within a single tract; but, when the lines were run, they frequently found their dwellings upon one quarter section, when their farms or plantations were wholly on another. By the late law, the right of pre-emption was restricted to those who occupied by personal residence; and under its operation, the settler would be confined to the quarter section, on which his cabin happened to be situated, and cut off from all his most valuable improvements. To those who were acquainted with the mode of building in a new country, the hardship of the case would at once be apparent; and, he said, he could assure those who were not, that the dwellings of those settlers of the wilderness were real "log cabins," in many instances not worth twenty dollars, while the opening the farm, building the fences, and reducing wild land to a state of cultivation, had cost much hard labor and expense. It was to remedy such hardships, arising under the law as it stood, that the first section of the bill provided "that in all cases when a settler on the public lands may reside, or have his dwelling house, upon one quarter section, and cultivate land on another and different quarter section, such settler may make his election, under the act to which this is a supplement, to enter either of said quarter sections, or legal subdivisions of each, so as not to exceed one quarter section in all."

Mr. C. said it was obviously the intention of Congress to give the settler the right of securing his improvements, which were the foundation of the privilege granted by the act; and it was manifest that without the provision contained in this section, that intention would be defeated, or, at all events, the settler, in many instances, would lose his most valuable improvements.

Again, said Mr. C. under the law of 1838, as it is construed, however much time, labor, or money, a man may have expended, in making an improvement upon the public land, if he had rented it to another for a limited period, under a contract entitling him to possession at the end of the term, but was not "personally residing thereon" at the passage of the act, and for "four months next preceding," he would lose his privilege of pre-emption. Indeed, he said, as he understood the construction placed upon the law, in such a case, neither the lessor nor lessee would obtain a pre-emption. Mr. C. said this was another case of hardship and injustice not foreseen at the passage of the law, and brought about by introducing the words, "by personal residence thereon," just before the engrossment of the bill, and without maturely weighing their effect. Now, in the case stated, the meritorious consideration had been performed by the lessor; he had encountered the hardships and privations of going into a wilderness, felling the forest, reducing it to cultivation, and rendering it productive, making roads, and facilitating the sale of the public domain—is it just that such a man shall be deprived of his privilege of pre-emption, because he happened, at the passage of the act, and for a short time previous, to be out of personal possession? He said he persuaded himself that every Senator would respond in the negative. At all events the Government had received the consideration of the privilege granted to others—an improvement had been made, and facilities afforded for the settlement of the country. Some person was entitled to a pre-emption—either the man who made the improvement, or the one who was in possession at the passage of the act, and for four months preceding. Mr. C. thought the man who had first settled, and who had, by his own labor, built the cabins, cleared the land, and fenced it, was the more meritorious claimant of the two, and he had, therefore, framed the bill with that view. He said, moreover, it was conformable to the spirit and principles of the common law, which held a lessee estopped to gainsay the title or right of his landlord. But it would be for the Senate to say which was entitled; and however they might decide, he should endeavor, as his habit was, to acquiesce with as good a grace as possible. If the friends of the measure preferred it, the bill might be so modified, as to permit the lessor and lessee to enter the quarter section jointly, and divide it between them. He thought it apparent that some such provision was necessary to carry out the beneficent purposes of the act; and if the section should be deemed imperfect in the form it stood, he hoped it would not be wholly rejected or stricken out, but modified, and passed in some better shape.

The third section, Mr. C. said, was intended to provide for another class of settlers, whose rights had not been properly considered or provided for in the original act. Large portions of the public domain, settled at its passage, had not then been surveyed. Consequently, no one could know on what particular section he was expending his labor. When the surveys were made—which had not been done in Alabama until within a few months past—many of the settlers found themselves on sixteenth sections, which all knew had been reserved by the compacts with the new States, on their admission into the Union, for the support of township schools. This section of the bill was intended to relieve, to some extent, such as were so deprived of the benefits of the law, by authorizing them "to enter at the minimum price any other quarter section of the public lands, lying in the same land district, to which no other person has the right of pre-emption, on making satisfactory proof of his or her residence as aforesaid, on such sixteenth section, before the register and receiver of the land office of said district"

Mr. C. said there was no new principle contained in this section; laws had been repeatedly passed extending the same privilege to those who had lost their improvements under like circumstances. Laws had been passed at former sessions for a number of years, extending the right of pre-emption (in some instances even making donations) to those who had been deprived of the opportunity of securing their improvements, by grants of the land on which they had settled to an Indian tribe, as well as for other purposes. With this privilege, he said, the individual lost all the labor he had bestowed on his original settlement, and got nothing in return, except protection from speculators: this section would enable him to purchase a new home at the minimum price, without encountering the hazards of a sale at auction.

The fourth section merely extended the same privilege to settlers "on any public land, before its selection by any State, for the purposes of a seminary of learning, under any act of Congress authorizing such selection," &c. What he had said of the justice and expediency of section three was equally applicable to this section, and need not be repeated. He thought every provision to which he had called the attention of the Senate, went to remedy manifest defects in the pre-emption law of June 1838, and was indispensable to give it a fair and equal operation; hence he could expect little opposition from any quarter.

Mr. C. then proceeded to remark upon the amendment offered by his friend from Michigan, [Mr. NORVELL,] with the sanction, and under the instructions, of the Committee on the Public Lands. It was intended as an additional section, to continue in force the act of June 22d, 1838, for two years beyond its present limitation, which was the 22d of June next.

Mr. C. maintained that experience had fully established the policy, as well as the justice, of the pre-emption system. To those who had turned their attention to the history of the last ten years, no argument was necessary to establish this position. He said he regretted, however, that Senators did not more generally examine the documents upon this subject which had from time to time been laid upon their desks, and become more familiar with the facts they developed. He knew that it was not in the power of every gentleman, consistently with other, and perhaps more pressing, duties, to devote sufficient time to the examination of this subject; and he would therefore detain the Senate by the statement of a few facts, shown by those documents, which he thought should be satisfactory to every mind. He would give such references as would enable Senators to test his accuracy, and detect any error he might inadvertently commit.

Mr. C. said it would be recollected that, in January, 1838, the Commissioner of the General Land Office had made a report, exhibiting a very full view of the results of the cash system, for selling the public lands, from its commencement in 1820, up to the last of September, 1837. Amongst other things, that report showed the quantity of public lands offered for sale, the quantity sold, the amount paid by purchasers, and the average price per acre of the lands sold in each year, for the whole period he had mentioned. The general average price of the whole quantity sold during nearly eighteen years, was but $1 27.4-5 per acre; nor was this result produced by the pre-emption laws, as the document referred to abundantly proved. He said, for the first ten years of the cash system, there was no pre-emption law, except some special acts of very limited operation. The first general pre-emption law was passed on the 29th May, 1830, and the report of the Commissioner showed that the average price of several preceding years was lower than that before stated, as the result of the whole period. For instance, in 1824, the last year of President Monroe's administration, the average price of all the land sold was but $1 27 per acre. Again: for all the lands sold in 1828 and 1829, the last two years of President J. Q. Adams's administration, and the two years immediately preceding the enactment of the first general pre-emption law, the average price was but $1 26 per acre for each year. The following year, (1830,) and the first of the pre emption system, the average price continued at $1 26 per acre; and it had never been as low, except one year afterwards, up to September, 1837, inclusive. Now, said Mr. C. these facts prove conclusively that the right of pre-emption, as it existed, almost uninterruptedly, for the first eight years, did not reduce the average price of the public lands, nor diminish the receipts into the Treasury.

But, said Mr. C. for my own satisfaction, and that of others, I was desirous to test the system still further; and therefore called on the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in January last, to furnish me a statement, exhibiting results under the pre-emption law, now in force, which went into operation on the 22d June, 1838. It had then been in operation more than nineteen months. The total number of acres sold during that period, at auction and by private entry, was 6,952,644—producing the eggregate sum of $8,773,002 10—at the average price of $1 26.18 per acre. Gentlemen will please to bear in mind, said Mr. C. that these sales occurred during the period of as much embarrasment as our country has ever known; when the banks were crippled, and contractions of their circulation and discounts continually going on; and the whole of those seven millions of dollars (to speak in round numbers) paid in gold and silver, except, perhaps, a very small proportion in Treasury notes. Yet, he said, the general average was a fraction higher than that of the two prosperous years of 1828 and 1829, before the enactment of the first law that ever gave a general preference to settlers.

To pursue the statement of the Commissioner still further—for he said he was disposed to give a fair and candid view of the subject in all its bearings—it appeared that the aggregate quantity of land sold at auction was but 1,875,854 acres; and taking the auction sales exclusively, the average price was but $1 29.38 per acre. Mr. C. said the same statement showed the whole amount paid by pre-emptors was $941,214 13—consequently, the whole quantity of land sold under the present law, granting pre-emption rights, was but 752,972 acres—less than one-half the quantity sold at auction, and less than one-sixth of the quantity purchased by private entry. Yet, he said, estimating the purchasers to average one for every 80 acre tract, (but they were doubtless more numerous,) and the number would be 9,412 purchasers under the pre-emption law—he had no doubt they might safely be put down at ten thousand, in round numbers.

Now, said Mr. C. here are 10,000 freemen—poor, but honest; hardy, industrious, and enterprising citizens, who have been protected against the frauds, impositions, and exactions of bands of heartless speculators, and secured in the just enjoyment of the improvements wrought out in the wilderness, by the labor of their own hads. Can it be possible that an American statesman can be found willing to withhold this shield of protection from these bold and enterprising pioneers, who have so often proven, by their courage and patriotism, that they they constitute a cordon of impregnable defence for our extensive inland frontier? Is there an individual of any description, who regards the welfare of his fellow-man, who, for the paltry difference of one or two cents an acre, would be willing to jeopard the security and welfare of ten thousand families, and perhaps break up and disperse them in search of new homes in the wilderness, or compel them to become tenants and humble dependants upon wealthy landlords? He said Senators would answer these questions by their votes; he could not anticipate that any one would, with such facts before them, deny the settler the privilege of pre-emption.

Another reason for continuing the pre-emption law in force, as proposed by the last amendment, (Mr. C. said) was that large tracts of country, settled at the passage of the act, were not then surveyed, nor had they been until very recently. This was especially the case as regarded the Cherokee country of Alabama, which had been very recently surveyed, and the township plats not yet returned to the General Land Office. He was assured that the same might be said as to other parts of the country. In all such instances the settlers would have too little time to make their proof, and enter and pay for their lands before the law would expire. There could be no objection to extending the operation of the act, when it was recollected that the President could fix a period to the indulgence in three months, at any time he might think proper to issue his proclamation for the sale of the lands in any district; for by the terms of the law, if the settler did not make satisfactory proof of his right, and enter and pay for his quarter section, before the day appointed for its sale at auction, he lost his privilege.

Mr. C. said, in regard to so much of the section as extended the right of pre-emption to those who might be settlers at the passage of the act, he thought enough had been said to prove that the Government would lose nothing, even in a pecuniary point of view; in other respects much would be saved. Without the protection of such a law, combinations of speculators, who always attended sales at auction, would buy the improvement of the settler over his head, and compel him to pay for the increased value he had given the land by his own labor, or abandon the home he had selected and cherished. The Government would gain nothing. The settler, with his limited means, would be deterred from entering into competition with large capitalists, at auction; conscious of his inability for such a contest, he would stand by and see his land bid off by the speculator, at the minimum price, or little above it, and perhaps submit to the extortion of an enormous profit, sooner than remove with his family. Would this benefit the Government? By no means. On the contrary, it lessened the little capital, and crippled the energies of the cultivator of the soil; its tendency was to retard the improvement of the country, and lessen its resources. Such a policy seemed to Mr. C. as unwise as it would be unfeeling.

Mr. C. said there was one class of settlers in the State which he had the honor in part to represent, who would be embraced by the amendment under consideration, if adopted, and whose claims, he thought, would be recognised by almost any Western man. He alluded to a considerable number, perhaps several hundred, in the territory acquired under the late treaty with the Cherokees, who had been settlers before the passage of the pre-emption law of 1838, but lost their rights by temporary absence. They were brave and generous men, impelled by patriotism and sympathy for their suffering fellow-citizens in Florida, who had volunteered their services for six months, in the fall of 1837, in a regiment raised in that part of Alabama, and were absent fighting the battles of their country with the Seminoles, until after the four months next preceding the passage of the pre-emption law, had more than half expired. They could not come forward and swear, nor get any other person to swear for them, that they were "actual settlers" of a quarter section of the public land, "by personal residence thereon, at the time of the passage of the act, and for four months next preceding;" consequently, meritorious as all must admit them to be, they would lose the protection of the law, and be turned over to the tender mercies of the speculator. Is there a man who would refuse the protecting shield of a pre-emption law to such a citizen?

Mr. C. said he had given the case of those brave and patriotic men by way of illustration. There were doubtless many analogous cases; for, when did their country need the services of such men, in the West, or the Southwest, that hundreds and thousands, if necessary, did not rally at her call, and freely peril life and fortune in her defence? For such men we ask the privilege of pre-emption, to the limited extent of one quarter section, at the minimum price, not as a donation, but at the same price which you receive from others. Will the Government of their country deny it to them? The fate of this bill will answer the question.

SPEECH OF MR. VANDERPOEL,

OF NEW YORK,

In the House of Representatives, in Committee of the Whole, March 19, 1840—On the bill authorizing the issue of five millions of dollars of Treasury notes.

Mr. VANDERPOEL said: He most cordially reciprocated the sentiment of joy expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] that the House was now about to enter upon the business of the country. He wished, in connection with this feeling, he could indulge the hope that the courteous tone, the parliamentary and conciliatory manner with which that gentleman had discussed the subject before this committee, were an earnest of the spirit with which debates would hereafter be conducted here. Then would we have the agreeable assurance that this hall was no longer to be a stage for the display of party virulence, but a place where gentlemen meet to deliberate impartially upon the momentous interests of a great nation. Yes; he hoped our future progress here would prove that we have, in truth and good earnest, entered upon the business of the country—that we are content to let President-making alone for a while, instead of using every subject, great or small, as a hook on which to suspend speeches for that purpose—that the cacoethes loquendi which had so sorely afflicted the other side of the House, would abate of its violence. Let the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DUNCAN] continue the diary which amused and instructed us so much a few months ago, showing the comparative number of Whig and Democratic speeches with which our precious time had been absorbed; let the majority on this floor, within this week, for the first time clearly established, be intent on action rather than on talking, and thus avoid the responsibility incident to the undue protraction of the session, and the neglect of the public business. As yet we have done comparatively nothing. Nearly four months of the session have already elapsed, and in what way have we advanced the interests of those who sent us here? All who have any practical knowledge of legislation, are well aware that it is in the power of minorities to prevent, or, at all events, to stave off, definitive and efficient action. Interminable speeches, and constant calls of yeas and nays, are expedients to which, driven to desperation, they ever resort, for purposes of annoyance, if not with the hope of defeating favorite measures of the majority. Whether recourse had been had to such means here, and for any exceptionable purpose, it was not his (Mr. V's) province to say. He would let close observers of our past and future proceedings, and the diary of the gentleman from Ohio, respond to this point.

It was with great reluctance that he now laid a claim to a share of the attention of the House. His connection with the committee which reported the bill under consideration, was his apology for obtruding himself upon it, at this time. He felt no interest or solicitude in regard to the bill, that should not be common to every gentleman who wished to see the hitherto unsuspected credit of this Government preserved; to see all its lawful engagements faithfully met and promptly fulfilled. In the remarks he intended to submit, he would not feel called upon, or even authorized, to take that uncircumscribed range in which the gentlemen of the Opposition, that had preceded him, had seen fit to indulge. As an humble member of the committee that had reported the bill, he deemed it most compatible with his duty to confine himself to the subject on the chairman's table. With that subject, the Florida war, the Specie Circular, the American system, the Sub-Treasury bill, the life and adventures of General Harrison, Amos Kendall, the favored Ohio newspapers, had not, as he could perceive, any legitimate connection; and therefore he would take the liberty of waiving, for the present, the discussion of any of those favorite topics. They had been pressed into the service, not with the view of affecting the vote of the bill under consideration, but in the hope that they would exert an influence on the great issue to be tried in November next.

Should the friends of the Administration undertake to answer all the long diatribes daily uttered against it, it would be vain to think of transacting any public business, of executing any of the duties that devolve upon us here, not as President makers, but as law makers. I have long thought, however, that there is a consoling, a labor-saving consideration connected with the extreme impetuosity with which our adversaries are pushing the battle; and it is this; that this eternal hue and cry at all times, and on all occasions, against the Administration, carries its own antidote with it; that these everlasting denunciations have become harmless from their very extravagance and frequency; that this host of alarmists which is always vociferating "wolf, wolf," will scarcely be able to gain credence, or excite alarm, when the real rabid animal makes his appearance. To scold is "their vocation," sir; and let us not, my Democratic friends, like them, here constantly entrench upon the province of old women; our cause does not require this dereliction of our higher and more appropriate duties.

The bill proposes to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue five millions of dollars of Treasury notes. The measure was recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, and supported by a majority of the Committee of Ways and Means, on the supposition that the resources for the whole year would probably be sufficient to cover the necessary appropriations for the year; but that it was necessary thus to anticipate the revenue that would fall due towards its close, as the larger payments will be required in the spring, whereas the larger receipts will probably come in during the latter part of the year. The object of the bill, then, is to provide for a deficiency that may possibly occur in the earlier part of the year, in the hope that enough will be derived from ordinary sources, in the latter part, to cover the amount proposed to be raised. This is the length and breadth of the bill, in the discussion of which, every topic has been introduced which gentlemen imagined could have the remotest bearing upon the the great Presidential contest, upon which they have so furiously entered. Ruin, ruin—the old battle cry of panic makers and bank advocates—is again rung through our ears. I confess, sir, I am not a little disappointed that it is not an octave or two higher than it was during the memorable panic war of 1834; but the ill success with which it was then echoed and re-echoed by this same party through the land, has, perhaps, served as an admonition to them not again to dole out with too much confidence their hypocritical jeremiads over the alleged downfall of the country. Sir, it is the old song of that old enemy, which the true friends of the nation have met, and as often discomfited, in every guise and every form; a party, which has been truly said only to rise as its country sinks. Upon the strength and merit of their own principles they can never hope, they have not, in their recent struggles, attempted, to succeed. Their only hope is to rise into power over the prostrate interests of their country, believing that the great masses of the people have not sense or sagacity enough to perceive and understand the true causes of those temporary reverses that occasionally overtake communities, nations, and individuals.

Gentlemen have a very summary way of disposing of the point, that most of our great interests are now in a very depressed condition. They tell us very flippantly that the past policy of the Administration has produced our low prices; and calculate upon the ignorance of the people, their inability to perceive the truth, to gain credence to their unfounded assertions. This low estimate of the good sense and sagacity of the people has always been a distinguishing trait in the character of that party, which, under every name and every flag, has so long struggled to put down the Democracy of the country. They believe that the people can be tickled with a straw or charmed with a rattle, and therefore invariably approach them with catching words and clap-trap experiments, instead of appealing to their sound reason and sober judgment. It is, sir, in accordance with this spirit of their nature and constitution, that they now imagine, that the senseless cry of "log cabin and hard cider" will gain more proselytes to their cause than frank and honest expositions of their political principles. But what renders this expedient the more contemptible, is the fact, that in this instance, it has not the least justification in truth. It is no disparagement to their candidate that he inhabits a princely mansion on the Ohio; that he can boast a splendid income and a correspondent style of living; facts which every gentleman here full well knows; but it is an insult to the American people to violate the truth for the purpose of recommending to them a candidate for the highest office in their gift, on the ground that he lives in a log cabin and drinks hard cider.

Let us return, sir, to the distress which now pervades our country. Let us inquire into its causes, and see who are the authors of the calamities which the people are now suffering. I grant, sir, that the prices of every species of property are comparatively low—lower than they have been for several years past; but I challenge gentlemen to show any legitimate connection between this depression of prices and any measures of this or the past Administration of the General Government. Sir, I assert, and can show that this depression has resulted from causes for which the past and present Administrations are not only not responsible, but which, while they have ever found favor with the Opposition, have always encountered the hostility of that great party which now is, and has for the last twelve years been, in the ascendant. Before I advert to these causes, I will venture a single question, to which the public mind, at least, if not this House, will give a most ready response. Suppose the Independent Treasury bill had, last year, or two years ago, become a law; is there a doubt that that party which defeated its passage would now have ascribed the present depression of prices and stagnation of business, exclusively to that measure? Sir, they would not have permitted us to look at any other cause; we would have been told, in most lugubrious accents, that the banks had all been crippled, not by their own mad and imprudent career, but by the alarming measures of the Government; that they had been obliged to draw in their circulation, contract the currency, and refuse further aid to the community, because the Government was constantly drawing from them their specie. The hard money policy of the Government, carried into practical operation, would then have been said to have destroyed all the suspended banks; then, instead of eulogies on log cabins and hard cider, anathemas against the diabolical Sub-Treasury would have been the order of the day. Does any gentleman here doubt this? But the Sub-Treasury has not yet become a law; the banks themselves do not pretend that the public revenues of the country have been collected in a manner calculated to operate oppressively upon them; they have suffered no persecution or molestation from the Government, and yet all the evils and disasters that Whig illiberality and mendacity would have charged to the Independent Treasury, had it passed into a law, have overtaken us; the banks of more than half the Union have suspended specie payments; they have contracted their circulation from the highest point of expansion to the extremest ebb of contraction; prices have fallen in proportion to the diminution of the currency. Commerce, agriculture, manufactures, in short, every interest is suffering, and yet no Sub-Treasury law has been enacted. No such scape-goat for the bitter fruits of Whig measures and Whig policy has yet been created. He as cordially hoped, as he confidently believed, that the Independent Treasury bill would become a law before the termination of this session of Congress. Now was the time to give it a fair trial—now that the interests of the country were thus depressed, that confidence was destroyed, and now that all men, save utterly reckless politicians, regarded some restraining power upon the mad spirit of speculation and gambling which had brought us to the present crisis, an object of indispensable necessity. Had it passed a year ago, it could not have arrested the downward tendency of things, then in full progress. The disease was too deeply rooted to yield to any reasonable remedies. We may hope that it has now nearly run its course, and it surely behooves us to adopt some expedient calculated to prevent the recurrence of such severe and convulsing maladies. That the Independent Treasury plan is the most efficacious one within our constitutional province, I may possibly undertake to demonstrate, when that measure shall fairly come before us.

Sir, it has long been with me a source of the most profound regret, to perceive the facility with which some men attribute every pecuniary pressure that overtakes the country, every visitation of misfortune, to the Government. With such men, Government seems to be every thing; the industry, enterprise, and frugality of the citizen, nothing. If famine or pestilence should stalk through the land; if unpropitious seasons should prevent the earth from yielding its accustomed fruit; such men would be wicked and fool-hardy enough to attribute the suffering consequent upon such calamities, even to the bungling and mismanagement of the Government. This disposition is of recent origin; it is coeval with modern Federal, National Republican, National Bank Whigery, and well accords with the principles of a party which believes that it is the province of Government, at least, to make the rich richer, if not the poor poorer. One great distinguishing feature between the two great parties of our country, is their comparative estimate not only of the powers, but of the duties of Government. The modern Whig believes that Government should do every thing; that it should be the great agent in augmenting the wealth of individuals, and promoting the prosperity of the country. The Democrat believes that Government should not be too intermeddling and obtrusive; that when it has protected the citizen in the pursuit of his honest industry, it has performed its main office; in short, that the least government, consistent with the enjoyment of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, the better. The despot pushes his Government into all the ramified interests of his subjects. The Federal Whig looks to, or worships it as the source, the dispenser of special favors and exclusive privileges to the few; the Democrat fears, that when that which was instituted merely for the protection of all, and at the expense of all, becomes to be generally regarded as the means of working wealth to the community, the Republican spirit, the true conservative principle of our institutions, is on the wane, inasmuch as the citizen begins to recognise other engines of wealth than talent, industry, frugality, and enterprise.

I come now, sir, directly to the question, what has produced the expansion and contraction of prices which we have witnessed within the last seven years? Are the fluctuations and revulsions from which so many interests are now suffering, chargeable to the policy of the past and present Administrations? I take issue with gentlemen, and say that not one of their acts is obnoxious to such censure; but that the main and primary cause of these events may be found in the desperate doings of that huge moneyed power, with which, a short time ago, our country was overshadowed. I mean, sir, the main cause, so far as purely domestic influences are concerned in this matter; for as the distress which has overtaken us pervades the whole commercial world, and particularly those parts of it with which our interests are so closely interwoven, it would be wrong to attribute our present disasters to causes that have peculiarly or mainly originated at home. It is well to remark that these disasters are not confined to our own country; and it is equally well to remark, that they have attained their greatest height in those countries where the most paper money is tolerated. We rank first in this particular—next to us, England.

The smallest note of the Bank of England is five pounds sterling, equal to about twenty-three dollars; and the smallest note of the Bank of France is five hundred francs, equal to one hundred dollars. The consequence is, that as to all sums under those amounts, the channels of circulation are filled with gold and silver, the value of which never fluctuates. It is fixed and certain over the whole world. For all the ordinary every day purposes of life, then, the currency of France, and even England, is gold and silver. Paper is only used for larger and more extraordinary transactions. What is the consequence? Prices are more fixed and permanent than with us, because the medium by which the value of commodities is measured is more fixed and permanent. What is the state of things in regard to currency here? Our currency is chiefly paper; yes, paper to the denomination of bills of a single dollar! We are, in truth, the most perfectly shinplastered nation on earth; and our prices, in consequence, are ever varying, ever fluctuating. Sometimes your banks throw out their issues freely; and then at once, under the influence of panic, or other causes, they suddenly contract them. I need not stop to dilate upon the effect of these constantly recurring contractions and expansions. The most superficial observer must perceive, that the standard by which the value of property is measured is constantly varying. At one time your yardstick was six feet long; at another, only two feet Mr. V. said he had long foreseen this depression of prices. He had warned many of his neighbors of it three years ago; he had admonished them not to run heavily in debt for lands, at the prices then demanded; that the banks were extended to their utmost tension; that the natural laws of trade, in the absence of all other causes, would soon compel them to curtail; that the prices of every article would consequently fall, as paper money diminished; and that it was utterly impossible to maintain any thing like permanency in the value of property, without a larger infusion of the precious metals into our circulation. Let the present state of things tell whether my predictions have been verified.

A word more, sir, as to the domestic causes of the distress from which the great interests of our country are now suffering. Who, that has paid due attention to the progress of events within the last seven years, can doubt that these causes have been mainly overbanking and overtrading, and the struggle made by the United States Bank to force the country into its recharter. Let us retrace the past a little: Those who had acted with him here, during the panic session of 1834, need not be reminded of the lamentations and petitions then constantly poured into our ears. The public deposites had been removed from the Bank of the United States, and placed in certain State banks. The former, with all its minions and dependants, at once raised the cry that the "Great Regulator" must contract its loans and issues to the detriment of all the great interests of the country, unless the public deposites were restored to her. Petitions from every quarter poured in upon us to restore the deposites. The mammoth Bank, under pretence of self-preservation, was constantly turning the screw and drawing from all sides the most piteous notes of distress. This hall, sir, was, for seven long months, a huge panic factory, where, day after day, materials of alarm were produced, and thence sent forth to the people. We were told by the Bank and its friends, here and elsewhere, that the restoration of the deposites was the only real panacea for the evils that afflicted us; that without it, the Bank must curtail and compel the State banks to curtail, until bankruptcy and ruin would overwhelm the whole country. The State banks took the alarm and contracted their issues to a point well calculated to aggravate the general dismay. Sir, the panic war was waged with a determination and vigor which those who were engaged in resisting it will not soon forget. Congress adjourned, and the object for which that war was declared, was not attained. We, who had for seven months stood the fire of bank artillery, returned to our homes in the month of July, 1834, with the belief that it was at least shorn of its capability for further mischief. We had hardly reached our homes, sir, when our eyes were astounded with a letter to a committee of New York merchants, informing them that the Bank could now loan many millions of dollars! this same Bank, which, for the preceding seven months, while waging a panic war against Congress and the country, had pretended to be obliged, in self-defence, to curtail its issues and distress the community. It began to extend according to its promise, and the State banks, as the gamesters would say, "followed suit." In the state of fear, which had so recently seized the latter, they had not the courage to expand, without the example of her who claimed the power of controlling them and of regulating the currency of the country. She sat the pernicious example and they followed it. All at once, the land was flooded with paper money, and with it came all its concomitants of high, unnatural prices, a mad spirit of speculation, a general disposition to secure wealth by a single operation, instead of delving and working for it for years, as our fathers had been accustomed to do. Your public domain was at once the object of unprecedented speculation; town and city lots were sold by the foot in places formed and doomed by nature for nought but the everlasting abode of the frog and the alligator; importations swelled from one hundred and eight millions of dollars in 1833, to one hundred and ninety millions in 1836; the proceeds from the sales of the public lands swelled from about four millions of dollars annually, to more than twenty-four millions in 1836; the prices of land, produce, necessaries of life, every thing was inflated to a point it had never attained before. All were rushing forward under the highest and most feverish excitement, and amid the extragance and intoxication of fancied wealth, how few looked deeply enough into causes to see that all this prosperity was evanescent and illusory! The fruit of this overaction was an immense surplus revenue; this was deposited with the State banks and formed the basis of further loans and expansions, which again served as the aliments of further extravagance and speculation. President Jackson attempted, in some measure, to arrest the mad career which the community was then running, by causing the famous circular to be issued in 1836, which provided that nothing but gold and silver should be received at the land offices in payment for public lands. It had a restaining and most salutary influence, as candid men of every party now concede. But have any of us forgotten the torrents of abuse heaped upon his head for that measure? In 1836, you passed an act to distribute among the States, or, as was said, deposite" with the States, the immense surplus raised by means of this pernicious paper expansion, and the spirit of speculation consequent thereon. The fund you thus ordered to be distributed, had been deposited with the banks, and the banks had loaned it to the people, and now called upon their debtors for it; the latter were taken by surprise, as they had invested it in Government lands, or city lots. The speculators could not pay the banks, and the banks could not promptly pay the Government, and the consequence, so much to be deplored, was a suspension of specie payment by every bank in the Union. The policy and legislatien of some of the States forced them to a speedy resumption. The Bank of the United States had recently procured a charter from the State of Pennsylvania; on the acceptance of which its president boasted that it was stronger than it had ever been before. It was, of course, more efficient than it had ever been, either for good or for evil. If able to regu ate the currency in by-gone days, it was still mo e competent for this purpose now, were its ability to be determined by its boasted strength. It could not, or it would not, prevent a suspension, and was by no means the first to return to resumption. In 1838 the banks again resumed; and the Bank of the United States, instead of exering a restraining and a salutary influence upon the minor institutions, entere i the field of speculation, and attempted to control the cotton market of the world. The price of cotton was raised to a point much higher than it would have attained, but for the factitious means which served to inflate it. Many of the Southern banks, under the lead of the "Great Regulator," also rushed forward in this career of speculation; and what was the finale of all these strange proceedings? That which now stares you in the face—another suspension of specie payments by the banks of more than half of the Union—the Bank of the United States having been the first, er among the first, to perpetrate this second act of mischief and insolvency. The banks of New York and New England resolved to maintain specie payments; but in order to execute this laudable determination, they were obliged to con'ract their circulation; and to show how effectually they have done this, it is only necessary to state that in three months the safety fund banks of New York reduced their circulation twenty millions of dollars. With this contraction, this diminution of paper money, prices have declined to a point below an actual specie standard; produce of every de:cription has fallen in value at least fifty per cent.; the hopes of the farmer, the merchant, and the manufacturer, have been disappointed; and yet I challenge gentlemen to show that the Government has been instrumental in bringing about this state of things. The true cause of the present revulsion, sir, is the overactions and overissues of the banks, twice led on, instead of being restrained, by that stupendous engine with which your modern Whigs have ever been so ready to identify their political fortunes. There she lies: behold her as she is, prostra'e and distrusted, if not bankrupt. Do you, gentlemen, still cling to her as the safe regulator of the currency of the country? Yes, you are wedded to her by acts of past affiliation and affection too strong to be able, with good grace, now to shake her off. She will stick to you like the fabled shirt of Nessus. She is the author and finisher of the mischief you would now fain attribute to the past and present Administrations. Vain and futile is this attempt to charge us with the distress that prevails. The peop'e of this country understand where the truth lies. They know what is the disease we are now suffering, and the causes of it. They know that the country has been drunk with too large draughts of paper money, and that it is now only suffering the pain and depression that ever follows over excitement and intoxication.

Sir, said Mr. V. I have been thus diverted from the main purpose for which I rose, by the effort that has been made to show that the necessity that renders the power to "issue Treasury notes expedient, is the result of mismanagement or "experiments;" as they are usually termed, of the present or past Administration of the General Government. I now propose to enter directly upon a vindication of the bill under consideration. It has been contended with much earnestness on the other side, that the President and Secretary of the Treasury have not treated us fairly—that they did not, at the commencement of the session, tell us what the Government would probably want, and what was the real state of the Treasury—in short, that they mystified or concealed the truth. With all due deference to gentlemen who had advanced this position, he would show, from the message of the President and the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that both had most pointedly and emphatically called our attention to the subject upon which we are now legislating. The copious extracts from the Secretary's annual report, made by the chairman of the Ways and Means, [Mr. JONES of Virginia,] would save him (Mr. V.) the necessity of reading many passages from that able document, to which he would otherwise have called the attention of this committee:

In the annual message of the President, we find the following language:

"The precautionary measures which will be recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, to protect faithfully the public credit under the fluctuations and contingencies to which our receipts and expenditures are exposed, and especially in a commercial crisis like the present, are commended to your early consideration."

In order to ascertain what are these "precautionary measures," you need only refer to that part of the report of the Secretary, which may be found under the head, "On some permanent safeguard under fluctuations in receipts and expenditures." Three pages of that able paper are devoted to this subject, and conclude by calling our earliest attention to legislation upon it. It is due to that able and faithful public officer, that I read a few extracts from his report. In page 11, he says:

"Much has at times been wisely done by Congress to supply means for meeting unexpected deficiencies. But all legal provisions heretofore adopted for that purpose having expired, our financial operations will be constantly exposed to danger, unless some permanent safeguard, under contingencies, is established.

"These circumstances must constitute an apology for once more explaining some of the grounds in favor of such a measure, and earnestly asking speedy legislation concerning it.

"The principal sources of our present revenue are sensibly affected by the fluctuations, not only in commercial prosperity, but in the crops, the banking policy, and credit systems, of even foreign nations. The influence of these causes seems to become yearly more changeable and more uncertain in its extent."

After showing the fluctuations in the receipts in past years, the Secretary farther remarks:

"All these, and similar considerations in favor of some permanent provision on this subject, apply with still greater force than they have heretofore. The available balance in the Treasury to facilitate its operations is much smaller than has formerly been usual. The receipts on the debts still due from the banks after two previous disappointments as to some of them, must be regarded with increased doubt; and if they should be paid within the year, the outstanding Treasury notes become redeemable in the first half of it, and must be discharged some months before the bond of the United States Bank falls due, in September."

At page 13, he continues:

"Why, then, should not a constant safeguard, or some permanent remedy, under such irregularities, be provided? The omission to do this can hardly be considered the true check on extragant expenditures, as that check would seem to consist rather in a forbearance to make unnecessary appropriations, than in a refusal to provide ample means for paying with promptitude, under all possible contingencies, what has already been appropriated, and has thus received the deliberate sanction of Congress. The national pride, no less than its honor and credit, appears to be concerned in adopting some measure on this subject, stable, efficient, creditable to free institution, and possessing a paramount influence to preserve unspotted the public faith."

In conclusion, under this head, he observes:

"The Department therefore is now without any resort, temporary or permanent, in case of material deficiencies; and considering all the circumstances before mentioned, with the dangerous liability in case to have the whole of the outstanding Treasury notes paid in at any moment for public dues, without a power remaining to issue others in their stead; considering also the present revulsions in the commercial world, which affect so seriously the receipts from both duties and lands; considering the disasters which are befalling the banks, and rendering our collected funds in some cases wholly unavailable, and the advances necessary to be soon made for the large payments of pensions and Treasury notes falling due in March, the earliest attention to new legislation on this subject, seems highly prudent, if not indispensable, for the effectual security of the public credit."

How can gentlemen, in view of these remarks, contend that the attention of Congress was not seasonably called to this subject? The Secretary not only told us at the commencement of the session, that some provision ought to be made to meet contingencies, but enforced this declaration with an elaborate and powerful train of reasoning.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] asks why the Committee of Ways and Means did not act earlier upon this subject, if they in truth believed that the President and Secretary of the Treasury were sufficiently explicit. He asks, why wait till after the Secretary of Treasury had sent in his supplemental report, which was communicated to this House on the 15th of February. The answer to this inquiry is a very easy one. There is a standing rule of this House requiring the Committee of Ways and Means, within thirty days after their appointment, to report the general appropriation bills for the civil and diplomatic expenses of Government; for the army, for the navy, and for the Indian Department, and Indian annuities. It will be recollected that by reason of the contested New Jersey seats, this House was not organized, by the election of a SPEAKER, till the sixteenth of December; that the standing committees were not announced till the 27th day of December, and that not a single petition was referred till the fourth day of January last. The Committee of Ways and Means was not, (in consequence of the absence of the chairman, and other of its members,) convened till January had somewhat advanced; and those who acted with me on the committee will bear testimony to the fact, that during the first thirty days after our appointment, our whole time and attention were devoted to, and engrossed by, those appropriation bills, which the positive mandate of a standing rule of the House compelled us to report at once. The President informs us that he had caused the estimates for the present year to be subjected to the severest scrutiny; and I can assure gentlemen, that the Committee of Ways and Means, in reference to the appropriation bills they have reported, have partaken of the spirit of economy evinced by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury. Far from acting upon the principle of taking every thing they found in the estimates for granted, they have subjected them all to a pretty rigid scrutiny. May not these facts serve as abundant reasons for the delay of which the gentleman complains?

It is then, sir, most palpable, that some provision to enable the fiscal department of your Government to meet the inequalities in the receipts and expenditures of the whole year is necessary, and that the necessity for such provision was brought to our view by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report. No gentleman has, as yet, differed from the Secretary in the opinion that relief of some kind is necessary. The only ground hitherto urged by the other side of the House is, that the relief proposed by the bill will not be adequate to the exigencies of the Government; that the deficit will not only be larg r than the Secretary apprehends, but that it will be permanent. To this, Mr. V. said, he would only respond, that in legislating on a subject of this description, he would not oppose his own opinion to that of an officer whose business it was to understand, not only the probable wants of the Government, but to form an estimate of what would be its probable receipts within the year; and if he had given too flattering a view of our prospects; if, indeed, it should prove to be necessary hereafter to make some provision for a permanent deficiency, all he (Mr. V.) would now say was, that "sufficient unto the day was the evil thereof." It would be time enough to provide for such an exigency, when it should become more palpable than it yet seemed to him. He would here take occasion to remark that he rejoiced at the sentiment so generally expressed by all sides of the House, that the necessary supplies must be furnished to the Government. He was, indeed, glad to see how universal was the feeling that her faith must be preserved; that her integrity and fidelity to her engagements must always be above suspicion. Sad and disastrous upon the credit, not only of itself, but of the States, would be the effect of a failure on the part of this Government, to meet its lawful engagements. He need hardly say that such a deplorable calamity would prostrate the credit of all the States, and contribute much towards making Republican institutions "a scorn and a by-word" among the nations of the earth. God grant that such a calamity might never befal us; that national faith and national integrity, nay, more, that State faith and State integrity, might ever ride in safety and triumph even over the bitter and agitated waters of party. He hoped never to see the day when any one of the States of this Confederacy should consummate her disgrace by repudiating her own solemn engagements.

If it be conceded that some relief is necessary to the Treasury Department, to enable it to meet inequalities in the receip's and expenditures of the whole year, the next question which naturally arises is, what is the best way of attaining that relief? One of three modes must be chosen. You must issue Treasury notes, negotiate a loan, or increase your tariff of duties. The Secretary of the Treasury asks relief on the assumption that the appropriations will not exceed the estimates. That these have been brought down to the lowest standard consistent with the healthful action of the Government, all candid and intelligent men will feel disposed to admit, who will look at them carefully. A remedy cannot, therefore, be sought in a reduction of the public expenditures below these very reasonable estimates. Will you, then, first increase your tariff? A sufficient objection to such a mode of proceeding is, that any relief derivable from this source would not be seasonable. The emergency, if any, is a pressing one, and could not be relieved by the tardy returns that would flow from an increase of duties. You could not, sir, without violating good faith, impose additional duties upon goods, orders for which would have been forwarded before you would have passed a law to that effect. But, apart from this objection, I will here take occasion to say that I am opposed to any interference with the tariff that would conflict with the principles of the compromise act. I would vote for a duty on wines and silks beyond the Cape of Good Hope. These are mere luxuries, and are therefore the more appropriate subjects of taxation. They enter only into the consumption of the rich, and to tax them, and proportionably relieve articles that enter into the consumption of all, would be relieving the laboring and poorer classes. This I would do, as a permanent means of raising revenue, but not for the purpose of securing the relief which the bill under consideration contemplates. We are, therefore, in my opinion, driven either to a loan, or to the aid resulting from the power to issue Treasury notes.

Secondly, then, will you resort to a LOAN? I mean a permanent loan, by issuing stock? I concur in the sentiment of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. JONES.] in regarding a national debt as any thing but a national blessing. There are gentlemen among us who deem otherwise—who esteem, and ever have esteemed, a national debt a great desideratum. I will not say that the preference they now indicate for a loan, results from this early and constitutional predilection. A national debt is indeed a blessing to the few, but a curse to the many. It is a blessing to brokers, stockjobbers, and unwieldy capitalists, who despise almost any security, short of the plighted faith of the Government. It may prove a blessing, too, to the few who wish to grow rich on special protection and special favoritism; but to the great working middling classes, who are never the recipients of special legislative favors, to them, I repeat, a national debt is any thing but a national blessing. Sir, we have, for the last few years, exhibited to the world a proud spectacle—one which cannot but do much towards advancing the great cause of Republican government. I mean, of course, the spectacle of a great nation free from debt. Who would not hesitate to mar its beauty, by replunging into that state to which monarchies and despotisms seem ever doomed, and from which we have just emerged. Nothing but the most imperious necessity would justify us in again contracting a national debt. I take it for granted, at all events, that a loan, as a general rule, is only justifiable when there is a clear deficit of means, which it will require some very considerable time to supply. If the estimates or conjectures of the Secretary of the Treasury be true, that the receipts of the whole year will be equal to the expenditures of the whole year, and that some means by which the revenue of the latter part of the year may be anticipated is all that is now necessary, it would surely be preposterous to resort to a loan at the present period. What would be the course of a discreet individual under similar circumstances? Suppose he owed a thousand dollars, which would become due at the beginning of the year, with a certainty that he would receive, from his own resources, more than that amount before the termination of the year; would he not raise his money on his own note rather than effect a permanent loan and mortgage his property? Why should Government adopt a different course of action? But these considerations do not furnish the only objections to a permanent loan. You are told, and you have no reason to doubt, that the relief you now need will, in all probability, be required only for a single year. You could not effect a loan by issuing stock redeemable within one, or even two years, without agreeing to pay very high interest. Capitalists will not otherwise invest in stocks redeemable within so short a period. If you negotiate a loan, you will be subjected to very heavy charges for commissions and agencies. These you avoid by adopting Treasury notes; for I am informed by good authority, that on the nineteen millions of dollars of Treasury notes issued since the special session of 1837, not a farthing has been paid for agencies or commissions. Another disadvantage attending a loan is this: if you effect it, you must make one transaction of it; you must get all your money at once; thus paying interest for the greater proportion long before you are in want of it. Not so in regard to Treasury notes. Your Secretary of the Treasury would issue them according to his wants; thus avoiding the payment of interest for money borrowed in the absence of immediate necessity. The average interest on the Treasury notes issued since 1837 has not exceed four per cent. per annum, and this only from the periods at which the notes were actually issued. But a still stronger objection to a loan—one that should weigh more with Southern gentlemen, surely—yet remains to be told. By originating a national debt in the shape of a permanent loan, you create the germ for another protective tariff: and I am not a little surprised that a proposition to create such a debt should come from the South, from the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. KING,] who has introduced an amendment to the bill, by which he substituted a loan in the place of the power to issue Treasury notes. Had such a proposition come from Boston, or Lowell, Mr. V. said, he would have thought it all very natural, because pretexts for high tariffs and protecting duties are there the order of the day; but it really appeared strange, "passing strange," to him, that one of the representatives of the cotton growing portion of the Union should propose the creation of a new and permanent national debt. How true it was, that wonders would never cease. It is not a little strange, too, that it did not occur to the gentleman from Georgia that a loan would fall exclusively into the hands of Northern or European capitalists; whereas Treasury notes would be to the South, as well as to all other sections of the country, a new medium of exchange and remittance.

Should you decide against contracting a loan and creating a new national debt, my third alternative alone remains—that of issuing Treasury notes; but here, in the first place, a constitutional difficulty is urged against us. It is contended that these Treasury notes are bills of credit, and that as such, Congress has no constitutional power to issue them.

Sir, (said Mr. V.) I consider it rather late in the day to urge this objection. The power to issue Treasury notes has been exercised, from time to time, and has received the sanction of the wisest men of the nation, and the strictest constructionists of the Constitution. Without it, you could not have carried on your last war with Great Britain. But, with great deference to gentlemen who now raise this obstacle, I will very briefly attempt to show, both from intrinsic and extrinsic evidence, that it is utterly groundless. The Constitution, in the enumeration of powers conferred on Congress, expressly provides that Congress shall have power "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." Here is no prohibition of the power to issue Treasury notes. Not so, however, in regard to the States. The same Constitution provides, that "no State shall emit bills of credit;" but as to this Government, there is no inhibition in the Constitution. I think it clearly follows from this, that the power to issue Treasury or Government notes is involved in the power to borrow money. The most familiar principle of reason and common sense teaches us, that if Congress have the power to create a debt, (a power expressly given,) a power, from necessity, results to give to the lender the evidence of that debt, either in a note, bond, or certificate of stock. The power to borrow would be nugatory, unless the power to give the evidence of such borrowing followed. But we are not altogether left to implication upon this point. The same section of the Constitution which confers upon Congress the power "to borrow money," also gives it the power to provide for "the punishment of counterfeiting the securities of the United States." What securities? Does the Constitution any where prescribe the form of security to be given by Congress, when it exercises this clearly expressed power of borrowing money? Surely not. Why is a note on interest more objectionable, or rather unconstitutional, than a certificate of a stock bearing interest? Without the provision for punishing counterfeiters of Government securities, and without the prohibition to the States to issue bills of credit, the power to issue Treasury notes would have clearly resulted from the power to borrow money; but when the clause conferring the power to borrow money is viewed in connection with the other provisions of the Constitution to which I have adverted, there surely remains no ground to doubt the existence of the power to issue notes. I protest against the inference, that I am an advocate of the doctrine of "implied powers;" still when I read in the same Constitution which gives the power to issue Treasury notes, an express power to "make all laws that shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers expressed in the instrument," I surely cannot be deemed very heretical for contending that the power to give a note, or other evidence of debt, "is necessary and proper" for carrying into effect the power to borrow money.

But it is contended that the power to issue Treasury notes was expressly denied by the convention which framed the Constitution; and reference has been made to the Madison papers, recently published, to show that the power to emit bills of credit was stricken out of a section of the Constitution as originally reported. Sir, I do not admit that Treasury notes, bearing an interest, are "bills of credit," in the sense of the Constitution. The bills of credit, the issuing of which Congress prohibited to the States, were nothing more nor less than paper money—such as your continental money—from which the people had sustained such ruinous losses and sacrifices under the old confederation. Treasury notes do not enter into general circulation as money. They never have done so. At all events, it has never yet been my fortune to see one; and from the debates of the convention, as reported by Mr. Madison, it expressly appears that the most prominent members of the convention, who voted to strike out the clause, "and emit bills on the credit of the United States," admitted that if this clause were stricken out, the power to issue notes was involved in the power to borrow. Gouveneur Morris moved to strike out the clause, "and emit bills on the credit of the United States," and remarked that "striking out the words will leave room still for notes of a responsible minister, which will do all the good, without the mischief." Mr. Gorham was for striking out, without inserting any prohibition. "If, said he, the words stand, they may suggest and lead to the measure." He further remarked: "The power to issue notes, as far as it is necessary or safe, is involved in the power to borrow money." But this is not all. In a note by Mr. Madison, which may be found in the third volume, page 1343 of his papers, in reference to the vote to strike out the clause, "and emit bills on the credit of the United States," he remarks, (the vote being nine States to two:)

"This vote in the affirmative by Virginia was occasioned by the acquiescence of Mr. Madison, who became satisfied that striking out the words would not disable the Government from the use of public notes, as far as they could be safe and proper, and would only cut off the pretext for a paper currency, and particularly for making the bills a tender, either for public or private debts."

Thus, sir, it clearly appears, that the vote to strike out the words "and emit bills on the credit of the United States" was given on the supposition that the power to issue notes would still be left to the Government, but that the delegation of an express power to do so would only have the effect of suggesting and leading to the measure unnecessarily. Mr. V. said, he now considered the argument in favor of the power to issue Treasury notes complete, brief as it was. He would proceed to submit a few additional considerations for preferring Treasury notes to a permanent loan, or rather, to answer one or two objections urged against this mode of borrowing money.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] tells us, that these notes will be means of subjecting the Government creditor to losses and sacrifices, inasmuch as the Government will pay him with them, and then he will be shaved. This certainly has not been the case with the notes that have been issued, nor would it be the case with those that would be issued under this act. The public creditor had never been compelled to take them; but, it is a well known fact, that they have generally been preferred to specie. You and I, Mr. Chairman, would prefer pocketing a few of them any day, to carrying home specie, if, contrary to our usual ill luck, an unexpected balance of our pay should remain at the end of the session. But the gentleman says that they will serve to aggravate the distress, by sucking up all the surplus capital in our commercial cities. This, sir, rather conflicts with his former position. If it be true that they will be a favorite investment for capitalists, it must be on acccount of their intrinsic excellence, and then, surely, there can be no danger that the public creditor will be shaved. Instead of aggravating, they will go far, very far, towards relieving the distress; for they will be used for purposes of remittance and exchange, and will draw from the banks and force into circulation large sums hoarded there. Why should these notes now be such a bugbear? Within the last three years, you have authorized the issuing of twenty millions of dollars of them; nineteen millions have actually been issued; and on the 3d of March, instant, only $2,100,000 of this sum were out and unredeemed. Have not all your expectations in regard to them been realized? If they have been redeemed, it has been done by the revenues of the Government. You anticipated your revenues. They came in afterwards, and you redeemed your notes. Suppose that, in 1837, instead of issuing your notes, you had resorted to a permanent loan, and created a stock; think you that any portion of that loan would now have been paid. No, sir. It would only have been the nucleus around which a pretty formidable national debt would, by this time, have been formed. Instead of applying those resources your Secretary has applied to keeping you out of debt, it would then, no doubt, have been found most convenient to have paid merely the interest on the loan, and to have lavished them on objects of doubtful utility. The public expenditure would not then have been reduced five millions of dollars within the last year. Plans and expedients to advance the interests of speculators, in the name of public improvements, would not then have been defeated; and here I cannot but hazard the opinion, that if, in 1837, when your means were locked up in the the deposite, non-specie paying, banks, the friends of the Administration had proposed a loan, instead of a resort to Treasury notes, such a proposition would have encountered the severest opposition of those very gentlemen who now object to the present mode of relief; you would then have heard from the other quarter of the House, the same arguments we now urge against a national debt. So unreasonable, sir, is this spirit of opposition! Sir, there is a great facility here in some quarters to speak cavalierly of the Secretary of the Treasury. Great injustice is often done that gentleman. I regard him as a most diligent, faithful, and able public officer; one who has carried the finances of the country through difficulties and embarrassments, resulting from bank abuses and suspensions that would have disheartened a spirit less active and persevering. Why should he be obnoxious to censure, because he asks the relief provided for by the bill? No Government in Europe deems it practicable always to fulfil its engagements with promptitude, without some resource to meet the contingency of a fluctuating revenue. The power to issue exchequer bills in England, may be said to be a perpetual power with the fiscal department of the Governments. Indeed, Parliament hardly ever adjourns without conferring this power, though her revenues, from the nature of their sources, are less fluctuating than ours. Revenue depending chiefly on customs, must necessarily be fluctuating, as it is liable to be influenced by all the revulsions and vicissidudes of trade and commerce. The exchequer bills of England are funded, after floating for some length of time. Last year bills to the amount of four millions of pounds sterling were funded, and this year it is apprehended that there will be a deficit in the Treasury of England of six millions of pounds, in consequence of causes that could not have been foreseen. The war with China is, perhaps, the most prominent of these causes; as this operates in two ways. It occasions a loss, by the diminished importations of teas, and increases the naval and military expenditures for the year. Even here, sir, we have had a resource to meet the contingency of a fluctuating revenue until within the last two years. Our national debt was not extinguished till 1835. Before that time we raised much more revenue than was necessary to defray the ordinary expenses of the Government. This surplus was kept on hand till towards the close of the year, and was in the mean time a fund, upon which the Department could, with safety, rely in the event of a deficiency of revenue. After that we had a large and unexpected surplus springing from the bloated years of 1834, 1835, and 1836; but this has been divided among the States; and now with a scale of imposts constantly descending; with the whole commercial world deranged, if not paralyzed, we are left without any safeguard or resource under fluctuations in receipts and expenditures. Sir, this should not be so. We should not only make provisions for this year, but go a step farther and adopt the suggestions of the Secretary of the Treasury, by creating some permanent safeguard.

But we are told in conclusion, that there is a permanent deficiency, and that it is owing to the extravagant expenditures of this and the last Administrations of the General Government. Sir, I take issue again with gentlemen on this point, and can show that the increased expenditures of the last several years have been occasioned, not by the President, not by the Administration, properly speaking, but by the votes of Congress; and more generally by Whig, than by Democratic votes; that, so far as the Administration is concerned, the increase of expenditure has not even been in proportion to the increase of population. It is very easy now to declaim against the large appropriations of past years; but gentlemen would merit much more on the score of candor and honesty, should they accompany their patriotic invectives against extravagance, with the admission that their own votes have been most instrumental in contributing to it. I charge the extravagance upon the Legislature—I acquit the Executive Department of the Government from any participation therein. There have been, to be sure, causes and sources of expense, which it was not in the power of any Administration to control, and for which no particular party or branch of Government should be held responsible—such as our Indian wars, and the protection of our Northern frontier. Mr. V. said he had prepared some statements and tables, showing the expenses of 1828, which was the last year of the administration of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, in his eye, [Mr. ADAMS,] and the expenses of 1838, which was one of the years, over the extravagance of which Opposition gentlemen now poured out their bitterest lamentations; and the comparison he had instituted, would prove that in the Executive branch of the Government the increase of expense, since 1828, has not been in proportion to the increase of population, but that the expenses of the Legislature have more than doubled since that period. In 1828, the aggregate amount of expenditures for the support of the Executive Department of the Government was $507,127. In 1838, it was $856,925. The expenditure of this year was much augmented by the act of 4th July, 1836, to re-organize the General Land Office. Independently of the increase occasioned by this act, there has been none equal to the increase of population. The increase in the expenses of the Legislature has, however, been in a much greater ratio. In 1828, the expenditures of the Legislative Department of the Government amounted to $705,955. In 1838, they amounted to $1,425,467. A constituent part of this latter amount was the sum of $84,358, paid for the printing of the House of Representatives; a year, be it remembered, when a certain Mr. Allen, a new patent Conservative Whig, held the office of Printer. Gentlemen surely will not pretend that the friends of the Administration are more culpable than the Opposition for this increase of expense of our Legislature. We have not always been able to boast a majority here. At all events, the Federal Whigs retained in office their favorite Printer more than half the period that has elapsed since 1828. But to continue this comparison a little farther, and to establish more fully the truth of what we have alleged, that it is the legislation of Congress that has swelled up the aggregate of the expenditures of this Government. In 1828, our military expenses, exclusive of pensions, amounted to $3,666,498. In 1838, to $7,206,655. This disproportion arises chiefly from the raising an additional regiment of dragoons by the act of 23d May, 1836, and from an increase of the military establishment of the United States, by the act of 5th July, 1838 The latter act, it will be recollected, filled up all the companies that were not complete. Surely the Administration is not peculiarly responsible for this increase of expenditure consequent upon the small augmentation of our military force. Our Indian wars—our immense Western frontier and our Northern outbreaks, in the estimation of gentlemen of all parties, rendered this small addition to our military force absolutely necessary. I can hardly believe that the party which supports the Administration ever will derive, or ever could have expected to derive, any advantage to itself, as a party, from this increase of our army; because, sir, at least four-fifths of the officers of the army and navy, if they have any political feelings at all, are opposed to that great Democratic party which has, for the last twelve years, been in the ascendant. There seems to be something in their very nature which induces them to regard the Democracy with disfavor. Whether it be because large standing armies never were, and never will be, favorites of the Democratic party, I know not; and yet, sir, in the appalling aggregate of that array of one hundred thousand office holders, which this Government is said to command, the officers of the army and navy are always included. I speak thus of them, sir, not in a spirit of reprehension, for I rank among the officers of the army and navy many highly valued personal friends, but to repel the idea, that the friends of the Administration on this floor ever could have voted to increase the army, from any hope of increasing Executive patronage. My intelligent, able, and industrious friend from North Carolina, [Mr. MCKAY,] was at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs when the act passed to fill up the ranks of the army; and those who have observed the ever scrupulous and laudable care with which he watches the public treasure, the jealousy with which he notes, and the freedom and fidelity with which he rebukes, any steps towards extravagance, come from what quarter they may, can hardly be disposed to believe that he ever supported an increase of our military establishment without there was the utmost necessity for it.

But, sir, let us pursue our tables and comparisons still further. In 1828, the aggregate expenditures for the Indian Department—Indian annuities and Indian treaties—was $705,084. In 1838, they amounted to $5,564,223. And will it be said, either that the Administration, present or past, is peculiarly responsible for this vast increase, or that we have received no equivalent for this large expenditure? Sir, since the commencement of Gen. Jackson's administration, we have added millions upon millions to our public domain by means of our Indian treaties, and extinguishing Indian titles. We have created a prolific source of revenue for the future, and unless the unconstitutional and mischievous plans of distributionists among the States prevail, we will be soon most amply reimbursed for all the advances we have made under Indian treaties. Sir, this is money most judiciously and profitably invested. Again: in 1838, it cost us $439,001 for the protection of our Northern frontier; in 1828, nothing, because there were no troubles there, or in that vicinity. In 1818, the building and support of light-houses cost $261,305; in 1838, $445,352: and this, sir, in consequence of the increase of light-houses by acts of Congress. In 1828, the sum paid for the survey and improvements of ports, rivers, and harbors, amounted to $121,094; in 1838, it reached the very formidable amount of $1,188,876. And you need only refer to the yeas and nays to ascertain which of the two parties on this floor have been most favorable to appropriations of this description. Have they ever encountered opposition here? It has been chiefly from the friends of the Administration. My friend and colleague, the former distinguished chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. CAMBRELENG,] generally voted against appropriations for objects of this description; and to show that the policy of expending the public treasure in the improvement of harbors, rivers, and ports, is a favorite policy with the Opposition, he needed only refer to demonstrations very recently made by two of his Whig colleagues, [Messrs. BARNARD and MARVIN.] Both had proposed bills for these purposes, and both had made long speeches in favor of annually setting apart large appropriations for objects of this description. Let me not, then, be told that the enormous increase under this single head, from $121,094, to nearly two millions of dollars, is the fruit of the policy of this or the past Administration. These appropriations have ever found favor with Federal high-bank, high-tariff Whigs. Though I plead guilty to the charge of having voted for many of them, I am sorry to be constrained to admit or contend that they find their justification (if justified they can be) in the principles of latitudinarian Whigery. They are the favorite appropriations of the Whigs; and it is a little unkind, when they rebuke us for the increase of expenditures within the last twelve years, that they should remember to forget that most of this increase is attributable to objects, for which they not only voted, but which may be regarded as the offspring of their own principles and affections. Had not General Jackson vetoed the Maysville road bill, and had not the Democracy sustained him in this great step, could you undertake to tell me of the mad prodigality and reckless expenditures you would now have beheld and deplored? Sir, it was this veto that closed the largest, the most alarming outlet to the public Treasury, a measure no less salutary than bold, for which he received from the new-fangled Whigs of the day, nought but the most unmeasured derision and vituperation; A word as to your naval establishment, and I shall have finished my comparison of expenditures. In 1828, the expenditure for building vessels of war was $226,387. In 1838, it was $1,490 928. Will you taunt the Administration for this increase? The party in power has generally been suspected of not being quite friendly enough to this arm of our national defence. Federalists often claim it as their pet; as the child of their own peculiar nursing. Mr. Jefferson was ridiculed for his predilection for gunboats, as opposed to a navy. You claim the merit, sir, of having early taken this interest to your bosom. It has been well, however, ut not too well, guarded by the past and present Administrations; and is it just now, that you should make the fostering care which we have extended to it a subject of reproach? About as just, sir, as are all the reproaches you are heaping upon us for the increase of the expenditures of the Government; expenditures for which you, as a party, have uniformly voted, and for opposing which you would have rebuked us, as most faithless to the public interest. If the expenditures have been increased since 1823, you are more than particeps criminis.

Though the augmentation in the expenditures has, within the last fourteen years, been considerable, by means of legislation, for which, as I have shown, the Opposition are at least equally responsible with the friends of the Administration; yet has it not been as great as within other specified periods of our history, nor has it kept pace with the progress of population and wealth. In the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, you will find a very full and lucid exposition of the increase of expenditure as compared with the increase of wealth and population. I beg leave to call the attention of the committee to one or two paragraphs of that very able document.

"The precise periods (says the Secretary) when the greatest increases happened, and the rate of them, have not kept a uniform pace with the progress of population and wealth. In many respects, the ratio has not been nearly so great during the last ten or twenty years, as in some previous terms. Thus, the whole expenses of the Government in 1793, with the exception before mentioned, were about three millions yearly; and in 1818, after the lapse of a quarter of a century, had increased, though in a period of peace, to fifteen millions of dollars, or fivefold, while our population in that period had only doubled. But during the next sixteen or seventeen years, as in 1834 and 1835, the expenses had enlarged not twenty-five per cent. while our population had advanced at least sixty-six per cent. During the present year, (1839,) though in intermediate periods, chiefly from Indian wars and removals, considerably higher, they will not exceed the amount in 1818 more than sixty-six per cent. while our population has since increased more than eighty-four per cent. Again take the progress of the ordinary civil expenses, which include those of the Executive, Legislative, and Indian Departments, miscellaneous and foreign intercourse; all of them united were but a little over half a million of dollars in 1793, while in 1818 they had increased to nearly four millions, or eight hundred per cent. though our population had augmented only one hundred per cent. But since the last date, that class of expenditures has not enlarged forty per cent. having not been over five millions and a half in either 1837, 1838, or probably 1839, while our population has advanced eighty-four per cent. or more than double that rate."

Thus, sir, you perceive that, great as has been the increase of expenses by means of the legislation of Congress, it has not yet been equal to the increase of wealth and population. There is another cause which, in some measure, no doubt, contributed to this increase of our expenses, which, I trust, will not very soon occur again. I refer to the unwieldy surplus which flowed from the spirit of speculation produced by the expansion of the Bank of the United States in 1834, and the pursuit of the same policy by the State banks. Importations of foreign goods swelled from one hundred and one millions of dollars in 1833, to one hundred and ninety millions in 1836; and the sales of your public lands at once swelled from three or four millions per year to twenty-four millions, in the bloated year of 1836. The duties upon this unprecedentedly heavy importation, and the proceeds of this immense sale of public lands, brought into your Treasury more than forty millions of dollars beyond the ordinary wants of the Government. The scheme of distribution among the States was at once conceived by a party in Congress; though there was another party here who conscientiously believed that this would be the most mischievous and alarming disposition that could be made of the surplus; and not a few thought that it would be better, far better, that it were sunk in the bottom of the ocean; that it would be an example that would impair the independence of the States; create a reliance, on their part, upon this great Federal head; and serve to make this Government the collector of taxes for, and the distributor of, largesses to the members of this Confederacy. Many gentlemen were thus induced, no doubt, to favor appropriations that would not have received their sanction had not this scheme of distribution been on foot. They voted for objects, that would not otherwise have commanded their support, because they looked upon such dispositions of the public treasure as a lesser evil than the alternative of distribution. Sir, I had the honor of recording my vote against the deposite or distribution bill; and I look back upon it with more pride and satisfaction than on any other vote of my life. A distinguished Senator from Missouri proposed to apply a considerable portion of this surplus to the purpose of erecting an adequate line of fortifications along our seaboard; and well would it have been if this judicious and constitutional disposition had been made. Then, sir, would the nation have no cause to tremble with alarm for our large cities at the slightest prospect of a conflict with a foreign power. Then would we have secured a guarantee for a long peace, by exhibiting an adequate preparation for war. Yes, sir, all the forebodings of the enemies of distribution are already justified by actual events. Many of the States, under this new impetus, have been precipitated into the wildest extravagance; chimerical projects have been undertaken, now abandoned or suspended; the credit of many of the States has been sunk so low in Europe as to make every American abroad blush and hang his head. These, gentlemen, are among the fruits which have arisen, in a measure, from your policy of distribution; but these are not the worst. A disposition is indirectly engendered in the States to look to this Government for supplies; for the means of extricating them from the effects of their own folly and extravagance. The clamorant appetite of politicians and distributionists is already whetted for our public domain; that once denationalized and severed, your customs will have to respond to the next horse-leech cry of "Give—give;" and unless this alarming spirit be, in this stage of it, rebuked and checked, your whole Government will be practically changed, and the long deferred hopes of Federalists and consolidationists will be consummated.

CUMBERLAND ROAD BILL.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 1, 1840.

The bill for the continuation of the Cumberland road, in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, was taken up for consideration; and the question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. CLAY of Alabama to strike out the two per cent. clause,

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky addressed the Senate at length in favor of the amendment; and the question being taken thereon, it was rejected—ayes 17, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, King, Lumpkin, Phelps, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Southard, Strange, and Webster—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Cuthbert, Fulton, Grundy, Linn, Nicholas, Pierce, Robinson, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tallmadge, Tappan, Wall, White, Wright, and Young.—19.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama then proposed, as an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and insert the following as a substitute:

"That the two per cent. of the nett proceeds of the sales of public lands in the several States of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, which may accrue after the passage of this act, and which was reserved by the several acts for the admission of said several States into the Union, to be applied to the laying out and construction of roads leading to the said States respectively, be, and the same is hereby, relinquished to said State respectively, to be paid over to such person or persons as may be authorized to receive the same, to be applied by said States respectively, to such roads or canals within their several limits, as they think proper: Provided the Legislatures of each of said States shall, before receiving any part of the said fund, pass an act, irrevocable without the consent of Congress, assenting to the provisions of this act."

Mr. C. said as it seemed, from the vote just taken, that we were to go on appropriating money for this road, on the pretext that the General Government was to be refunded out of the two per cent. arising from the sales of the public lands, in the States to and through which it was to run, notwithstanding that fund, present and prospective, had been exhausted more than three times told, he now proposed to put an end to this enormous annual drain from the Treasury, by giving up all that was hereafter to accrue. He said surely, when it had been shown that the whole amount of the two per cent. fund of the four States, (Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri,) which had now accrued, was but $1,096,012 18; and that we had appropriated and expended $6,609,407 76—exceeding the amount they had any right to claim, the sum of $5,513,395 58—they would consent to take all the fund which was hereafter to accrue, and release us from any further expenditure. Mr. C. said this must be regarded on all hands as a liberal proposition. The friends of the road claimed the appropriation, on the ground that it was either now, or would become, payable under the compacts with those States reserving the fund; and how could they reject this proposition, when no one denied that we had gone far beyond the amount which had accrued in past expenditures, and even to surrender all that could possibly accrue hereafter? He thought this question would determine how far the two per cent. really had any thing to do with the bill, or the money it granted.

To gentlemen who represented States not interested in the road, Mr. C. said his amendment ought to be altogether acceptable. He had shown in an early stage of the discussion, that if every acre of the lands remaining unsold in the four States, could be sold for $1 25 per acre, (and no Senator had pretended it could,) the two per cent. on the proceeds would only amount to $1,426,108 56. Even if that sum could possibly be realized, we should be purchasing our release on good terms; for, if the land would sell at all, it would not all be sold in half a century—during all which time the fund would be slowly accruing, whilst more than the amount would be taken from the Treasury in a year or two more. Mr. C. said, taking into consideration the reduced prices at which the refuse lands in those States might be expected to sell—perhaps not exceeding one half the present minimum price per acre—the whole two per cent. fund hereafter to accrue would never amount to a million of dollars. Then, taking into view the claims of the States interested, to have the road completed on the plan which had been pursued, and that the cost of so finishing it was estimated by the engineer at $7,896,045 44, he thought all must entertain the opinion that we should do well by making the surrender proposed by his amendment. Large as the cost of its completion was estimated, Mr. C. said he did not believe it equal to the amount of expenditure that would be required. Hence it was fair to conclude, that, if the several States would accept the proposed relinquishment, we should save to the United States about seven millions of dollars. With this brief explanation, he said he would leave his amendment to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. PRESTON also advocated the amendment, and opposed the bill at some length.

Mr. YOUNG replied to Mr. CLAY and Mr. PRESTON, and went into an extended argument in support of the bill.

Mr. CLAY of Alabama remarked, in reply to Mr. YOUNG, that hitherto, the two per cent. fund, accrued and accruing on the sales of the public lands in the four States, for whose benefit this road was to be made, had been the basis of the whole argument in favor of the appropriation. But now, when it had been clearly demonstrated, that the entire fund, so far as sales had been, or ever could be made, had been long since exhausted; and, consequently, that the General Government had more than performed its compacts with those several States, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. YOUNG] had assumed the bold and new ground, that the Cumberland road did not rest upon the compacts! If this be the fact (said Mr. C.) why was the bill framed with reference to those compacts? Why did it contain a clause for the reimbursement of the United States, from the fund arising under them? And why were the friends of the bill, including the Senator from Illinois, so averse to striking out that clause, on the motion made for that purpose? Mr. C. said, if the Senator was justified in the position he now assumed, the pertinacity with which he and his friends clung to the clause for reimbursement, under the compacts, was most extraordinary. He said the stage of the discussion at which this ground had been taken, and a recurrence to the course of argument which preceded it, gave it very much the appearance of an afterthought. The friends of the bill had not only resisted striking out the clause, connecting it with the compacts between the United States and Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, but they had succeeded in overruling Mr. C's motion; they would not agree, he said, to place the measure, as he had desired them, upon its own merits, independent of any hope or claim upon the two per cent. fund, but still it retained that feature. Yet the Senator from Illinois now maintains that the Cumberland road does not rest upon the compacts with the States interested! He said he would leave it to the Senate to say whether this course was not strangely inconsistent with the whole argument against his amendment, and the vote by which it had been overruled.

Mr. C. said, the Senator from Illinois, to aid him in his new position, now also contended that Mr. Jefferson thought this road constitutional. Now, said Mr. C if the gentleman means to convey the idea that Mr. Jefferson believed the General Government possessed the constitutional power to make roads or canals within the States, I deny the assertion, and challenge him to the proof. Can the Senator from Illinois, or any other gentleman, show a single sentence in all that Mr. Jefferson has said, or written, to warrant the belief that he ever entertained the opinion that this Government possessed power to make internal improvements? No, sir, said Mr. C. it is impossible—except so far as to agree to expend two per cent. of the nett proceeds of the public lands in making roads to the new States, to accelerate the settlement and facilitate the sale of the national domain, as he had stated in a former part of the discussion; and this was a mere incident to the "power to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting, the territory or other property belonging to the United States." But, although in this aspect, that distinguished Republican had approved of bills making appropriations for the Cumberland road; and although those bills had anticipated the accruement of the fund reserved for that purpose; he had never exceeded its ultimate probable amount; nor had he ever signed a bill which did not promise reimbursement.

But the Senator inquires how, with such views as I have expressed, I can vote to relinquish the two per cent. hereafter to accrue in those States? To this, said Mr. C. I answer, I do so on the principle of quieting a vexatious claim, and by way of buying our peace. He alluded to what was commonly called the Yazoo claim, known to have originated in fraud, and to have been totally invalid. Yet the General Government had given the claimants 5,000,000 dollars, to get rid of a troublesome question. He also said, even in the history of this road, there was precedent enough for such legislation. It was on the principle to which he referred, that several acts had been passed, making large appropriations for the Cumberland road on this side of the Ohio, conditioned that the several States through which it passed would accept the road within their respective limits, and keep it up. Indeed, he said, a session of Congress seldom occurred, that some act did not pass, founded on this principle of compromise; and he had no hesitancy in saying that one more advantageous or necessary than that proposed, had never been passed.

The Senator had brought up, too, the application of the Legislature of Alabama for a relinquishment of the works which had been commenced on the Tennessee river. Mr. C. asked, where was the analogy between that case and the present? He answered, none whatever; and although the Senator from Illinois was at the head of the Committee on Roads and Canals, to which the memorial from the Legislature of Alabama had been referred at the last session, and again at an early day of the present session, Mr. C. said, from the Senator's allusion to the subject, he feared he had never read it. He said he would inform the Senator from Illinois that the two cases were entirely dissimilar. The friends of the Cumberland road not only claimed $450,000 now, but that nearly $8,000,000 more, in all, should be appropriated for its completion. The application from Alabama was, not that Congress should appropriate more money for the completion of the canal, but that the work might be relinquished to the State, that she might finish the improvements herself. Mr. C. could see no good ground for objection to this proposition from any quarter. The completion of the canal, or the removal of the obstructions to the navigation of the Tennesse river, presented by the muscle shoals, on some other plan, was, he said, all-important to the agricultural and commercial interests of the northern part of Alabama, and also to those of several other States. Connected, as this improvement was, with the commerce of all the Western and Southwestern States, in a greater or less degree, it had much higher claims to the aid of the National Treasury than any turnpike road running through the interior of the States. This work having been commenced by the General Government, application had been made in former years for further appropriations to complete it; but they had been made in vain. The State had despaired of further aid, and now made the very reasonable request that it might be given up to her own exclusive control. He said he would take this occasion to invite the consideration of the committee to the subject, and hoped, whatever might be their conclusion, they would at least report their views upon the memorial, and let the Senate judge of its merits.

Mr. WEBSTER said, it must be acknowledged that this bill calls for the appropriation of a large amount of money, considering the present state of the Treasury; and, as the object is not embraced in any estimate submitted by the Treasury Department, we shall be very likely, hereafter, to hear Congress reproached with extravagance, and with disregard of the economical maxims of the Executive. I am induced, nevertheless, to vote for the bill. I regret that some of its friends place its support on grounds which do not appear to me to be substantial. They treat the subject as matter of contract. They refer to the provision by which, when these Northwestern States were respectively admitted into the Union, two per cent. of the proceeds of the public lands were to be reserved, to be applied by Congress to the making of roads leading to the States; and there is in this bill a section purporting to charge this appropriation to that fund. I have voted to strike out that section, because the fund has long since been exhausted and expended. This every one knows. Yet the section is retained to give the color of contract or obligation to the bill, instead of leaving it in the plain character of a bill making a direct grant of money out of the Treasury for constructing a road. This section is a little narrow isthmus, along which a few friends, it is hoped, may persuade themselves to walk, who are afraid of the broad general ground of the Constitution—a sort of bridle path, which they can thread along, and arrive at an affirmative vote, by a way not known to others. I am against these contrivances, and place my support of the measure on grounds entirely different.

It is now fifteen years, I think, since I was first called upon, as a member of Congress, to act upon the subject of this road. It had then reached the Ohio. I took some pains, at that time, to explain the grounds of my vote in favor of the appropriation, and I have never seen reason to change them. On the present occasion, I shall only merely refer to them.

The Northwestern territory was ceded to the United States under the Confederation; and, on the adoption of the present Constitution, this vast public domain fell under the control of Congress. All the property and rights belonging to the United States under the Confederation devolved upon this Government by the establishment of the present Constitution, as did also all their debts, compacts, treaties, and obligations. And the Constitution expressly declares that Congress shall have power to dispose of this territory, and to make all needful rules and regulations respecting it.

Under this authority, Congress has caused the the territory to be surveyed, the lands laid off into townships and sections, and great portions of them sold to settlers. The new States have thus sprung up, and been admitted into the Union, successively, as they have attained the proper amount of population.

In general, Congress has done nothing to promote the sale of these lands, but to survey them and lot them out; and, while yet held by Government, and for five years after, none of them are taxable by the State Governments. The Government of the United States, therefore, in relation to these lands, is a great untaxed proprietor. As a great proprietor, then, holding these lands for sale, is any thing more reasonable than that it should open the country, make roads through it, render it accessible, and thus bring the lands into market? Is not this just what any large individual proprietor of forest lands would find it his interest to do? Congress has express authority to make all needful rules and regulations for the whole subject. It has made already a mass of rules. It has made lines for exploring, rules for surveying, and running rules, and rules for selling and receiving payment. Many of these rules and regulations necessarily incur, in carrying them into effect, great expense; yet no one doubts that all such expenses may be very properly paid out of the Treasury. And if Congress choose to go further, and make regulations for the opening of roads through the country, I cannot see the least constitutional objection to it. And what strikes me very forcibly is, that, so long as one of these regions of country remains a territory, nobody objects to making roads in it by the authority of Congress, and paying the expense out of the Treasury. But the public territory, so far as it remains unsold, is under the control of Congress after a State is established, as well as before. It is as much the duty of Congress to take care of it, to sell it advantageously, and to do every thing necessary and proper for the purpose of making such sales, after a State exists, as while the territorial form of government existed. There is, it is true, a difficulty, rather theoretical than practical, springing up, or which, by possibility, might spring up, by the establishment of the State Government; that is to say, there might possibly be a difficulty about jurisdiction. It might be necessary, in some imaginable cases, to carry the road over lands belonging to individuals; in other imaginable cases, it might be necessary to exercise some authority, resembling municipal authority, for the protection of the road. But these cases are all hypothetical. No actual difficulty has ever occurred; and, as to the mere power of appropriation, there cannot be the slightest difference in the two cases, of States and Territories. There must, in each case, be a proper object—an object within the just power of Congress. And if this objects exists, the right to expend money upon it is as clear in one case as the other. I suppose it was merely with reference to this question of jurisdiction that Mr. Jefferson deemed the concurrence of the States important; although the question then pending had more appearance of doubt, as the road then to be constructed was on this side of the region of the public lands, and within the old States. It is very certain that if, in a given case, Congress has not power, under the Constitution, to make a grant of money, it cannot obtain that power by obtaining the consent of three or four States for its exercise. The power must rest, and it does rest, on the direct authority of Congress.

It is said that this is a local object, and that, in carrying it forward, we, in effect, tax the whole people for the benefit of a part. But this may be said of almost every thing. To be sure, the road is local; and so is every fort, every harbor, every pier, every light-house, and every armory and arsenal in the United States. But they are not, for that reason, less within the just exercise of the powers of Congress, or less deserving its attention. The money, it is true, is to be paid out of the Treasury; but then the public lands are constantly paying money into the Treasury. Suppose it had been the practice to keep the proceeds of the sales of the public lands in a distinct fund, separated from the general moneys of the Treasury: it would seem plain enough that out of this fund any reasonable sum might be applied for the purpose of making roads to and through the lands, for the purpose of bringing them into the market.

There is yet another view of the subject, which exhibits, I think, the duty of Congress in a clear light. We commence the settlement of these forest lands by the work of the surveyor. We cause them to be laid off into townships and sections. We then advertise them for sale by sections, or smaller quantities, to accommodate settlers. A few settlers buy their lots, fell the timber, begin cultivation, and build their houses. But there must be roads from house to house; there must be bridges over the streams; much cost and labor are demanded for these and similar neighborhood purposes. And this cost and labor are supplied by the settlers. Meantime the United States, owners still of the greater part of the lots and sections, contribute nothing, and are taxed for nothing. It has not been thought proper or convenient, for general reasons, that the Government should be called on to bear any part of this expense, though it may be a very heavy expense, as all know who are acquainted with the settlement of new countries.

But, as the Government does nothing in common with other and smaller proprietors, for these smaller objects, the reason is greater that, on a larger scale, and in regard to larger and more general objects, it should make its just contribution.

I say nothing of the expense of the road, only that I believe it has cost a great deal more than it need to have cost. It has been sometimes very badly managed. I hope the money may be more economically expended hereafter. But I am of opinion that the work ought to go on; and, notwithstanding that the Treasury is not overflowing, and notwithstanding that the Executive branches of Government do not recommend it, nor include the expense in the annual estimates, I shall yet give my vote for the bill, and hope it may pass.

Mr. CALHOUN said that he was thoroughly satisfied that the General Government was wholly unfit to carry on works of internal improvement, and that, in his solicitude to see the termination of the whole system, he would vote for the amendment offered as a substitute for this bill by his friend from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY.] He believed the offer was a liberal one, and ought to be accepted by the States interested. It went beyond the measure of real justice in the spirit of compromise, and the hope that it would put an end to this distracting question, and the system of which it constitutes a part. It was only in that view, he could justify his support of the proposition. Indeed, he believed that the fund was entirely exhausted, and that the States interested in the road had no just claim to further appropriation or aid from the Government.

He could not concur in the opinion of the Senator from Illinois, Mr. YOUNG. That Senator acknowledged that a sum much greater than could ever be derived from the two per cent. fund had been expended on the road, but insists, that on a fair construction of the compact with the States interested, a large portion of the sum expended ought not to be charged to that fund. He rested his construction on the expression, that the money should be expended on roads leading to the State, which he so construed as to make it the duty of the Government, under the compact, to carry the road actually to the limits of the States, and which, if correct, would oblige us to finish the road throughout its whole extent to the borders of Missouri. In giving this construction, he distinguished between "to" and "towards."

He (Mr. C.) did not think it necessary to go into this verbal discussion. He rested his opinion on more solid ground. It was, in fact, too late to inquire into the true meaning of the compact in reference to the fund. Two points were certain. In the first place, that the Government is not bound to expend more than two per cent. on the road, and that the fund had been exhausted. And, in the next place, that it had been exhausted by the votes, in part, of the members of the States interested in that fund, and at the earnest solicitation of the States which they represent, and against the strenuous opposition of a large portion of the members from other parts of the Union. It is too late to say the fund is not liable for such expenditures. They are estopped by their own acts. The very case stated by the Senator would illustrate what he said. He asks, if an undertaker should engage to spend $10,000 to build a house for you, and should spend that sum on the foundation, would that fulfil his engagement? Yes, certainly, if that be the limit of the amount agreed to be spent, and if you stood by and insisted he should spend the whole sum he had engaged to do on the foundation; and such is precisely the present case.

Nor could he agree with the opinion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. TAPPAN.] He takes the ground that justice demands the appropriation; that in consequence of this, and other improvements by the Government, we have received a much higher price for the land sold, than what we could otherwise have got, and that the purchasers have already paid for the road in this increase of price. He attempted to establish his position by reference to the price at which Connecticut sold her reserve, which he stated to be forty cents the acre. In answer to this, it is sufficient to remark that the public lands, so far from affording an income, have not yet returned to the General Government the sum expended for them, as was stated and not denied in the recent discussion on the question of assuming the State debts; and that, of course, if the road has been thus far constructed, and if it is to be continued, must be constructed at the expense of the commerce of the country, our only available source of revenue in reality.

But another, and not less decisive answer, might be given to the argument. So far from selling on better, we have sold on worse terms than Connecticut. She sold her whole interest in the gross, including good and bad land, without expense, almost a half century ago, for cash in hand, or, what is the same, paper well secured, with interest; while we have been selling through all the intermediate period, piece by piece, of our best land, at a heavy expense. It requires but little knowledge of figures to show that, taking interest into the estimate, she has realized a clear profit per acre far greater than what we have, without making any deduction for expenses, trouble, and responsibility of management.

He had now showed that this appropriation cannot be defended on the claims of justice. If, then, it can be defended at all, it must be on the broad and general ground of expediency and constitutionality, on which every other work of the same description would stand. He would not assent to the ingenious attempt of the Senator from New York, [Mr. WRIGHT,] to distinguish it from other works of the kind. That Senator acknowledged that the two per cent. fund had been long since exhausted, and admitted that without the provision in this bill charging the work on that fund, there would be no distinction between an appropriation for this and any other road; and yet, with these admissions, he undertook the herculean task of proving that the retention of the provision charging the appropriation on that exhausted fund, would, by some magic, make a material distinction between this and all other roads. His intellect, he acknowledged, was too obtuse to perceive the difference; unless, indeed, it be meant that, if the provision were retained, it would have the effect to prevent the President, in the exercise of his approving power, from looking beyond the act itself, and ascertaining whether, in truth, the fund was exhausted or not, and thus to compel him to sign an act which, otherwise, his oath to support the Constitution would compel him to veto. He took an entirely different view. He believed it due to the President, to ourselves, and the Constitution, to present the act to him, if presented at all, in exact conformity to the state of the facts, so as to afford him a fair opportunity to exercise the high power vested in him by the Constitution over our acts, with full knowledge of all the facts; and if he had no other objection to the bill than the retention of this deceptious provision, as he regarded it, he would on that account vote against it. He held a strict adherence to truth, in every particular, to be among our most solemn obligations.

Viewing this bill like every other for internal improvement, he was opposed to it, if for no other reason, because the experience of a quarter of a century had proved that this Government was utterly unfit to carry on works of the kind. He would vote for the substitute, in order to get rid of the whole system. It appears, by a statement from the Treasury Department, that there has been spent by this Government, for internal improvements, the sum of $18,600,000, in round numbers. If, to this expenditure, interest be added, it may be fairly put down at the sum of twenty-five millions; and what do you suppose has been the aggregate income of the Government from this immense expenditure, equal to one-fourth of the debt of the Revolution? The whole amount is just $173,620, and that from a single work, the Louisville and Portland canal; and we have now, if I mistake not, a bill on the calender to surrender that work. Nor is this road an exception to wasteful and thoughtless expenditure. It has been stated in debate, and not contradicted, that it has thus far cost $18,000 per mile; a sum at least three times as great as a good road of the kind may be made for, and much greater than what a substantial railroad ought to cost.

Georgia is constructing at this time a railroad from the Tennessee to the Chatahoochie river, a distance of 120 miles, including the mountain section between the Atlantic and the Western waters, at the rate of $15 000 per mile, substantially made, to be laid down with heavy rails and graded for double tracks. If he misstated, he asked his friend from Georgia, back of him, to correct him, [Mr. LUMPKIN.] He felt that he hazarded nothing in asserting, that this very road will in ten years be superseded by a railroad, and will prove worthless, like all our other projects of the kind, with the lucky exception to which he had alluded. The uncertain navigation of the Ohio river, in summer and winter, will make a railroad passing in the same direction necessary, and when made, this, which costs so much, and is the cause of so much contest, will be no more than a mere neighborhood road, being used to drive stock on, and not good for that.

But the unfitness of this Government to carry on works of internal improvements is not confined to this objection. Our disbursements are as partial and unequal as they are wasteful and thoughtless. I hold in my hand a document, (No. 89, 2d Ses. 23d Congress,) which gives the amount expended under the head of internal improvement, from the commencement of the Government to 1833. To that period there had been expended ten millions of dollars in round numbers, of which sum Georgia had received just seventeen thousand for her share, South Carolina nothing at all, Kentucky nothing, Virginia nothing, and Tennessee twenty-seven thousand dollars. The truth is, that the expenditures appear to have been governed by importunity and political influence, with little or no regard to justice or utility.

A system so conducted must lead to discontent, and be productive, politically, of mischievous consequences. Need we go further than this very instance to prove the truth of this assertion? Can we doubt that there is, in reality, a large portion of this body discontented with so large an annual draft on the Treasury for a single work, as local in its character as a thousand others that may be named? Nay, further; can we doubt that there is a great majority of the body of both parties opposed to it, both on the ground of expediency and constitutionality, but who feel themselves compelled, in a measure, to vote for the appropriation, because of its supposed bearing on a certain question which now agitates the country, but which he did not deem it proper to name here. According to his mode of thinking, those who represented the States immediately concerned had the greatest interest in terminating the whole system. They were placed, in his opinion, in a state truly awkward and embarrassing; and for himself, he would rather that his State should never receive a cent, than to receive double the amount contained in this bill, under the circumstances under which it would have to be voted.

It is time, Mr. President, that we should awake from our long slumber. We have, for the last fifteen or twenty years, been wasting the resources of the Union on innumerable objects of internal expenditure—roads, canals, harbors, an overgrown eleemosynary pension list, never intended to be placed, by the Constitution, under the charge of this Government—while we have been grossly neglecting the great objects for which the Government was really instituted. It is high time that this internal bleeding, which has been wasting the strength of the Government, should cease, and that we should direct our attention and resources to objects really entrusted to the Government, and for which it is responsible. He was no alarmist: he did not believe that war would grow out of the boundary question. Right, he solemnly believed, was with us; and when the Government of Great Britain came to a full and calm consideration of the subject, such, he believed, would be her conclusion; but be that as it may, he could not bring his mind to the belief that two nations so deeply interested in preserving peace, would refuse to settle such a question short of an appeal to arms. The great point is to prevent collision between the local authorities on the opposite side of the line, and to keep the question to the real point at issue. If this be done, he did not doubt but the controversy would terminate peaceably, and to the mutual satisfaction of both parties. But although he did not believe that war would result, or that there was danger in that quarter, he could not look at the general state of the world, without fearing that the elements of strife were daily multiplying and gaining strength, and that it was time for us to economize our resources, and direct them to the point where they would be felt in the hour of trial. We must look to the ocean. That is the exposed side—the side of danger. There was no real danger on the side of the inland frontier. He regarded the British possessions on that frontier as a pledge of peace, and not a source of danger. The immense increase of our population on the whole extent of the line, and the still greater facility of concentrating the great masses of our population on any of its exposed points, by roads and canals, made us invincible there. Not so on the maritime frontier. It is there we are really exposed, and to that we must direct our attention. For its defence fortifications have their value; but they have been over estimated. It is on the navy we must rely. It was our cheapest and safest defence—at once our sword and shield. On it we should converge our surplus means. He would be prepared to show, on the proper occasion, that it would be in our power, by strict economy, and withholding useless, profuse, corrupting, and unconstitutional expenditures, to put on the ocean, at no distant period, and without increase of burden, a force that would give to us the habitual command of the adjacent seas, against any force that could be safely kept by any hostile power on our coast. At that point we ought to arm. Nothing short of it can give security or respectability. The first step is to put a stop to these internal expenditures; at the head of which stands that which is the subject of this discussion. Till it is stopped this system cannot be arrested; nor can we have any assurance till then that it will not return on us in its full vigor. Other portions of the Union will not stand by and see a part receiving all the benefit of the system, be the pretence what it may, without struggling to participate in its advantages.

On motion by Mr. WHITE,

The Senate adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. WATTERSON,

OF TENNESSEE.

In the House of Representatives, April 2, 1840—In reply to Mr. BELL, on his bill to secure the freedom of elections, and to provide more effectually for the faithful administration of Executive patronage.

Mr. WATTERSON said:

I do not intend, on the present occasion, to take up much of the time of the House, by reading, iterating, and reiterating the opinions of Washington, of Jefferson, of Madison, and of Jackson, in regard to the principles embraced in the bill now brought forward by my honorable colleague. I shall content myself with stating, in plain language, my own views; and for them will I be responsible to those who sent me here, and to the country.

The bill is not a new acquaintance. It had its faint and comparatively harmless prototype in the sedition law of the elder Adams—a measure which overthrew the party that originated it; which brought about the political revolution of 1801; and which gave rise to that immortal declaration of the principles of this Government, by the Virginia Assembly, which has been adopted and recognised as the corner stone of Democracy. These principles will stand unshaken amid all the conflicts of party, and must continue to control this Government as long as it shall exist; for whenever the General Government shall go beyond its proper sphere, and assume arbitrary powers, or powers not delegated to it, it will come into collision with the State sovereignties, in such a manner as to cause its overthrow.

My first objection, therefore, to the bill proposed by my colleague, is, that it is unconstitutional. It interferes in a matter properly belonging to State authority, and over which this Government has no sort of control. Congress as no right to prescribe the qualifications of electors in the several States; nor the mode of conducting elections; nor the privileges or immunities of citizens in relation to elections. All this is left to State regulation. The States, if they see fit, can make any laws on this subject, not conflicting with their own and the Constitution of the United States. But no State has yet seen proper to direct its legislation against the influence or the acts of Federal officers, as distinguished from other classes of citizens. Congress is expressly prohibited by the words of the Constitution from making any law, "abridging the freedom of speech or of the press." For wise reasons, the Constitution has been so framed as to withhold from the General Government any power to restrain the exercise of the right of speech, and the right of the press. To the States alone it belongs to judge how far these rights may be properly restricted. It is too late to argue this question. It has been settled by the almost unanimous voice of the people of these States.

The principles of this bill, however, are still more inconsistent with our Constitution, and with the doctrines of Jefferson and Madison, than those of the sedition law. The latter restrained the freedom of the press, but the former strikes at the liberty of speech. The sedition law allowed the truth to be given in justification of what was published; but this bill makes criminal even the suggestion of undisputed truth, in regard to public men and measures.

The object of the bill is to prevent Federal officers from intermeddling in elections, or, in other words, to gag them to deprive them of their rights under the Constitution; to forbid them from speaking on public affairs. My colleague, indeed, says, that his object is to emancipate these unfortunate men from Executive influence. It may be that, like the Turk, he would enslave, in order to proselyte; and, sir, if this bill could be made a law, the officers of the Government against whom it is aimed, would be watched, and dogged, and misrepresented, and prosecuted, until they were driven into the sanctuary of the true Opposition faith.

I ask if the bill now brought in by my colleague, is not the same in principle, if not in detail, as that which was introduced into the Senate last year by a Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] and which incurred the marked disapprobation of that body, and of the people? If I am not mistaken, my colleague approved highly of that bill. I remember, said Mr. W. that I read the speech of my colleague on the harbor bill in the year 1836, in which he quotes, with much admiration, an old English statute, passed in the year 1701, prohibiting certain officers of the customs and excise, and of the post office, from giving their votes in any election of members of Parliament, or from persuading any elector to give, or dissuading him from giving, his vote in such election. He then called upon the freemen of the United States to take a lesson on this subject from the legislation of a Government less free than our own, and of an age in which Republicanism was known but in the visions of philosophers. The example drawn from English legislation, is an abridgement of the elective franchise. That Government has abridged the same right in an hundred different ways and under various pretences. It has indeed narrowed it down under any pretext which it supposed might reconcile the people to such encroachment. But why should we follow a precedent so hostile to the genius of our Government? Would the gentleman begin the work of suppressing the voice of freemen on public affairs, on any pretence, so as to familiarize us to a scheme which, among the Federalists, has always tended gradually to gag the people and restrict the right of suffrage. That party has never lost sight of their original plan of warping our Government into the British system.

This system, which my colleague believes to be so necessary to the preservation of the freedom of elections, in this free land, was adopted by a Senator, and brought forward, at the last session, in a bill which was a copy, word for word, of the British statute, which so much pleases my colleague. Five Senators were found to vote for it, two of them, perhaps, in compliment to the well known opinions of my colleague, but never was a bill less favored by the people or the States. My colleague, not discouraged by the ill success of this first attempt to which two of his friends in the other body were made a sacrifice, has again brought forward the same plan in a slightly modified form.

Can my colleague be surprised that a bill, the features of which are so well understood, and which has been so strongly reprobated, should be resisted on its threshold? Can he be surprised at the hesitation manifested even in granting leave to introduce the bill, or that a motion should now be made for its rejection? But having a fixed idea on this subject, and possessing unwavering confidence in his views of it, he commenced his speech with an expression of surprise that such opposition was manifested by a portion of his colleagues and others of the same political party, when he asked leave to introduce his bill. He told the House what the Globe would have said, in the event leave had been refused. Whether the sketch which he drew was mere fancy or not, I do not feel myself called upon to give an opinion. I think, however, he is entirely mistaken in supposing that those who voted against leave, were actuated by the motives which he ascribes to them. They, no doubt, thought the bill was so abominable, that it was their duty to oppose it at every step of its progress—that it was so obnoxious, it could find but little favor even with the gentleman's own political friends upon this floor—that an unprofitable debate would arise upon it, which would consume much time, that should be devoted to the important public business of the country, requiring immediate action. Sir, I am not sure but they took the right course, and should have been sustained, though my vote stands recorded in favor of giving leave. It occurred to me, at the time, that, if my colleague were not permitted to hang a real bona fide stump speech, four years old, on this bill, about the office holders and Executive patronage, he would be certain to do so, when some other measure was under discussion; and that even in point of time, nothing would be saved by refusing to graut the leave desired. Moreover, sir, the bill has been on your docket for a long while, and I wish to see it disposed of—a vote taken upon it—and let the country know how many members are in favor of what I conceive to be its odious provisions. I hope, therefore, that no friend of the Administration will move to lay it upon the table, or to get clear of it in any other indirect way. Let us march right up to the main question, and if the bill contains the principles of the Whig party, the sooner the people know it the better. But I predict that, whenever we come to the sticking point, such dodging and hiding behind pillars, as there will be, has not been witnessed among my colleague's political friends, since the "immortal five" voted for Mr. CRITTENDEN's famous gag bill.

My colleague complains that the minority of this House are gagged by the majority. Where is the evidence of it? Is it to be found in the many elaborate electioneering speeches which have been made here by him and his political associates? Have they not wasted fivefold as much time in useless partisan debates, as has been wasted by the Democratic members? These facts are indisputable—they are blazoned on the records of our proceedings, yet, forsooth, the Opposition are gagged! Sir, if it were not for the "previous question" in the House, and a determination on the part of the majority to "set out" important questions in Committee of the Whole, it would be impossible to do any business—such is the disposition of the Whigs to stave off every question, to impede the progress of legislation. They oppose every thing and propose nothing. Like the architect of ruin, they are eternally endeavoring to pull down, and never once make an effort to build up.

Mr. Speaker, the clamor of the Opposition about office holders is not new to our ears. It is the cry of the outs against the ins. It will be as perpetual as the existence of parties. We have often heard it before. Strangers to the cry would be led to suppose, that all office holders, all who were so far honored with public confidence, as to hold any public station of profit or trust, are necessarily enemies to their country—particularly if they should happen to hear the emphatic denunciations of them by my colleague. If, sir, there are too many office holders, let him specify them, and bring forward a bill to dispense with them, and I assure him that I will go for it. No proposition has yet come from him for that purpose, and none can be expected.

But, Mr. Speaker, is the purity of representation, and the freedom of elections, alone assailable by office holders of the General Government? Can my colleague see no danger from any other quarter? In the scenes which have lately passed before our eyes, and to which he alluded in his remarks on yesterday, can he not discover the danger to which elections, both of members of Congress and of the State Legislatures, are exposed from sources much nearer home than his supposed Executive influence? On the part of officers of the State Governments there have been daring attempts, of late years, to suppress the right of suffrage, and to control the results of elections. In one State, Pennsylvania, the policy was avowed by the minority party, then in power, of "treating the election as if it had not been held." The attempt was made in that and in one other State, by officers holding my colleague's political opinions, and sharing with him in abhorrence of Executive influence over elections—not to persuade a person to vote, or dissuade him from voting, this or that way—but to suppress the right of suffrage itself—to set aside the voice of the people—and, in short, to substitute the will of the minority, for that of the majority. Yes, sir, the acts of reckless and unprincipled officers of the State Governments, have been substituted, or attempted to be substituted, for a free election by the people; and, in all this, my colleague sees no cause of alarm, though in one case, it brought one of the largest and most respectable States in the Union, to the brink of revolution and civil war, and, in the other, led to a prolonged disorganization of the legislative branch of the Federal Government

Again; elections are exposed to another vicious influence, which seems to have escaped the notice and reprobation of my colleague. I mean the influence of "associated wealth," of privileged corporations, acting in concert with State officers, against the policy of the Administration of the General Government. Is there no danger from this source? The tremendous money power of this country, and its natural ally, the money power of England, are brought to bear, as we have too often witnessed, not only upon elections, but upon the elected Representatives of the people. Who can estimate the danger to our institutions, of the concentration of this moneyed power in the hands of the General Government, which it is the object of the Whig party, who support the union of Bank and State, to effect? And this object is to be brought about, not by the Administration and its adherents, but by officers of the State Governments, acting in co-operation with money corporations, to control or set aside the popular will, as expressed at the polls.

But whence is this outcry against the interference of officers of the Federal Government in elections? Does it not arise chiefly from those States where the Opposition to the Administration have the majority? If this influence can be felt much any where, it is in the large cities on the seaboard, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Providence, New Orleans, &c. where there are numbers of custom-house officers. But have not these cities been opposed to the Administration? In Philadelphia the majority for Ritner over Porter was upwards of four thousand. The city of New York, at the last Congressional election, went against the Administration; and if, with the aid of the registry law, the Whigs can drive the people from the polls, they hope to win it again. Who can attribute much influence, for or against an Administration, over the intelligent and spirited population of those cities, to a few weighers and gaugers, inspecters and tide waiters? At all events, their influence does not appear to have been very efficient in commanding a majority.

In the interior of the country, a Government officer is scarcely seen, nor is the power of the Executive, in any way, seen or felt. The workings of our system are so admirable, that the hand of the General Government is rarely visible there. The post offices comprise the only class of public officers that the people generally are often brought in contact with. There are about twelve thousand postmasters. But is it not notorious that more than half of those officers are Opposition men? Mr. Kendall so informs us, in a letter addressed to a member of this House, [Mr. DUNCAN,] at the last session. If any influence be exerted by office holders under the Federal Government, it must be chiefly through this army of officers, and more than half of them, I repeat, are Whigs. The Administration is likely, therefore, to lose at least as much as it can gain by their political influence. Most of these officers are men of some consideration in their own neighborhood, and take the office for the accommodation of their neighbors, and not for the emolument, which is but trifling—sometimes not five dollars a year. The office is too inconsiderable to attach them to an Executive; but, at the same time, it is one which they can, if they please, turn with great power and effect against an Administration, by distributing Federal documents, promoting subscriptions to Federal newspapers, and violating their official duty by franking If these things are done at all, they can surely be done by the Opposition postmasters, to as great an extent, as by those who are friendly to the Administration.

It is in vain, then, that we look to the officers of the customs, or to the deputy postmasters, for the evidence of that influence in support of the Executive, which my colleague so much dreads. Where is it to be found? Will he point to Washington City for proof? Here, under the immediate influence of the President and his cabinet, three-fourths of all the citizens are Whigs. A large portion of the clerks and the heads of bureaus are also opposed to the present Democratic Administration. If, sir, the President is to be censured at all, it ought to be for keeping in office so many of his opponents. If he is to have all the odium, I think he ought to have it for something. From the continual clamor about proscription, a person who knew nothing about it might well suppose that there is some truth in it; but the charge cannot be sustained by the facts of the case. The President does not agree to pursue such a course as I would urge. So far as I am concerned, I would, as to all important officers, sweep the political chessboard; and it is all sheer hypocrisy in the Opposition, when they make any other profession, because, whenever and wherever they have the power, they carry out the principles of indiscriminate proscription.

I would like to see the political friends of my colleague from the State of New York vote for the bill. During the Legislature now in session, the Whig Governor of that State turned out and refused to reappoint six hundred and more Democratic office holders, including those of the lowest grade, down to cullers of staves and heading, and inspecters of sole leather.

Is it not notorious that the Whig City Council of New York turned out every Democrat, even the street scavengers and lamp lighters? Did not the Ritner dynasty carry out the spoils principle, as my colleague has been pleased to call it with a vengeance? He made a clean sweep. The white laborers on the public works were dismissed, and as I have just been informed, negroes were put in their places. In New Jersey, the great broad seal State, every justice of the peace was dismissed; and in Massachusetts, Vermont, Rhode Island, Connecticut, and every other State where they have held the power, the same course has been pursued. If the country should be cursed by the election of the nominee of the Harrisburg Convention, they will change their clamor; but there is no danger that they will ever have that cause for ceasing their hypocritical cry of proscription.

Here, I would have it understood, Mr. Speaker, that notwithstanding I am for a pretty general tumbling overboard, yet I would censure the President, or any other man, for turning out competent, meritorious, and respectable officers, and appointing others just the reverse. But so long as I could find among my own friends, those who were equally competent and deserving, I would invariably give them the preference.

Such, sir, was the doctrine of General Washington in his administration, and who will dispute its correctness? No Administration can, or ought to be supported, that treats its friends with neglect and injustice.

Gen. Washington's opinion on this subject is worthy of repetition in connection with this clamor about proscription. "I shall not," he says, "whilst I have the honor to administer the Government, bring a man into any office of consequence, knowingly, whose political tenets are adverse to the measures which the General Government is pursuing; for this, in my opinion, would be a sort of political suicide. That it would embarass its movements is certain."

Mr. Speaker, I would call attention to the facts contained in a message from the President, in answer to a resolution requesting lists of officers who derive their appointments from the President and Senate, and who have been dismissed from office since the 3d of March, 1789, up to the 3d of March, 1840. Out of those whose commissions are recorded in the office of the Secretary of State, embracing most of the higher officers, the following number of removals have been made, to wit:

	Washington, 8 yrs.	Adams, 4 yrs.	Jefferson, 8 yrs.	Madison, 8 yrs.	Monroe, 8 yrs.	Adams, 4 yrs.	Jackson, 8 yrs.	Van Buren, 3 yrs.
	10	7	50	16	17	5	85	9
Army officers removed by order of the President			3	94	24	7	7	4
Navy officers removed by order of the President		2	5	4	2	1	8
Marine corps		1	1				1
Those whose commissions have been recorded in the Treasury Office since 1833; the records before that time were burnt							10	14

Since the day 2d day of July, 1836, a large class of postmasters receive their appointments from the President and Senate, of which class there have been removed by Mr. Van Buren thirteen.

These results show that but forty removals have been made by Mr. Van Buren, since he came into power, and should put to shame my colleague and others, who are making such an outcry against him for removing "so many" for opinion's sake.

My colleague has been pleased to denominate the Democratic party as the vampire party, and said it could not stand a day if his bill, or the bill introduced in the other end of the Capitol, of like import, had passed; that they would have the same effect on the Democratic party as did the surgeon's knife in despatching the vampire—a history of the existence and destruction of which he cited. What has been the consequence of the use of this surgeon's knife—the gag bill—in the Senate? Whether intended or not, it has bled to death politically two of my colleague's friends, the late Senators from Tennessee, and, should it ever come to a vote in this House, as I hope it will, it may have some further effect in the same way, if indeed it should obtain any votes.

Another charge, which is constantly sounded in our ears in connection with this subject of Executive patronage, is that of defalcation—defalcation. Gentlemen of the Opposition would make the world believe that there have been no defaulters in their ranks. But, sir, we have official documents here to which I appeal for testimony on this subject.

The tremendous defalcation in the city of New York, which furnished so much political capital to the Opposition, and added a new word to our vocabularies, cannot be considered in any other light than a Whig defalcation. The defaulter himself was any thing but a Democrat, and he was supported, recommended, and urged for reappointment by his Whig and Conservative friends. But, waiving this, I a mready to prove, from a document which I hold in my hand, giving a list of defaulters, and the amount of defalcations, from the organization of the Government in 1789, to March 4th, 1837, that there was less money lost under the administration of General Jackson, than was lost under any other Administration since that of George Washington, in proportion to the amounts collected and disbursed. I read from a report submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury, December 30, 1839

From 1789 to 1837 inclusive, the Government lost, by using banks as depositories, and receiving their notes in payment of public dues, thirty-four millions nine hundred and seventy-four thousand seven hundred and twenty two dollars!

It will be seen, by glancing over the following official statement, among other things, that during General Jackson's administration, the losses by defalcations amounted to but twenty-two and a half cents on each hundred dollars of the aggregate expenditures, and sixteen cents on the aggregate collections, whilst during John Quincy Adams's administration, the losses of the former amounted to sixty-six cents on each hundred dollars, and those of the latter to twenty cents on each $100. Yet my colleague and his political associates are exerting every nerve to restore that Administration to power; for though it is not proposed to advance the same man, it is to restore the same odious Federal principles.

Of all the collectors and receivers appointed by Mr. Van Buren, the official documents will show that up to this time there is not one dollar lost by a defalcation on their part.

Now, sir, as my colleague has so much to say about office holders, it may not be improper to talk about a much more numerous, importunate, noisy, and hungry class, the office seekers. Here I would remark, that the energies of office seekers are stimulated by hope of spoil, or by resentment for rejection; and their efforts in opposition to an administration, are much more zealous and efficient than those made by its friends in its favor. It has been doubted, indeed, whether an administration gains any friends through its patronage. Where one person is appointed, many are disappointed, and become disaffected. A French Minister remarked, that in giving appointments to office, he made "a dozen enemies, and one ingrate." Office seekers, too, are more free in the use of party weapons, than their adversaries, the office holders, can be.

Mr. Speaker, I would now call attention to a very extraordinary correspondence between the Union Association of Oswego, New York, and General Harrison's confidential committee at Cincinnati, who have taken him under their especial keeping. They do not intend, it seems, that he shall answer any interrogatories which may be put to him on the subject of Abolition, the Bank, or any other important question, lest he may displease some of the factions that compose the Whig party. They have given him his orders not to make any "further declaration of his principles, for the public eye, whilst occupying his present position." They say they are satisfied that this is the most politic course, from the "consideration that the National Convention deemed it impolitic, at the then crisis, to publish any general declaration of the views of the great Opposition party." Why they did not, I shall take occasion to make known, before I resume my seat. This committee further remark, that, when they reflect "how ably all interests were represented" in the Harrisburg convention, the country will have "a high guarantee" that, "should General Harrison be elected to the Presidency, the office will be happily and constitutionally administered, under the guidance of the same principles which directed our Washington, Jefferson, and Madison."

How ably "all interests" were represented in that convention, I will also furnish abundant evidence evidence which, I fear, will disturb the equanimity of many a good Whig throughout the country.

But who are these conscience keepers of Gen. Harrison, who have fallen so much in love with Jeffersonian principles? Two of them, I understand, are young knights of the green bag, who are in no way identified with the Democracy of the country, and who, if Mr. Jefferson were President now, would oppose him with the same zeal that they oppose the re-election of Martin Van Buren. The other is the notorious John C. Wright, who represented a Jackson district in Congress in 1825, but, in violation of their will and wishes, voted for John Quincy Adams. He edited, I have been informed, a Federal newspaper in Troy, New York, from 1805 to 1809, and heaped such wholesale abuse upon Mr. Jefferson, and the Democratic party, that he was frequently prosecuted for libels, judgments obtained against him, he was broken up, and had to emigrate. Yet, strange to tell, he has become of late a great admirer of Jeffersonian Republicanism! Such are the men who surround Gen. Harrison, and have charge of his opinions—who impudently tell the American people, if they are not pleased with Gen. Harrison's refusal to make any "further declaration of his views," they must attribute the error to them and "his immediate advisers."

Whilst, sir, my colleague is for gagging the office holders, this Federal clique have actually muzzled the chief of the office seekers. Knowing that his principles are in conflict with the best interests of the country, they use him like a machine, which never acts until it is acted upon. When before did a candidate for the higest office within the gift of a free people deny their right to interrogate him on all subjects of public interest? Gen. Harrison has virtually done so, by placing himself in the hands of a confidential committee, who have sealed his lips, and instructed him "to lie low and keep dark" until after the election. Sir, if I had no other objection to Gen. Harrison under the eternal sun of God's heavens, this would be sufficent. It should make every patriot deprecate his election as the greatest calamity that could befal the nation.

But it is pretended that Gen. Jackson had a similar committee. Not a word of this is true. He is not the man to be put in strings, and pulled about like an automaton. He always gave his opinions freely, when interrogated; he never was afraid to "take the responsibility" of saying what he thought, and he ever thought what he said. The Jackson committee at Nashville was selected by the people, for the purpose of defending his character against the ruthless attacks, the infamous slanders, which the Federal party were propagating against him—a thing he disdained to do himself—and not for the purpose of hiding his views or speaking for him on a single political question. No man upon the face of the earth would scorn to have around him a "pack of keepers," more than General Jackson. He is made of different metal, and thank God for it. Before and after his election as President, he answered every interrogatory put to him by committees or individuals, in his own proper name and person.

I will now read the correspondence between General Harrison's "thinkers" and the association alluded to, and will make no further comments. Let the country read and judge for themselves.

OSWEGO, Jan 31, 1840.

To the Hon. WILLIAM H. HARRISON:

DEAR SIR: In accordance with a resolution of the Union Association of Oswego, I am instructed to propose three questions to you, in relation to subjects that a large portion of this section of the country feel a deep interest in. The first is—

Are you in favor of receiving and referring petitions for the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia?

Second—Are you in favor of a United States Bank or some institution similar to that, for the safe keeping and disbursing of the public moneys, and for giving a uniform currency throughout the United States?

And lastly—Would you favor the passage of a General Bankrupt Law, by Congress,—so that its operations might be equal in all the States of the Union?

I have only to say, sir, that the above inquiries are made in accordance with the unanimous wishes of this association, the members of which, I am instructed to say, entertain the highest regard for your past services, and hope, should you be elected to the high office for which you are nominated, that nothing may occur to lessen you in the estimation of a great and free people.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,
MILES HOTCHKISS,
Corresponding Secretary.

CINCINNATI, Feb. 29, 1840.

OSWEGO UNION ASSOCIATION:

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 31st ult. addressed to General Harrison, has been placed in our possession with a view to early attention. This is unavoidable in consequence of the very numerous letters daily received by the General, and to which his reply in person is rendered absolutely impracticable. As from his confidential committee, you will look upon this response; and if the policy observed by the committee should not meet with your approbation, you will attribute the error rather to ourselves and his immediate advisers than Gen. Harrison. That policy is, that the General make no further declaration of his principles, for the public eye, whilst occupying his present position.

Such a course has been adopted, not for purposes of concealment, nor to avoid all proper responsibility; but under the impression that the General's views, in regard to all the important and exciting questions of the day, have heretofore been given to the public, fully and explicitly; and that those views, whether connected with constitutional or other questions of very general interest, have undergone no change. The committee are strengthened in regard to the propriety of this policy; that no new issue be made to the public, from the consideration that the national convention deemed it impolitic at the then crisis, to publish any general declaration of the views of the great Opposition party, and certainly the policy, at the present, remains unaltered. In the mean time, we cannot help expressing the hope, that our friends, every where, will receive the nomination of Gen. Harrison with something akin to general confidence. When we reflect upon the distinguished intelligence of the nominating convention—how ably all interests were represented in that body; we certainly have a high guarantee, that should General Harrison be the successful candidate for the Presidency, that office will be happily and constitutionally administered, and under the guidance of the same principles which directed our Washington, Jefferson, and Madison. Believing you will concur with us in the propriety of the policy adopted, we have the pleasure in subscribing ourselves

Your friends,
DAVID GWYNNE,
J. C. WRIGHT,
O. M. SPENCER.

H. E. SPENCER, Cor. Sec'y.

Mr. Speaker, a great deal has been said by the Whigs about Gen. Harrison's pretended poverty. For popular effect, they have denominated him the log cabin and hard cider candidate. Sir, if you could travel down the Ohio river and look at his princely estate at North Bend—with a dwelling more like a palace than a cottage—with two or three thousand acres of land, worth from fifty to one hundred dollars per acre, and surrounded by every comfort that life can bestow, you would be ready to exclaim, "if this be poverty, then I am willing to be poor the remainder of my days." Born of wealthy parentage, he never knew what want was. And why should he? Ever since he left his paternal roof, he has been sucking at the Treasury pap—has been an office holder—and has pocketed from the General Government between seventy and eighty thousand dollars! I do not make this assertion without being armed with proof, as the official statement which I have will show. Let it be read every where.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

Harrison, esq. for his services in the civil and military capacities in which he has been employed by the Government, so far as has been ascertained from the books and files of the office of the Third Auditor, prepared in pursuance of a letter from the Hon. A. Smith, H. R. of the 19th March, 1840, referred to this office by the Secretary of the Treasury for a report, viz:

He no doubt received the pay and emolnments to which his rank entitled him, and for which he would receipt on the field and staff and company rolls; the accounts, however, being destroyed by the burning of the public buildings, the amount cannot now be ascertained.

Pay and emoluments as Major General in command of the troops on the Northwestern frontier and Northwestern army, from the 25th August, 1812, to the 1st March, 1813, and as Major General of the United States Army from the 2d March, 1813, the date of his appointment, to the 31st May, 1814, when he resigned, viz:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
THIRD AUDITOR'S OFFICE, March 25, 1840.
PETER HAGNER, Auditor.

These statements, sir, do not include the thousands which Gen. Harrison is annually receiving from the office he now holds at Cincinnati. They show, too, that from the time he first entered the public service, up to the last payment which was made him, he received about two thousand dollars per annum! Away, then, with the misrepresentations of the Opposition in reference to his pecuniary condition. Let them cease the doleful cry of and no more attempt to foist him into the Presidential chair, by appealing to our sympathies, rather than to our judgments.

I hold in my hand, Mr. Speaker, a pamphlet containing the proceedings of the late Harrisburg Convention, together with the names of the delegates from the several States, who nominated Gen. Harrison a candidate for the Presidency. In looking over this pamphlet, the inquiry suggested itself to my mind, who were these delegates? What are their professions? What are their principles? Were they delegates "fresh from the people," or were they the representatives of moneyed corporations, of mere town politicians and street brawlers? Although I knew the task would be an arduous one, and the performance of it might call down upon my head the vengeance of the Opposition, yet I set about it, and have collected a mass of information on all these points, which I will take this opportunity of laying before the House and the country. I would here state that I have derived my information, not from one, nor two, but at least fifty members of Congress from every portion of the Union, and have full confidence myself, that it is strictly correct, so far as it goes. If, however, I should make any statement which is not substantially true, in regard to a single delegate in that convention, I wish to be corrected as I proceed. I would do no man intentional injustice, neither will I deal in abuse. I will simply give such facts as I have been able to obtain, and in doing which, it will be clearly shown, whether General Harrison is the "people's candidate" or not—whether he is the candidate of those who live in "log cabins" and drink "hard cider." I will also note those who were for John Q. Adams for the Presidency. I wish to show the gentleman from Massachusetts how many old friends he had in the Harrisburg convention, and at the same time to let my colleague see with whom he and the Whigs of Tennessee are co-operating. It may be that my colleague has changed his opinions of his present political associates since 1827, when he charged Mr. Adams and Mr. Clay, in a letter to his constituents, with coming into power under "circumstances affording all the evidences of a coalition, formed upon the basis of mutual benefits to be received and conferred," when he alleged that doctrines were held by that Administration, "subversive of the first principles of free Government." At any rate he seems to be in strange company. But to the convention:

PRESIDENT.

JAMES BARBOUR of Virginia, lawyer, was Mr. Adams's Secretary at War; also Minister to England under the same Administration.

Mr. LINCOLN rose, and called the gentleman to order. He was not in the habit of interrupting the course of the discussions going on, but the course of debate of the gentleman from Tennessee was such, that he felt it his duty to endeavor to put a stop to it. The gentleman was giving biographical sketches, and commenting on the political conduct of individuals over the whole Union. Such a course of debate was entirely out of order; and he called upon the SPEAKER now to decide whether the rules of the House were to be enforced or not.

Mr. WATTERSON said that his colleague [Mr. BELL] had yesterday entertained the House with a discussion on the influences exercised by office holders in the political affairs of the country, and he thought it but right, as an offset to that course of argument, to show the influence attempted and exercised by those seeking office. He wanted to show the political characters of the motley assemblage of those seeking to break down the present Administration, and the discordant materials of which their party was composed.

Messrs. STARKWEATHER, GENTRY, MASON, WISE, BRIGGS, and WELLER, also spoke to this point of order, when on motion of Mr. WELLER, Mr. WATTERSON, was permitted to go on.

Mr. WATTERSON regretted very much that he had been interrupted, because he could have concluded his remarks in the time occupied by the interruption. He said his colleague [Mr. BELL] had been denouncing the officers of the Government as vampires, sucking blood out of the country. And was it irrelevant to the subject before the House for him (Mr. WATTERSON) to speak of those who wanted to come into power? But, in order or out of order, the House had given him liberty to proceed, and he would do so? Who acted in the Harrisburg Convention as

VICE PRESIDENTS?

THOMAS METCALF, of Kentucky. He was a Representative to Congress in 1825, and voted for John Quincy Adams

ELISHA M. HUNTINGDON, of Indiana, lawyer, and was for John Quincy Adams.

PETER R. LIVINGSTON, of New York, a retired lawyer, and was for John Quincy Adams.

JACOB BURNET, of Ohio, lawyer, is an avowed Federalist, and wore the black cockade in 1798. But let him speak for himself:

CINCINNATI, Nov. 1837.

DEAR SIR: Though I am not disposed to say much, or indeed any thing of myself, further than is necessary in stating the transactions in which I participated, yet I am unwilling to conceal the fact, that I was, and ALWAYS HAVE BEEN, A FEDERALIST. Educated in that school, I retain and CHERISH THE NAME, as descriptive of the purest Republican patriots the country has ever produced.

JACOB BURNET.

To J. DELAFIELD, jr.

I would add, that Judge Burnet was one of Gen. Harrison's chief spokesmen in the convention. So well were the delegates pleased with his speech, in which he pronounced Harrison a Jeffersonian Republican, that, by a vote of the convention, it was appended to their proceedings. It has also been published in pamphlet form in this city, and extensively circulated throughout the country. Verily, it appears a little odd to hear "black cockade Federalists" eulogizing men for their "Jeffersonian Republicanism.

Mr. LINCOLN again called Mr. W. to order; and an animated debate arose, in which Mr. LINCOLN, BROWN of Tennessee, CLIFFORD, BELL, WISE, CHAPMAN, and CUSHING participated.

Mr. CRABB moved that the gentleman from Tennessee be permitted to proceed; which motion was agreed to.

Mr. WATTERSON then resumed his remarks. He said he was anxious to get at General Harrison's principles, and the principles of the Whig party generally, which he could not do, without going into the Harrisburg convention, and seeing who were there. Although it might not be very palatable to Whig members, to see the war carried into their own camp, yet he hoped they would stand the fire, and not jump behind the rules of the House quite so often for protection. But even the rules were not wide enough to cover over that convention; for if he were stopped, he pledged himself that their names should appear in his published speech. But he was obliged to the House for leave to go on, and should continue his biographical sketch.

VICE PRESIDENTS.

JOHN ANDREW SCHULTZ of Pennsylvania. He was elected Governor of that State by the Democratic party, but soon evinced symptoms of apostacy, and ultimately leaped over into the Federal ranks, where he has been a valiant soldier for near ten years.

JAMES WILSON of New Hampshire, lawyer, anti-war Federalist, Abolitionist, and was for John Quincy Adams. When a candidate for Governor of that State, in 1838, he advocated the most ultra Abolition doctrines. "Congress has power," said he, in reply to the interrogatories of the Abolitionist, "to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia and in the Territories, and the slave trade there and between the States. I am of opinion Congress ought, without delay, to exercise the power that body has over the subject."

ISAAC C. BATES of Massachusetts, lawyer, bank director, agent for Massachusetts claims, member of the State council, an old Federalist, and was for John Quincy Adams.

Here Mr. CUSHING called Mr. WATTERSON to order, and the question of "order" was debated by Messrs. DAWSON, DUNCAN, and others, when

On motion of Mr. BANKS of Virginia,

Mr. WATTERSON was permitted to proceed. He was unfortunate, he observed, in having so many points of "order" raised upon him, particularly as his colleague had spoken nearly seven hours, and, a part of the time, had wandered much further from the subject before the House than he had done. Why did not these great sticklers for "order" arrest his remarks? Why did they not bring him back from France, whither he had roved in search of vampires? No, no; their "bull" was then goring "our ox," and it was all well enough; but so soon as the "goring" commences on the other side, the "galled jades" begin to "wince," and they bellow out "foul play." Now for the other

VICE PRESIDENTS.

JOHN S. PETERS of Connecticut, physician, and a stockholder in banks. He was once a Jackson man, but deserted about the time of the panic, which was gotten up by the Opposition, in consequence of the removal of the deposites from the Bank of the United States.

DAVID HAZARD of Delaware, merchant, director of a bank, and was for John Quincy Adams.

GEORGE HOWARD of Maryland, formerly Governor, and was for John Quincy Adams.

EPHRAIM MARSH of New Jersey, proprietor and keeper of a hotel at a fashionable watering place, and was for John Quincy Adams.

JOHN OWEN of North Carolina, planter.

SECRETARIES.

CHARLES B. PENROSE, of Pennsylvania, lawyer. He made a two days' speech in the Legislature of that State, in 1834, against the Bank of the United States, and such was his decided oppesition to that institution and the Whig party, that he was re-elected in 1835 or 6. But lo! to the astonishment of every body, he immediately tumbled over into the Federal ranks, and to cap the climax of his apostacy, voted for the recharter of the bank, and by his influence carried the measure over the heads of the Democracy. He is also notorious on account of the part which he took in the memorable "buck-shot war" at Harrisburg in 1838, and will never be forgotten for the heroic exploit, whilst Speaker of the Senate at that time, of becoming frightened at his own imagination and jumping out of the back window.

SYLVANUS R. LYMAN, of Maine, merchant. He is now a member of the Legislature, and voted for a resolution instructing the Representatives in Congress, from that State, to rescind the resolution refusing to receive or act upon Abolition petitions.

CHARLES PAINE, of Vermont, manufacturer, and the son of Elijah Paine, who was appointed District Judge of Vermont by the elder Adams. He was for John Quincy Adams.

GEORGE W. RALPH, lawyer, and was for John Quincy Adams.

I will now, Mr. Speaker, take up the States represented in the Harrisburg convention in geographical order.

MAINE.

JOHN NEAL, lawyer, and was for John Quincy Adams.

Samuel Bradley, another delegate to the Harrisburg convention, is a lawyer, Abolitionist, and was for John Quincy Adams.

Here Mr. W. was again called to order by Mr. SALTONSTALL, who said he would like to know what the Hartford convention had to do with the subject before the House.

Mr. WISE must in justice say, after making a speech in favor of the gentleman from Tennessee, that his imagination could not see the relevancy of his remarks.

Mr. WATTERSON. I have said nothing about the Hartford Convention. The gentleman from Massachusetts seems to be extremely sensitive on that subject, and furnishes a striking illustration of the fact that the "wicked fleeth, when no man pursueth." I am very sorry to be called to order so often. If members of the Opposition on this floor would strictly confine themselves to order, I would strictly confine myself to order. If gentlemen will not permit me to lay before the House the complexion of the delegates to the Harrisburg Convention, they cannot deprive me of the privilege of doing so when I write out my remarks. But as I have sat here from day to day, and listened to Whig members making party speeches, which had no relevancy, not the most remote, to the subject before the House, I little expected, I confess, to hear myself called to order so repeatedly from that quarter.

[Cries of "go on," "go on," from many—let's have all their names]

Mr. WATTERSON said, no. Leave had been given him to proceed several times, and before he could define the position of more than a single delegate or two in that convention, he was again called to order; and he was now determined to go on with his comments, which he supposed would be in order.

[Names of the delegates from the different States in the Harrisburg Convention, which Mr. W. was not permitted to lay before the House. But he pledged himself that they should appear in his written speech, and here they are:]

MAINE.

ELISHA H. ALLEN, lawyer. He is a member of the Legislature of that State, and recently voted to instruct their Representatives in Congress to rescind W. Cost Johnson's resolution against the reception of Abolition petitions.

GEORGE PENDLETON, merchant, Abolitionist, and was for John Quincy Adams.

RICHARD H. VOSE, lawyer, Abolitionist, and was for John Quincy Adams.

ZINA HYDE, merchant, Abolitionist, and was for John Quincy Adams.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

GODFREY STEPHENS, merchant, and was for John Quincy Adams.

SOLOMON MCNEIL, speculator, and was for John Quincy Adams.

JAMES WILSON, lawyer, Abolitionist, and was for John Quincy Adams.

JOEL EASTMAN, lawyer, Abolitionist, a defeated candidate for Congress, and was for John Quincy Adams.

MASSACHUSETTS.

PELEG SPRAGUE, a lawyer, was for John Quincy Adams, and formerly a Senator in Congress from Maine. He came to Boston, it is shrewdly suspected, because he was too aristocratic for Democratic Maine.

SAMUEL HOAR, lawyer, Federalist of the bluest sort, bank director, Abolitionist, and was for John Quincy Adams.

ARTEMAS LEE, manufacturer, Abolitionist, bank director, and was for John Quincy Adams.

JOHN HOWARD, cashier of the Springfield Bank, and was for John Quincy Adams.

WARREN LOVERING, lawyer, bank commissioner, and was for John Quincy Adams.

JAMES H. DUNCAN, lawyer, president of the Merimack Bank at Haverhill, member of the State Council, and was for John Quincy Adams.

RICHARD HAUGHTON, editor of the Boston Atlas, and it is said was not a delegate to the Harrisburg Convention, but went as tender to Peleg Sprague. As his name is found, however, among the list of delegates for Massachusetts, it is sufficient to say that he is an Abolition apologist, (as is almost every other delegate from that State) and was for John Quincy Adams.

RHODE ISLAND.

GEORGE G. KING, lawyer, bank commissioner, bank stockholder, and was for John Quincy Adams. In 1839, he made a speech in the Legislature of Rhode Island against Mr. Atherton's anti-Abolition resolutions, adopted by the House of Representatives in Congress, and in favor of the Abolition cause generally.

JAMES F. SIMMONS, president of a bank in the city of Providence, is a large stockholder in banks, and an old Federalist. He was for John Quincy Adams, and is now a warm admirer of that veteran in Federal doctrines, except when he kicks out of the traces, and then he curses him. Mr. Simmons is a leading politician in Rhode Island, and an aspirant for a seat in the Senate of the United States. A little better than a year ago, he made a speech against ATHERTON'S resolutions, in which he aimed to conciliate the Abolitionists.

WILLIAM ANTHONY, manufacturer, bank director, and was for John Quincy Adams.

BYRON DIMAN, manufacturer, a stockholder in several banks, was a quasi Jackson man until Jackson vetoed the Bank. He is now the Whig candidate for lieutenant Governor of Rhode Island.

NEW YORK.

CHANDLER STARR, merchant, bank commissioner, and was for John Quincy Adams.

JOHN A. KING, lawyer, son of Rufus King, and was appointed Chargé d'Affaires to England by John Quincy Adams. He is the same man who lately introduced a resolution into the Legislature of New York, denouncing a resolution adopted by this House, in regard to Abolition petitions, together with the Democratic Representatives from that State who voted for it.

DUDLEY SELDEN, lawyer, and bank director.

JUDAH HAMMOND, lawyer, and speculator in real estate, in the city of New York.

He made a speech in the Virginia convention, in which he contended that the log cabin men, whom he called the peasantry, ought not to be entitled to the right of suffrage, any more than the slaves, as they were not qualified to judge of political affairs. WM. S. MURPHY, lawyer, and the same man whose card, denouncing Senator Allen, was paraded in the columns of the Madisonian not long since. The reason of his bullying proclamation will be duly appreciated when the fact is made known, that he, the aforesaid Wm. S. Murphy, was a candidate for Congress, in 1833, against Mr. Allen, and only received one vote in the town in which he resided, and but fifty-five votes in the whole district, out of six or eight thousand! And such was the insignificance of the man, to use no harsher term, that Mr. Allen scorned to notice the outpourings of his malice.

[The foregoing list embraces every delegate in the Harrisburg Convention, but eight or nine, whose professions, &c. I could not learn, as they are represented in Congress by Whigs. It will be seen that they are nearly all lawyers, merchants, bank officers, and Abolitionists. Not a log cabin man in the whole catalogue.]

Mr. W. again resumed his remarks. He said the information he had been prevented from laying before the House, would show whose candidate General Harrison was. It would show what kind of "conscript fathers," as he had seen them termed by the Whig press, had assembled at Harrisburg, and nominated him. It would show that, in that convention, there was every hue of opinion—slaveholders and Abolitionists, high tariffites, and those who are for "free trade," Hartford Convention Federalists, and apostate Republicans, latitudinarians, and those who profess to be strict constructionists. No wonder they did not publish an address to the people of the United States setting forth their principles. No wonder Mr. Leigh of Virginia violently opposed, and the convention almost unanimously voted down such a proposition. They knew very well that if all their conflicting principles were spread out before the American people, they could no longer humbug and delude thousands who are honestly co-operating with them. They thought it their best policy to continue their old crusade against the Republican party—without showing their own hands—by misrepresenting facts—impugning motives—crying out corruption—prodigal expenditures—defalcations—bankrupt Treasury—distress—ruin—bloodhounds—bull-dogs—and rascality generally. Sir, with these weapons they have been fighting for years; but thanks to the patriotism and intelligence of the country, such slang and slander make no more impression on the minds of the honest-hearted and sturdy Democrats, than the falling of a sun-parched leaf upon the Rocky mountains. If it had, sir, you would have heard much oftener the roar of cannon, and the voice of Federal orators, celebrating Whig victories.

It would show, also, Mr. Speaker, that aside from their ring-streaked and striped politics, nine-tenths of the delegates in the Harrisburg Convention were lawyers, doctors, traders, speculators, bank officers, and merchants, who hailed from the cities, towns, and villages. This fact fully explains why it is that the Whig newspapers have been teeming with the proceedings of Harrison meetings, responding to his nomination, to use their own language, in such gallant and enthusiastic style! All the delegates had to do, was to return to their respective towns and villages, call together a few counter-hoppers, brokers, pettifoggers, quacks, and skin-flints, appoint a chairman and secretary, draw up a long preamble and resolutions denunciatory of the whole Democratic party, make a few speeches in favor of "Old Tip," fire a few guns, raise a few shouts and huzzas, drink a few bottles of Champagne and call it hard cider, sing a few Tippecanoe songs, and then what a soul-stirring time they had of it—what a glorious Whig revival—what wonderful reactions! The very next number of the village, town, or city Whig paper, as the case may be, contains a glowing account of the most numerous gathering of the people that had been known for years—a spontaneous movement of the bone and sinew of the land—when, in fact, the real people, the inmates of the "log cabins," had no part nor lot in the grand farce, and not a solitary political feeling in common with the prime movers and participators in it. Hence the reason why the Whigs are so often deceived in regard to the elections. They mistake the voice of the few, for the voice of the many. They do not recollect that one Whig blusterer about a town can, and does, make more noise than one hundred Democrats in the country.

Passing, Mr. Speaker, from this National Whig Convention to their State Conventions, and we find them composed of the same materials, both as it regards their professions and politics. I have seen it stated, that there were appointed to the late Whig Convention of Ohio, five hundred and forty-two bank officers, directors, &c., seven hundred and thirty-three office holders, three hundred and forty-six lawyers and doctors, one thousand and forty-eight merchants, clerks and speculators, and upwards of five hundred Abolitionists.

Mr. MASON asked the gentleman what paper he was reading from?

Mr. WATTERSON answered that it was the Ohio Statesman.

Mr. MASON said the statement was wholly untrue in many particulars, to his knowledge. The designation of the individuals in his county was altogether incorrect; and he had been assured by some of his colleagues that it was equally untrue with regard to the counties in which they resided. Indeed, the whole statement had been publicly contradicted in a paper in his State, [naming it,] and the editor who made it called on to produce the proof, which he failed to do.

Mr BOND corroborated the statement of his colleague, [Mr. MASON,] and said that the statement, so far as it regarded the individuals living in his county, was wholly destitut of truth.

Mr. WATTERSON said he did not pretend to be personally acquainted with the individuals named in the paper before him. The paper occupied a respectable standing in the State of Ohio, and he had no reason to doubt its statements. He would like, however, to hear from his Democratic friend from Ohio on the subject.

Mr. MEDILL said he was acquainted with but few of the persons named as having been appointed to attend the convention, and had no other information on the subject than he derived through the various papers of the day. He was entirely willing to rest the correctness of the statement with the people of Ohio, on the assertion of the paper in which it is contained, and the denial of his colleague. The names of the delegates that attended the convention from the county in which he, Mr. M. resided, are not given, except to a very limited extent. The official character of the very few that are reported, is correctly designated. Six of them hold appointments under the Federal Government. They are highly respectable; but, so far from residing in "log cabins," and depending for a precarious subsistence on "hard cider, he believed the whole six were merchants, of considerable capital, and who indulged pretty largely in the good things for which that county was so distinguished.

Mr. WELLER observed, that with the permission of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WATTERSON,] he would like to say a word to his honorable colleague over the way, [Mr. BOND.] The statement made by the Ohio Statesman in relation to the materials which composed the late Whig Convention, had been impeached by his colleague. All he desired to say on this subject was, that so far as that list gave the business and occupations of the delegates appointed from the district which he had the honor to represent, he believed it was strictly correct. He was personally acquainted with nearly all of the individuals named, and therefore had no hesitancy in making the statement.

Mr. WATTERSON. There is one fact which will not be disputed by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BOND.] His political friends in the convention alluded to, would not condescend to let it be known, through the medium of an address, what the Whig party are contending for—what are their principles. No, no. They deemed it more prudent to meet in all the pomp and parade of modern Whigery—in all the antic circumstances of buffoonery—with drums, fifes, bugles, and rams horns—with chicken coops and bald eagles—with bands of bacchanalian singers—with "log cabin" flags floating in the air—with boat loads of Federal orators—with canoes upon wheels, so full of Whig abuse, misrepresentation, calumny, and lawyers eating ginger bread, that it took six horses to pull a single canoe—all for the purpose of hiding the odiousness of their principles from the gaze of an intelligent and Republican people, and diverting their minds from the true issue now before the country. How far they can succeed by such disgusting devices, the ensuing Presidential election will determine.

In connection with this convention I have heard an anecdote, and must ask the indulgence of the House whilst I relate it. It shows conclusively that there was at least one delegate in that numerous and boisterous assemblage, who was immovably honest in his politics, if he were not so in his morals. After the convention had adjourned, and its members had got through their carousals and frolics and debaucheries, one of their number found himself minus something under one hundred dollars. Suspicion fastened itself upon a brother delegate. He was taken up—examined—and sure enough the money was found in his possession. Well, sir, this was too bad—something must be done—it must not go abroad that a Whig had been Swartwouting, and they tried to prevail upon him to avow himself a Democrat. "No, gentlemen, said he, no"—you may call me a thief, a rogue, a villain—but by Heaven, he exclaimed (raising his head erect for the first time) you can't cram Democracy upon me—huzza for "Old Tip."

Mr. Speaker, my colleague closed his speech with some general remarks, and I will take the same liberty.

In glancing over a Whig paper a short time since, my attention was arrested by an article headed in large capitals, "A VOICE FROM THE SOUTH" From the flaming caption, I was induced to read it; and what should I learn but the astounding fact that a steamboat had arrived at the port of Mobile; and among the passengers, a vote had been taken for President, the result of which was, twenty-nine for Harrison, and nine for Van Buren! I began to think that the Democratic party were surely upset at last—that such facts could not be resisted; and I do not know but I should have entirely desponded, on my part, and given up the contest, had it not been for a second thought which occurred to me. I recollected that in travelling up the Mississippi river about two years ago, when it was believed Mr. Clay would be the Whig candidate for the Presidency, a gentleman from Philadelphia, with whom I had formed a partial acquaintance, proposed that we should hold an election, and ascertain the preferences of those on board the boat, as between Mr. Clay and Mr. Van Buren. I assented to the proposition, and we made the count. But lo! I was completely trumped, on finding that out of near one hundred cabin passengers, there were but twenty-three or four for Mr. Van Buren! As a matter of course, I became satisfied that Democracy had but few charms for that crowd, and was just studying how I should parry the laugh, if I may be permitted to use the expression, which had been raised at my expense, when the captain of the boat, who proved to be a sterling Democrat, dyed in the wool, suggested that there were about one hundred and thirty "deck passengers" that we had not taken into the count, the great majority of whom were substantial farmers, the honest "log cabin" men, from Missouri, Illinois, Kentucky, Tennessee, Indiana, Ohio, and Pennsylvania, who had been down to New Orleans with their pork and beef, and corn and flour. Go, said he, and see whether they are Whigs or Democrats? We did go, sir, and what do you suppose was the result of our investigation? As well as I can recollect, there were one hundred and three for Mr. Van Buren, and fourteen for Mr. Clay. It is needless for me to add, that the laugh was most essentially turned upon my Philadelphia friend, who declared he had just found out where the Democrats came from at the time of elections, (the log cabins,) and that he never again would be deceived by those who travel in the cabin on steamboats, in stages, on railroads, or who reside in the cities, towns and villages. Sir, he was right. Democracy flourishes best in the country, where, I hesitate not to say, there is more honesty, more virtue, more manly independence, and more substantial intelligence, than can be found in any of your towns, not excepting the city of Washington, if we are to judge its population by those who composed the Whig "pow-wows" not long since, and who disturbed our slumbers by their groans and hisses, and huzzas and bacchanalian shouts. In that living, moving, ranting band, the boys, negroes, loafers, and a new species of the same animal, familiarly known in the city of New York as soap-locks, took the lead, and the rear was brought up by dismissed office holders, disappointed office seekers, mustached Terriers, perfumed exquisites, with here and there a gentleman from both political parties, who had been drawn out by curiosity to witness their riproarious proceedings. Sir, I would advise them to reserve their groans for a more appropriate occasion. If they will only wait until next autumn, they will have cause to groan much deeper and much more bitterly—provided such an effect can be produced by the triumph of Democracy. When the vote comes to be taken among the log cabins of the hardy West, of the East, of the North, and of the South, these midnight Whig brawlers will learn that the District of Columbia is but a small spot in the Union, and that if even they were entitled to vote in the election of a President, they could scarcely ripple the current on which the Republican party are now sailing to victory. The principles of the General under whose banner they have enlisted, are not congenial to the spirit of our free institutions. They may hold him up as the "log cabin and hard cider" candidate—they may resort to all the tricks usually practised by demagogues—still it all will not do. The people know their rights, and will maintain them; no matter whether they live in log cabins or more comfortable dwellings; no matter whether they they drink hard cider, pale sherry, or pure water. Sir, when I first heard Gen. Harrison called the log cabin and hard cider candidate, I could not help smiling at the credulity of his friends in supposing that American freemen could be swerved from their principles by such miserable humbugery. I was forcibly reminded of a gentleman within my knowledge, who became a candidate for the Legislature of his State. He had been very stiff in his manners, rather aristocratic in his feelings, wore his bosom full of ruffles, and withal had taken but little pains to become acquainted with the sovereigns of his country. But so soon as he threw himself before them for their suffrages, all of a sudden, he dashed away his ruffles, his limbs became much more pliant, a pleasant smile played upon his lips, and he seemed to know every body. On seeing a countryman come into town, he would start after him in a long trot, give him a cordial shake of the hand, and inquire about the health of his family. It was not long, however, before he caught a Tartar, or, as they say sometimes in my country, waked up the wrong passenger. He met in his new complaisant way, an old Revolutionary Whig, a true Whig, sir, who thoroughly understood the science of human nature, and the secret springs which operated upon such men. Sir, said he, to him, "I have known you for ten years; I have never seen you so graciously condescending before; you must be a candidate—now just excuse me if you please, I can't do any thing for you." And such, Mr. Speaker, will be the language of the freemen who occupy log cabins, when they are "graciously" asked to support the candidate of the moneyed aristocracy of banks and soulless corporations, who would grind them into dust, or put the yoke of despotism upon their necks, if it were their interest to do so. They are not to be caught, like the unsuspecting horse, by holding out to them salt in one hand, and a concealed bridle in the other.

Mr. Speaker, I have often been amused at the facility with which the Whigs can make great men. In twenty-four hours they can manufacture out of straw a perfect Goliah in intellect. All their candidates for political offices are total demolishers. They run over their opponents rough shod on all occasions until the elections come on, and then if they should chance to be demolished, which is no unusual occurrence, great astonishment is excited, and the reason of their defeat is always attributed to any other cause than the correct one. In my own State—I hope I shall be pardoned for speaking of my own State, and even of my own canvass, if I wish, as the example has been set me by my colleague, who is an old member upon this floor, and ought to know what is proper, and what is not proper to be spoken here—in my own State, sir, the Whigs have a remarkable talent for this kind of game. Last summer their candidate for Governor, who is a plain sensible man, and when I say that I have done him ample justice, handled his competitor, who is known throughout the Union as a statesman of commanding talents, and unequalled before a popular assembly, with the same ease that a giant would a lilliputian, and they boastingly proclaimed to their friends every where, that they would carry the State by a majority of twenty thousand votes. Letters were published from every Congressional district, giving the gratifying news that the Whig candidates for Congress and the Legislature were slaying their opponents as Sampson slew the Philistines. They vauntingly avowed that they were not content to whip us merely; they intended to give us such a complete drubbing, that we would remember it all the days of our lives; they were determined to make a clean sweep. To such an extent did they carry this puffing and blowing and bragging system, that I sometimes became really alarmed, not only about the fate of my friends, but that of my own. My opponent was eulogized as the "brave, gallant, chivalrous, talented, eloquent, and whole souled champion" of Whig principles. According to their account of it, he was daily turning scores from the Democratic ranks. It was impossible to resist the arguments that emanated from his gigantic mind. He was walking over the course almost without opposition. I was admonished to retire, and not be disgraced by the signal defeat which awaited me, in the event I continued in the field. (I presume, as I was a young man, they did not wish to nip my political prospects in the bud.) But, foolish like, I heeded not their friendly counsel, and was only elected by the slender majority of about fourteen hundred votes! Well, sir, having, by the aid of my Democratic friends, slain this patent right Hercules of the Whig party, I felt a good deal of interest in the success of my Democratic colleagues upon this floor, [Messrs. JOHNSON, TURNEY, BROWN, MCCLELLAN, and BLACKWELL,] whom I had learned, from the Whig newspapers and letter writers, would be politically butchered and hewn to pieces. Judge my agreeable surprise, when the news reached me that not one of them was elected by a smaller majority than thirteen hundred and fifty, or a larger majority than twenty-three hundred! About this time nothing but dismay and consternation pervaded the Whig ranks. They could not tell what in the name of common sense had got into the heads of the people. They were at a loss to account for their unexpected, but Waterloo defeat. At last a bright idea struck some wag right upon the head, and it was, that the Alabamians had come across the line, and voted for the Democratic candidates. Forthwith the Whig press raised the yelp, and the whole party joined in the chorus. "Alabama, O! the cursed Alabamians," was their cry for months. Not once did they dream that it was a triumph of Democratic principles—the calm judgment of a Republican people, brought to bear upon FEDERALISM, APOSTACY, AND GAG LAW SENATORS.

I see, Mr. Speaker, as I have already intimated, that the same system of boasting and puffing is now being carried on by the Whig party upon an extensive scale. From the disputed territory in Maine, to the Sabine, all is enthusiasm for the hero of Tippecanoe. Thousand and tens of thousands are hourly deserting the Administration and flocking around his standard. They have made the wonderful discovery, too—a discovery for which they richly deserve a patent right—that Harrison is the greatest General that ever "lived in the tide of time," and the greatest statesman of this or any other age. Such is the fiery zeal of the people for him, that the mountains and valleys of the North and East, the prairies of the West, and the woods and green moss of the South, are in a tremendous blaze! To stop the current of public opinion which is setting in his favor, is just as impossible as to stop the current of the mighty Mississippi. The farmer is quitting his plough—the mechanic his square and compass—the lawyer his nisi prius—the physician his pills—and the merchant his counter—all for the purpose of attending public meetings and glorifying the nominee of the Harrisburg Convention. Bonaparte, in all his glory, had not more followers, and never was so sure of victory. In their own chaste lingo, the "spoilers will be routed—the Goths and Vandals driven from the Capitol." Sir, this is what we have been hearing for the last three months—it is what we will continue to hear until the next Presidential election. It is the same cry which the Federal party have put up on the eve of every Presidential contest for the last forty years. But, thank Heaven, it is one thing to crow and another thing to vote. The Democratic party, conscious of the correctness of their principles, are not reduced to the necessity of bringing to their aid such contemptible means. When the time arrives, however, they will march up to the polls, in solid column, and give the allied powers of Whigery such a rout as has never been witnessed in this country. Mark the prediction, Mr. Speaker, and when you and I meet again after the close of this session of Congress, if it is not verified, then you may set me down a false prophet.

SPEECH OF MR. BROWN, OF TENNESSEE,

In the House of Representatives, March 17, 1840—On the resolution reported from the Committee of Elections by Mr. CAMPBELL, their chairman, proposing to print all the testimony connected with the New Jersey contested election, and the amendment of Mr. R. GARLAND of Louisiana, to print other testimony referred to that committee, subsequent to its report:

Mr. BROWN desired that the resolution might be read, on which this exciting and extraordinary debate had been going on. He desired it, that the House might be brought back to the precise character of the proposition before it—not one touching the merits of the controversy; not one involving the truth of the facts set forth in the report, nor the action of the House, in admitting five of these gentlemen to temporary membership on this floor. All these things have passed by—the report has been made—it has been sanctioned by the House, and the five gentlemen are now here present in their seats. All the testimony on which these proceedings have taken place, has been reported to the House, and the committee now stand here desiring and insisting that it should be printed. But these papers, now desired to be also printed, were not considered by the committee, because they were never before them in the form of evidence. Not one solitary member ever saw the inside of that package until after the report was made. It was sealed up from all inspection, and therefore constituted no part of the foundation of this report. Why then should it be printed with it, as a part of it, when in truth and fact it was never opened here, nor referred to the committee, until after its report had been made? We desire all the testimony before the committee, and on which the report was founded, to be printed and sent out with it, in order that the people of this country may be able to see and determine whether the committee and this House have done right in the New Jersey case. To print these depositions, which came in after the report, can shed no light on the propriety of what has been done. They are now before the committee, and should continue there until the remaining depositions shall arrive, and the whole case come on for final hearing on the ultimate rights of the party. They will then be printed in connection with the others, and go to the world as a part of the New Jersey case, and receive that attention which they may be found to deserve.

But it is useless to dwell on this point; for it is evident to every one that the proposition is submitted only for the purpose of furnishing an occasion to assail the conduct of the majority of the committee who made the report, and of the House by whom it was confirmed. Sir, it is now notoriously a question of crimination. Having failed to get in the five claimants commissioned by the Governor, and having further failed in excluding the five who actually received the majority of the votes, gentlemen turn round, in the rage and fury of their disappointment, and seek to criminate the conduct of all those by whom their purposes have been frustrated. Proud in the consciousness of having done right, as one member of the committee, I stood ready to meet any and every charge that might be preferred against me, or any of the honorable gentlemen who had concurred in making this report. I expected those charges, if made at all, would surely be preferred by members of the committee—by those whose situation enabled them to form an opinion worth submitting to the American people. Judge, then, Mr. Speaker, my surprise, when I saw the gentleman from Maryland suddenly thrust himself into this controversy, which I had considered as a sort of "family affair," and gravely prefer a long list of charges against the majority of the committee. I do not deny the gentleman's right to do so, nor do I question the sincerity of his declaration, that, in his opinion, there had been something wrong in the action of the committee. But, sir, I now admonish him in advance not to be too precipitate in his conclusions—his situation has not been favorable to a correct knowledge of the facts; and I pledge myself now here, to the House, and the nation, that he has not preferred one solitary charge that cannot be triumphantly refuted.

The gentleman told us that he had looked into our journals, but was constrained to admit that he had only done so slightly. Now, sir, this very admission ought to have suggested to him to have been more sparing in his denunciations. What! did the gentleman think he could examine the contents of this huge volume in a single night? That he could comprehend the profound legal learning of the gentleman from New York, the skilful special pleading of the gentleman from Alabama, and the wily tact of him from Virginia, on so slight and so hasty an inspection? The gentleman can have no sort of idea of the profound mysteries of this new and interesting work.

With no better opportunity than this to obtain correct information, the gentleman selected one portion of the journal here, and another there—a fragment from one place, and a scrap from another, and drawing his conclusions from such disjointed premises, proclaims to the country "that there was something wrong in the committee room." Sir, I expect there was something wrong in that committee room—something wrong in this House—something wrong before the Governor and Privy Council of New Jersey. But I stand here to say, after a full examination of this case, that that wrong is not on the side of those who have maintained the rights of the people of New Jersey against its Governor and Council.

Let it be remembered that no gentleman has ventured to dispute the great and controlling fact which constitutes the sum and substance of this report, to wit: who received the greatest number of votes cast in the New Jersey election. No man has, because no man could deny it. The parties holding the Governor's commission, so far from denying that their competitors did receive the majority of votes, in their written pleadings have substantially admitted it. They have so plainly admitted it, that the committee need not have called a single witness in the case; they need not have taken a solitary deposition; but, walking into this hall, might have laid that written admission on your table, and said to you: "Behold the fact which you required us to ascertain!" In one hour after the pleadings of the parties were closed, the committee might have made the report which they have made, and the House have taken the very action they have taken, on the parties' own admissions: If it be asked why such a report was not made sooner, under such circumstances, my answer is, that those who are now so much abused as an unjust and overbearing majority, never became a majority until the orders of this House had been given, commanding this report to be made. Until then we were in a minority, incapable of controlling any thing. Our propositions were voted down or stricken out, or so altered and amended as to make us finally repudiate them ourselves. This was effected by the chairman generally voting and acting with the other party on all questions involving a report on the state and condition of the poll-books. At length, however, the instructions of the House were given—the chairman yielded obedience to them, and we stood released from that thraldom to which we had been so long subjected.

[Here the morning hour having expired, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the Treasury Note bill.]

MARCH 18.

Mr. BROWN of Tennessee resumed. I will now proceed, in continuation of the remarks began on yesterday. I then complained, and yet think I had a right to complain, that the proceedings of the committee had been so harshly and unjustly condemned by the honorable gentleman from Maryland. It did seem to me, that when this controversy had been narrowed down to the mere crimination of the majority whilst in the committee room, that the gentleman should have left it to be settled by the members of the committee. I advert to this topic again, in order to assure the gentleman that I refer the injustice that he has done, which I know he has done to the majority, more to the want of personal information, than to any disposition to send forth to the world a groundless imputation of our motives and conduct. But I may be mistaken as to the extent of the gentleman's information. He may have learned from others, in whom he confides, much more than he could find out from his necessarily slight and superficial inspection of our journals. However this may be, the gentleman, day after day, indulged in a freedom and boldness of crimination, that demands a prompt and decisive refutation. Scattered, as they were, through a very long speech, I feared, at one time, that I should not be able to collect and arrange them. But he was kind enough yesterday to recapitulate, and to condense them into a small compass.

His first charge was, that the committee had failed to discharge its duties, as pointed out by the standing rules of the House giving existence to the committee. That rule declares:

"That it shall be the duty of the Committee of Elections to examine and report upon the certificates of election, or other credentials, of members returned to serve in this House."

Now I desire to know whether the gentleman from Maryland did mean to make the impression on this House, that the committee had not performed that portion of its duty; that we had not examined the commissions, and decided on them. If these were the gentleman's objections to our proceedings, it was easy to show that he was mistaken.

[Mr. JENIFER here explained.]

If I understand the gentleman's explanations, I have not misapprehended his meaning. I refer him to the resolution under which this case was referred to the committee. That goes beyond the standing rules, and requires us to ascertain and report who were entitled to occupy the five vacant seats from the State of New Jersey. This opened up the whole question: the commissions, the returns, the poll books; in fact, every thing on which the right of membership depended. Now, sir, it has been asserted here, and the public press has spread it all over this country, that the committee paid but little or no attention to the Governor's commissions; that they were treated with no respect; regarded as amounting to no sort of evidence in the case whatever. This bold and reckless assertion has no doubt gone where no refutation of mine can ever overtake it. But, as far as I am able, I will send the denial after it. I will send the journal, too, so soon as it shall be printed, beneath whose withering rebuke such assertions cannot stand. Every member of that committee must know, and does know, that the credentials occupied a large portion of our attention, and were the subject of anxious and serious consideration. I refer to page 79 of that journal:

"Whereupon Mr. BOTTS moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this committee will now proceed to decide on the legality and validity of the commissions granted by the Governor of New Jersey;"

It being the first question presented and the whole testimony relating to that branch of the subject having been read. The same fact of these commissions having been read and considered is indelibly engraved on other pages of this book, and leaves no ground for cavil or dispute. I shall have frequent occasion to refer to this book, and I must beg pardon of the gentleman from Virginia in advance, if I should happen to designate it as "Botts's journal." I can hardly open it any where, without coming across his name, standing in bold relief, in almost perpetual conspicuosity. Beside this, the gentleman was admittedly the chief architect of this large superstructure; I mean the plainer and more substantial (if any be substantial) parts of the work. The ornamental parts were executed by the gentlemen from New York and Alabama, with the exception of a little fretwork by the gentleman from Connecticut.

On the authority of this record, then, I aver that the commissions of the Governor were read—that they were considered—were argued at great length by the parties, and a distinct vote taken on their validity and sufficiency. Yet, sir, the country has been told, often told, directly the reverse. The majority of this committee, at this very moment, stand arraigned at the bar of public opinion, for having given to the commissions no attention, and for having treated with silent indifference, if not contempt, the broad seal of one of the old and gallant thirteen States of the Union. On what evidence have they been arraigned? On none. Bold assertion was substituted for evidence, and reckless invective supplied the place even of probability or presumption. By what evidence is the charge disproved? By this record, and by the personal knowledge of every member of the committee.

The gentleman from Virginia, from the beginning, had entertained the opinion that nothing but the commissions could entitle the gentlemen to their seats. He had avowed and enforced that opinion in an elaborate argument on this floor, before the committee had ever sat upon the case. Was it likely, therefore, that he would permit the questions growing out of those commissions to lie neglected and unnoticed before the committee? So far from it, sir, the supremacy of the commissions seemed to fill all his thoughts; it was the beginning and the end of his whole judgment in the case.

Mr. Speaker, I come now to the second charge preferred by the gentleman from Maryland against the majority of the committee. He says that the committee passed a resolution that it would not proceed to determine the question of ultimate right between these parties until the second Monday in April, and that this report is in violation of that resolution. Well, sir, the resolution says that the committee would not decide on the question of ultimate or final right, until the time designated. Have we decided on such right? Have we reported on it? Not at all. We have only decided and reported on the right of present occupancy of the contested seats, whilst the inquiry as to the ultimate right was going on. The ultimate right depended on the purgation of the polls. In New Jersey the vote is given by general ticket; the whole State would have to be ransacked in search of illegal votes, which would necessarily require much time. The question, therefore, arose who should be the sitting members during the period allowed for collecting this testimony? The report made only covers that point of present occupancy, and has no reference to the ultimate rights of the parties at all. Where, then, is the violation of this resolve of the committee? The gentleman should have spared his reflections on the committee on another ground. He should have remembered that even this report on the present occupancy of the seats was not made until we received the express and peremptory orders of this House. When these were given, all that was left to us was the simple duty of obedience. Will the gentleman censure us for that? Would he have had us to set up our own resolves of a prior date, in open defiance of the resolves and commands of this House? Surely the gentleman could not have matured this objection in his own mind before he preferred it against the committee. But he evidently preferred this only as inducement to his third and most objectionable and groundless charge of all. He says that the committee having adopted that resolution and sent off the claimants in search of their testimony, it was a violation of its faith and solemn pledges to have made this report without giving them notice. True, he attempts to draw a distinction in favor of the committee, by regarding it only as accessory, whilst he looks upon the House as the principal in the perpetration of this foul deed of violated faith. Sir, I reject the distinction. If the charge were true, I should consider the magnitude of the offence as constituting all principals concerned in its commission. But, sir, is that charge true? The gentleman preferred it in a tone and manner so excited, that he found it necessary to explain or apologize to the House for it. He illustrated his opinion of the conduct of the committee and the House, by referring to his frequent agreements to pair off with members of this House, until a specified time, and declared that he should have considered himself dishonored by a violation of any such pledge or agreement. All this, sir, was reiterated through a speech of several days' length—reporters and letter writers have sent the charges to the public press, and that has distributed them to every portion of this continent. Denunciation and assertion may achieve a temporary triumph over truth and evidence. But it will be only a temporary one. This record shall go forth to the world. It shall follow up these high charges of the gentleman from Maryland, and show to the American people how destitute of foundation they are. I refer to page 127, where it appears that the committee reserved the right to make a preliminary report, whenever they might think proper to do so. To page 129, where a proposition to that effect was made by Mr. MEDILL. To page 147, where another was made by Mr. FISHER. To page 138, which shows that the parties on both sides were then present, and heard the discussions, and witnessed the action of the committee on the proposition. How, then, can it be said or pretended that they left the city without notice that a preliminary report was contemplated? They knew that the right to make such a report had been always reserved. They knew that every attempt to take away that right had been defeated. They knew that the making of such a report would not interfere with their preparations on the question of ultimate right. They knew that they would have to go home to take the balance of their testimony, whether such a report was made or not. They knew all this. I say they knew more. They knew that a resolution instructing the committee to make such a report, had been introduced by Mr. TURNEY of Tennessee, and was then actually pending before the House. These facts are all recorded, and yet it is pretended that they retired to New Jersey in conscious security, confiding in the honor and integrity of the committee, and of this House! They were deceived and taken by surprise! surprise about what? surprised by a report, declaring that their opponents had received a higher number of votes than themselves in the New Jersey election? That was impossible, for they had never denied the fact; they had substantially admitted it. The records of New Jersey demonstrated it beyond all possibility of denial.

Sir, I have no patience for a further exposure of this groundless charge of broken pledges and violated faith. I pass to another charge, equally unmerited and equally unfounded. We are charged with making our report with unjust precipitation, without ever having examined the testimony referred to us by the House. That, in so doing, the committee had practised a fraud on this House, and the nation, who had a right to expect that we had examined all the testimony in the case: others have made the same imputation on the proceedings of the committee, and I will, therefore, appeal again "to the law and the testimony;" to the gentleman's (from Virginia) own book; to that favorite record, which he watched and guarded with more care than all the other members of the committee beside. The testimony was gone over twice The first time to read the evidence, to hear the parties on it, and to note down the objections made by them. This may be all seen on the journal, from page 70 to page 89. The second time it was gone over, was for the purpose of deciding on the various points made by the parties, touching the admissibility and competency of the evidence in the case. Our proceedings for this purpose may be seen from page 96 to 126. The testimony was examined under the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we will now take up the testimony which has been referred to this committee in the New Jersey case." It was taken up without any limitation or qualified purpose whatsoever. On page 70, we find this entry: "And thereupon the committee proceeded to the hearing of the testimony" and "the certificates of the Governor of New Jersey were read." Again on page 75, "And the following documents being the same that were referred, &c. were severally taken up and read." On page 79, may be found the following entry:

"Mr. Botts moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That this committee will now proceed to decide on the legality and validity of the commissions granted, &c. it being the first question presented, and the whole testimony relating to that branch of the subject having been read."

On page 81: "The paper No. 13 was then taken up; and page 83: "And thereupon paper No. 13 was read." This same paper, No. 13, relating to the polls at South Amboy was again taken up and rejected, Mr. Botts only, of all the committee, voting for it. It is further shown by the journals "that there being no further testimony before the committee, Mr. Botts moved the following resolution, &c." The different portions of testimony were designated by numbers, and the record shows in relation to every one of them, "that they were read." In going over the testimony the second time, we heard the parties on the various objections made and noted down the first time, and decided whether each number was admissible or competent testimony. Those depositions which were rejected were laid aside, the parties avowing that they desired and intended to take them over again.

It is on this ground that gentlemen on the other side have fallen into a great error. They have contended that the committee had never heard or considered the testimony, except as it relates to the question of competency. I have already read to the House the resolution under which it was taken up and considered. It contained no limitation of purpose whatsoever. On the contrary, an attempt was made and strenuously insisted on, that it should be taken up and considered for that purpose only; but the limitation was stricken out and the inquiry gone into unrestricted. But it seems that its sufficiency was never passed upon by the committee in public vote, so as to constitute a hearing or consideration of the testimony in reference to the making up of a report. Was such a thing ever heard of in a committee room as an abstract question of sufficiency? Sufficiency for what? You could never determine that, until a distinct action on the case was proposed, and then each member would decide for himself, whether the testimony was sufficient to sustain such a proposition. Look to analogies from the proceedings of our courts of justice. Our Judges and Chancellors decide and pass on all questions of the competency or admisibility of evidence, raised by counsel in the progress of a cause, but you can never learn their opinions on its sufficiency until they pronounce their judgment or decree in the case. That judgment or decree will of course be according to their opinions of the sufficiency of the testimony to sustain it; but no separate or distinct judgment is passed upon it. It is a silent process of the mind, unannounced, and only to be inferred from the nature of the decision made. The verdict of a jury on the issue of guilty or not guilty, evinces the opinion of the jury of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence; but it is only in the act of rendering that verdict, that a jury could be called on or considered as expressing such opinions. So, sir, of the proceedings of this committee. This testimony having been taken up without restriction—having been heard as competent in the case, would be treasured up in each member's mind until some report or other action on it was called for, and then each would decide (by a silent process of his own mind) for himself, whether the evidence was sufficient to sustain and justify such report or other action. Thus it is, sir, in the face of this analogy from the practice of the courts and against the very reason and nature of the case, gentlemen on the other side have often exclaimed, Where is the evidence that the sufficiency of this testimony was ever examined and decided by the committee? My answer is still given from this record: The vote on the following resolution was a decision on the sufficiency of the testimony.

"Mr Brown introduced the following:

"Resolved, That the report just read be adopted."

The vote on this resolution was a test of every member's opinion of the sufficiency of the evidence: and the first test that could have been applied, without a gross violation of all parliamentary and judicial practice.

[The morning hour having expired, the House went into Committee of the Whole on the Treasury Note bill.]

MARCH 19.

Mr. Brown of Tennessee resumed as follows:

At the close of my remarks on yesterday, I thought that I had sufficiently refuted the charge preferred against us, of not having examined the evidence referred to us by this House. The gentleman from Maryland now informs me, that his chief complaint was, and yet is, that we did not open and examine the depositions now generally known "as the mysterious package." I thank the gentleman for any suggestion calculated to abbreviate our defence and explanations of this report. I think I can satisfy any candid and impartial mind, that said package was never before the committee; that it was never there as evidence; never there in any form or manner, so as to enable us to act on its contents. I remember well when it made its first appearance in the committee room: it was on the day when the committee assembled for the purpose of receiving the report which the chairman had been directed to prepare, in obedience to the orders of the House. We had assembled for that special and only purpose. True, we might have met there at any rate. We had met there so often, that it is very likely that the mere force of habit might have taken us there again. However this may be, when we were assembled, it was not for the purpose of reopening the case, or of taking any new order in it, but simply to ascertain whether the chairman had prepared the report, agreeably to the directions of the committee, given on the Saturday previous. When so assembled, and for such purpose only, this mysterious package made its appearance. It was brought there by the gentleman from Connecticut. It was laid by him on the table at which the chairman was sitting. After permitting it to lie there for some time, the gentleman said something that called the attention of the chairman to it. It was found to be a sealed package, directed to the Speaker of the House, but to the care of the chairman of the committee, and endorsed, "Depositions in the New Jersey case." Mr. Smith moved, informally, (not being in writing,) that the chairman should open the package. He replied that the package was not directed to him, but to the Speaker, and he did not feel at liberty to break open its seals, but it being directed to his care, he would deliver it to the Speaker as soon as his convenience would admit of it. The motion, or proposition, not being in writing, no vote of the committee was taken on it. The chairman then read his report, and I moved that it should be adopted; and pending that motion, the gentleman from Connecticut moved that the package should be sent to the Speaker, to be by him opened, and an order of reference be obtained from the House. During all this time, our proceedings were to stand suspended. It might be several days before the order could be obtained from the House, and if debate happened to spring up upon it, which was very probable, it might even be weeks before it was obtained; and the instructions of the House to us, to make a report forthwith, be entirely disregarded. The committee refused to submit to any further delays; they confirmed the report, and ordered it to be submitted to the House. It is for this they have been so often and so severely censured by gentlemen in the course of this debate. It is now said that if the committee had examined this package, it would have established a number of illegal votes sufficient to have prevented at least one of these gentlemen from being admitted to his seat. Sir, who ever pretended that this package related to illegal votes, until we heard it in debate? Did the gentleman from Connecticut, who presented it, say that it related to illegal votes? Did he ever once hint such an idea before the committee? Not at all. There, we were told on the face of his own resolution, that it related to the manner of holding the poll at South Amboy; here, we are informed that it related to the reception of illegal votes. Why this strange discrepancy between the information given then, and the complaints made now? Sir, I think I can tell you why.

On the question as to the manner of holding the South Amboy polls, gentlemen do not desire to make too prominent an issue. These objections stand on too narrow and technical a foundation. They therefore fly off in pursuit of a new idea—a mere after-thought—which either never occurred to themselves, or was suppressed by them at the time this decision was made. Let it be remembered, Mr. Speaker, that this sealed package was no part of the old testimony. It had been recently taken, whilst both parties were engaged in taking testimony in New Jersey. They had been allowed until the second Monday in April for that purpose. When that time should expire, they were expected to return to this city, bringing with them the depositions which they had taken. Now, sir, why was it that this particular deposition had strayed off from the others, and been hurried to this city by itself? Why had it not been sent to the Speaker of the House, to whom it was directed, and as it is expressly required to be by the laws of New Jersey. I have those laws now before me, and they expressly require that they should have been sent to the Speaker. It was not sent by the public mail. When and by whom it had been sealed did not appear, and there were no endorsements to guard its alteration. What is required generally in our courts of law and equity in similar cases? The commissioner must certify that the deposition was sealed up without having been out of his possession, and without alteration. If sent by private conveyance, the person conveying it must certify on oath that he received it from the commissioner, and that the same has been unaltered whilst in his possession. The committee did not require all these things to be complied with. Indeed, they considered that they had nothing to do with all these precautions, because the House, it was to be supposed, would guard all these points before they opened and referred all such papers to the committee. But, sir, many of the committee did look with suspicion on this package. It had not come through accustomed channels, and it might be to avoid the necessary scrutiny, that it had sought to come into the committee, through channels unknown to the laws of New Jersey, and unsanctioned by parliamentary practice.

I am free, however, to state, that I never permitted these suspicions to fasten on the gentleman from Connecticut personally, for having brought them from his lodging to the committee room for delivery to the chairman, to whose care they were directed. But, sir, they did fasten on the package itself—on its abrupt and precipitate transmission to this city, in advance of all the other depositions, either then or in the course of being taken in the State of New Jersey. These suspicious circumstances, as I regard them, no doubt influenced my mind to some degree, in refusing to suspend our obedience to the orders of the House, and to await the opening and reference of the package. But I put that refusal on still higher ground I maintain that that package was never before us in such condition as to allow official action. It was never before us as a committee. Nothing could be properly so, but what had been sent through the House and by the House. We had, therefore, no right to take action on the paper. That action depended solely on the chairman, into whose hands it came, which the committee had no right to accelerate or retard, by any order on the subject. The gentleman from Maryland, however, assumes the ground that the chairman had the right to break the seal, and to open the package, without presentation to the Speaker or any order of the House. The Speaker, however, was of a different opinion. Every member of the committee present thought differently, except the gentlemen from New York and Connecticut. The gentleman from Alabama has no recollection of hearing the proposition made, that the chairman should open it; but, at the same time, he tells you if he had heard it, he would not have sanctioned the idea for one moment.

[Mr. CRABB here rose and submitted some remarks of explanation.]

Mr. BROWN was glad that the gentleman from Alabama had submitted his remarks: he wanted his position to be perfectly understood, for it was one on which he did not intend to bestow the slightest censure.

On the question of sending this package to the Speaker, and waiting for its reference and return, only two of the minority present voted for it, the gentleman from Alabama not being one of them.

[Mr. CRABB again explained, and said that his vote against sending it, was owing to certain recitals on the resolution of the gentleman from Connecticut, which he did not think correct in point of fact.]

Mr. BROWN then read the resolution, and the vote taken on it, and said that he meant to furnish the House with the precise facts as they had existed, but did not doubt the motive which the gentleman had stated, controlled his vote on that occasion.

Mr. Speaker, I have been much astonished at the opinions which the gentleman from Maryland advanced on this part of the case. I understand he is a distinguished member of the bar, and it is with extreme reluctance that I would undertake to question any of his legal opinions. Still I beg leave to submit to him a few, very few, cases for his solution. Suppose an ordinary letter to be directed to A B, to the care of C D; or suppose a letter to be written to the president of the Bank of Maryland, to the care of E F, one of its stockholders or directors; or to the clerk and master in chancery at A, to the care of the sheriff attendant on the court Now does the gentleman mean to advance the opinion, that in all these cases, the persons to whose care they were directed could lawfully break the seals, and publish their contents? The gentleman's argument seemed to affirm that they could, and opens up to my mind new principles of law, which have heretofore eluded my research.

I put to the gentleman, in becoming deference, another question; whether, if he be right on the general principles of the science, he may not possibly be mistaken in his opinions on this point, under the special provisions of the law of New Jersey. That law, as I have before remarked, expressly requires these depositions to be addressed and forwarded to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. How comes it, then, that any one else can interrupt them—stop their progress toward the Speaker, to whom they are required to go—break open the seals, make use of their contents, and still invoke the law to sanctify and approve the deed? Sir, all this may be so, but I must be permitted to say that it challenges a very high order of credulity to believe it. At all events, the committee did not understand either the general law or the statute of New Jersey in that way. They found this package not in your hands, but in the hands of the gentleman from Connecticut; not on your table, but on theirs; not coming direct by the public mail, but wandering about first in one man's hands, and then in another's, covered by another envelope, which is torn away from it; and having, in fact, none of those safeguards which the law throws around depositions in analogous cases. Under these circumstances, the committee determined to have nothing to do with the package for the present, but to let it reach its ultimate destination, the Speaker's hands, by him to be laid before the House, and by the House be referred to the committee, in due and regular form. It is now before us, and will take its place with the other depositions; will be considered when they are considered, and be allowed its due weight in the final report.

Thus far, Mr. Speaker, most of what I have said has been in justification of the conduct of the committee. I wish now to say something in vindication of the action of the House in requiring this report to be made. The very terms of the resolution referring this case to the committee, show that it was the intention of the House not to leave New Jersey long without her full representation on this floor. Present occupancy of her vacant seats until the final rights of the parties could be ascertained, was evidently intended. It was expected that a report on the present right could have been made in a few days, or weeks, at farthest. This right depended either on the commissions or the poll books, which, it was thought by the House, could soon be determined. The final right depended on the purgation of the polls in all the townships of the State; and it was known that it would take much time and trouble to perform it. These were the known views of the House. Well, sir, the case had been before us for about two months, instead of as many weeks. Questions of great importance to the country were daily arising, and New Jersey stood deprived of her full number of Representatives in this hall. The Governor of that State sezed on the occasion to appeal to the other States of the Union. The impression was spreading far and wide, that too much delay was taking place in the investigation. During all this time, not one word was heard from the committee. True, we were seen repairing early and retiring late from the scene of our labors. Night after night the burning lamps of our committee room attested our industry and devotion to business; but still no signs or tokens of a report being made could be discovered. Almost every member was asking us when? The vacant and unoccupied seats of New Jersey, as we passed, seemed ready to ask us when? The country at large was loudly addressing to us the same question. But still no solitary response could be obtained. Even now that we have reported, I can often detect a sort of inquisitive curiosity to know what we have been about during all this time. I will tell you, sir. We have been making this great book—I beg pardon for having almost said "Botts's book"—on the commissions of the Governor; on the records of his proceedings; in making a computation of the votes on the certificate of the Secretary of State, and the written pleadings of the party. We could and ought to have made this report in one-fourth part of that time, which we have wasted on technical trifles, and in a poor, miserable, and (as I fear the country will say) contemptible system of special pleading.

It was after such delays as this, and in the midst of the universal complaint of that delay which I have mentioned, that my honorable colleague, Mr. CAVE JOHNSON, submitted his resolution of instructions to report forthwith who received the greatest number of votes at the election of New Jersey, and all the evidence appertaining to that fact. Sir, I shall never forget the sensations evidently produced on a portion of the committee by the introduction of that resolution. The pride of the gentleman from Alabama, and of the gentleman from New York revolted at the word "forthwith!" They revolted at the very idea of instant compulsion. The gentleman from Connecticut did not care so much about the word "forthwith;" but seemed to shrink with horror from the intrusion of the chairman of Military Affairs! In touching and eloquent strains, he implored protection from that man of war "with glittering helmet, and with nodding plume!" That whole debate went off on a collateral and false issue, and was evidently intended to direct the public mind away from the true merits of the proposition. It was said to be indelicate, and even insulting to the committee, to call on them for a report, which the House and the country had been expecting for many weeks, with breathless anxiety! The House was, however, resolved to wait no longer, and after amending, adopted the resolution. This amendment consisted in the insertion of the word "lawful," before the word "votes." It was proposed by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FILLMORE,] who was in full practice on similar motions in the committee room. There, whenever it was proposed to ascertain "who received the greatest number of votes polled at the New Jersey election," so as to be able to report that fact to the House, the gentleman, or some other member of the minority, would move to insert the word lawful, so as to throw us off from the poll books as they stood at the close of the election, into the purgation of the polls. They stood on the commissions as the foundation of right to a seat. We stood on the poll books that contradicted the commissions, and clearly showed that five other persons received the votes of the majority. Now, sir, the fair mode of proceeding would have been to take a vote on the validity and sufficiency of the commissions, and if the majority of the committee of the House was found in favor of Messrs. Aycrigg and Co. to place them in their seats; and if no such majority was found, then, to have taken a vote on the validity and sufficiency of the poll books, and to have placed Messrs. DICKERSON, VROOM, etc. in their seats, if a majority was found in their favor, I repeat, sir, would have been the fair, plain-sailing mode of proceeding. But it has been denied to us throughout this whole proceeding. We have been, from time to time, forced off from an examination and report on the poll books, showing in fact who were elected by the people, and compelled to report on presumptions, instead of facts, or give the commissioned gentlemen another chance, by searching over the State of New Jersey for illegal votes. Sir, the motion made here was a part of the same system. But the gentleman did not remember that the word lawful could have none of its magic influence on this resolution, where there were so many other expressions to command and control it. We were ordered to report forthwith, but not so as to stop or delay our investigations into the ballot box. So long as these expressions continued in the resolutions of instruction, the word lawful could be made to apply only to those votes cast in the election, which the law and the rules of evidence declare lawful, until the contrary be shown by evidence. In his zeal and precipitancy, and misled by the effect of the same word in dissimilar propositions in the committee room, the gentleman from New York failed to follow up his motion to insert the word lawful, by other motions to strike out the word forthwith, and the whole proviso at the close of the resolution. This failure was fatal to his object. It lost every advantage which he was seeking to acquire. The gentleman and his friends soon perceived it, when they found the whole Democratic party of the House still voting for the instructions, notwithstanding the insertion of that word. Thereupon the whole Whig party, with no remembered exception, voted against it, in the face of their own favorite word "lawful." This, sir, is the resolution, as finally adopted:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be authorized to report to this House such papers, and such of their proceedings as they may desire to have printed by order of the House; and that they be instructed also to report forthwith which five of the ten individuals claiming seats from the State of New Jersey, received the greatest number of lawful votes from the whole State for Representatives in the Congress of the United States, at the election of 1838 in said State, with all the evidence of that fact in their possession: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to prevent or delay the action of said committee in taking testimony, and deciding the said case on the merits of the election."

The gentleman from Maryland, as well as the minority of the committee, have complained much of the construction which was given to this resolution by the majority. They have industriously sought to make the impression that it was resolved to put Messrs. DICKERSON and VROOM and their associates into their seats, right or wrong, on legal or illegal votes. Sir, nothing can be further from the truth. We have not counted one single vote for them which has not been passed upon and decided to be legal by the constituted authorities of New Jersey, the judges and inspectors of elections. They have solemnly adjudged every vote to be lawful before we have allowed it. The law takes their judgment as binding, until the contrary shall be shown by evidence taken in the case. Not only did the majority decide that the votes received should be presumed and taken as lawful votes, but every member of the minority decided so with us. They voted without exception for the following resolution:

"Resolved, That all votes received by authorized officers acting in conformity with the laws, are prima facie legal."

Now, sir, we have not counted one solitary vote which was not of that description. To escape from this, we are told on the other side that the word "lawful" was not used by the House in this prima facie or presumptive sense, but referred to the final and absolute lawfulness which might be established by the evidence. Sir, how can this be so, when the House knew that the testimony had not yet been taken—when the House knew that the parties had just left the city for the purpose of taking it—when the House knew that two months had been allowed them for that purpose? How then could they have meant to call for a report to be made forthwith, on testimony not in existence, and which would not be in our possession before the second Monday of April next. They must have meant that we should report without delay on the lawful votes, as they stood as such on the records of New Jersey and the testimony before the committee—on the votes which then stood as lawful, according to the laws of New Jersey, and not on the votes which might hereafter be found legal when the taking of the testimony was completed. The House was demanding the report only to settle the right of present occupancy, so as to put one party or the other in their seats, until the final right should be determined. They therefore called for a report on the evidence as it then stood, not on the evidence as it might hereafter appear. This is put beyond all question by the proviso which expressly declares that the inquiry into the merits of the election should not be suspended or prevented.

The next day the committee met. They settled down on the construction of the resolution for which I have contended, and ordered the report to be prepared by the Tuesday following (that being Saturday.) On Tuesday the report, as prepared by the chairman, was adopted and ordered to be presented to the House. It was presented, resisted, debated; but was finally confirmed, and five of the claimants admitted to their seats by an overwhelming majority. I again affirm that every vote counted in making out that report, stood, at the time it was counted, as a good and lawful vote, according to the rules of evidence and the laws of the land. But it is true, that in making out the report the committee did not, and could not, know but what some of the votes counted might hereafter be proved to be illegal when the parties returned, on the 2d Monday in April, from taking their testimony in New Jersey. We were not gifted with the spirit of prophecy so as to know how that might be, and the House called for present and immediate action, and did not choose to wait the developments of the future. But whatever doubt might have existed before as to the correctness of our construction of its orders, they must be removed by the subsequent action of the House. When the report came, it was resisted on the express ground that we had misconstrued the resolution of instruction. The question was debated and considered by the House. Surely the gentlemen do not mean to deny that the House understood its own orders. Well, what was its decision? It sanctioned our construction by confirming our report. Before the House we were charged with stupidity and mental delusion; now nothing can save the House itself from the same unmerited denunciation. What, sir, after all, have we done? Nothing but what the Governor of New Jersey himself declared we ought and should do. Hear his declarations, made at the time when he was cleaving down the rights of his own people. "But it will be asked, with force and propriety, is a candidate to lose his seat in Congress because a county clerk does not make a return of the votes? Certainly not. If, through inadvertence or by design, any votes have not been returned by the clerk, it is in the power of the House of Representatives, in their discretion, to allow these votes, and give the seat to the person who, with these votes, may be elected." Well, what have we done? The votes of Millville and South Amboy had not been returned, or rather had not been counted. The committee and the House have counted them, and have given the seats accordingly. Precisely what Governor Pennington then said we ought and would do. Let me tell gentlemen we have not only done this, but we have done more. We have done what Governor Pennington ought then to have done, but which he did not and would not do. He knew that the clerks of Middlesex and Amboy had not sent up all the returns of all the townships of their respective counties, and yet he would not send an express after them as the law directed. He knew that the votes of Millville and South Amboy had not been included in their computations, and if included would have changed the result. He knew, in other words, that Messrs. Aycrigg and Co. had not received "the highest number of votes" as required by the laws of New Jersey, yet he gave them commissions at declaring them "to have been elected," contrary to the truth of the case and the laws of the State. In the commissions which he gave, he could not and dared not say, that those to whom they had been given, had received the highest number of votes. He therefore introduced the word "elected," not known in the laws of New Jersey. Who is "elected," is a compound, and often a difficult question to be determined, and is left under the Constitution in such a case as this, to be decided by the House of Representatives: But "who received the highest number of votes" in an election, is a simple matter of arithmetical computation, and has been entrusted to the Executive of New Jersey as the returning officer. He has made a return, at open war with the facts of the case, and has only offered to an insulted people the poor consolation that the outrage he was committing was within the correcting powers of this House. We have corrected them. We have restored to the people of New Jersey the great and fundamental right of self-government, of which their own Governor, in an evil hour of partisan madness, had deprived them. In restoring to them the high guarantees of the Constitution, we have met with revilings and reproaches at every stage of our progress. Misrepresentations have followed upon our footsteps, and we have been held up, in the view of many of our misguided fellow-citizens, as a lawless and tyrannical majority, ready and willing to sacrifice every thing on the altar of partisan idolatry. The minority who have acted with us have given occasion to much of this newspaper defamation. That minority submitted a counter report, which they have laid in the form of an appeal before the American people. In that report and appeal, they have cast imputations on the majority of the committee and the House, which it is now my purpose to repel.

The minority have been pleased to represent that this House has perpetrated a daring outrage in putting five men into their seats "who presented no return, no credentials, no commissions." Why, Mr. Speaker, this is no new thing under the sun. Look at that book on contested elections. There you will find from fifty to one hundred cases of the same kind. In almost every instance where the sitting member was ousted of his seat, his competitor came in "without return, credential, or commission." (Remember, sir, I am not responsible for the tautology of this sentence.) How could they come in under any of these things? They had been cheated out of them by the fraud or stupidity of the Governor and Privy Council of New Jersey. The people of that State had done all in their power to secure to themselves the inestimable right of suffrage. They had gone to the election on the day, and at the places specified by law, and deposited their votes in the ballot boxes. This was all they could do. At the close of that election, whoever received the highest number of votes, were the only true and lawful members of Congress. It is so expressly declared by the laws of New Jersey, and must be so from the very nature and spirit of our institutions. The people having voted and made choice of their own Representatives, all that remained to be done was, to commission those on whom that choice had fallen. The records or returns, when full, clearly showed that choice to have fallen on Messrs. DICKERSON, VROOM, and Co. They carried these records, laid them down in the presence of the Governor, and demanded their commissions. What was his answer? "Go and get them from the House of Representatives." This House has granted them. Your resolution of admission is their commission; a prouder credential than was ever issued under the sign manual of Governor Pennington.

But we are told that this foul deed was done to secure a majority, to carry through certain favorite measures of the Administration. I solemnly declare, Mr. Speaker, that I never heard such an idea advanced any where, or by any person, until I saw it in the address of the minority. What are these measures: the Sub-Treasury? The Treasury Note bill? The resolutions refusing the assumption of State debts? Sir, I know not, I care not, to what measures the minority may allude, the assertion must fail from its own absurdity. It is incredible that the Administration should be able to perpetrate all the outrages charged upon it in the New Jersey case, and that too by so large a majority, and yet be unable to carry through its own favorite measures of public policy. Sir, the credulity of this country is taxed even to bankruptcy, when called on to believe such monstrous allegations.

I mean next to notice a very extraordinary observation to be found in the appeal of the minority. They remark that this House, with a madness and blindness belonging to desperation only, not only adopted the report, but even went one step further, and admitted these five claimants to their seats. What beautiful and respectful langunge toward this House, (a House of which they are members, and with which their own reputation and character are so intimately connected) The minority proceed with the bold assertion that all this was done, "the House being wholly ignorant of what the evidence established." Ignorant of what the evidence established! What was that report intended to show? Simply the fact who received the greatest number of votes at the New Jersey election. The instructions of the House went no further than that. The report, on its face, purported to go no further. Now the question is, whether the House was ignorant of the evidence bearing on that point. It stands recorded on your journals, that it was all read, on the call of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DUNCAN;] plainly and distinctly read; and if your records were silent on it, there are now here within this Capitol more than two hundred witnesses to attest the fact.

Sir, this charge of ignorance has not even the merit of novelty to recommend it to public favor. We have long since yielded the claim of "all the talents and all the decency" to those who have so modestly claimed it. I mean, sir, that we had yielded to that modest assumption before the present session of Congress. Since the occurrence of this New Jersey case, however, I believe they have, by common consent, discontinued any further claim to a monopoly of all the decency, at least.

Mr. Speaker, I have been surprised at the remedy proposed by the minority for all these alleged outrages committed by this House in the New Jersey case. They call on the people to "rise in their majesty, and assert and vindicate their rights at the ballot boxes." At the ballot boxes! What, sir, have we been doing but that, throughout this whole controversy? What the people can do there, let them learn from the conduct of Gov. Pennington and his Privy Council at the ballot boxes! I did not expect that the gentleman had the heart to utter such a word. What avail the ballot boxes, in an age and country where it is boldly maintained that a partisan Governor can set them aside at his pleasure, substitute his own friends in their stead, and, by affixing the broad seal to the nefarious deed, defend and protect it from all correction? If these things can be done, and then justified here, I again ask, of what avail are the ballot boxes against party misrule and Federal domination? The ballot boxes may speak in the voice of thunder, and yet a Whig Governor can speak louder than they. New Jersey knows the truth of what I declare, because New Jersey has felt it. The majority of the committee, and of this House, have sustained, throughout this controversy, the rights and liberties of the people of that noble and gallant State; the minority have, throughout, justified the usurpations of its Governor and Privy Council. We have succeeded in putting into their seats those who have been in truth and in fact chosen by the people. They have been prevented from introducing, as members, on this floor, those who were rejected by the people, and whose only recommendation was, "that they had found favor in the eyes" of Governor Pennington. Baffled in the committee room, defeated in their views on this floor, the minority have appealed to the American people. They appeal as an oppressed and much injured minority, whose counter report has been rejected and suppressed by those who should have acted on it. This faint and sickly cry of persecution and oppression is to be another one of those false issues which have been raised, in order to divert the public mind from the real merits of this controversy. The minority have not made a fair statement on the subject. They have neither stated all the facts, nor stated them in their proper order and connection. How were the facts in the committee-room? The minority asked that the presentation of our report should be suspended until theirs should be prepared, and both be submitted together. Two periods were mentioned by them. The vote was taken on the longest time time first. The majority did vote against the longest, intending to vote for the shortest time. But, sir, to our surprise, the proposition as to the shortest time was withdrawn by one of the minority, and now the complaint is, that we would give no right at all. Gentlemen seem to have gone on the idea that every thing must be done in their own way, or not done at all. This was strikingly illustrated on this floor on the presentation of their report. When they came in with it, the House was actually engaged in discussing and considering the report of the majority. Now, what was the very reasonable and modest request of these gentlemen? It was that the House should lay down the business then on had—put aside the further consideration of the report of the majority, and take up that of the minority. The question was asked of the Speaker, whether, if this was done, the report of the minority, in the event of a debate on it, would not take precedence of all debate and action on that of the the majority. The SPEAKER decided that it would. Thereupon the House determined to proceed in regular order; to debate and decide on the report first presented, and when that was done to take up that of the minority. Sir, was there any oppression in all this? What right had these gentlemen to come bustling into the House, and to demand that every thing should stand aside for them, and that their report should have a preference over that of the majority? At the first moment after the report of the majority was disposed of, the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. DROMGOOLE,] rose in his place, and expressed a hope that the House would now, by universal consent, agree to receive the report of the minority, and that both reports and testimony be printed. Sir, from what quarter did opposition come, to this proposal? Not from us, but from two of their own friends. One of them expressly declared, that he did not want it received; "that he wanted it to go forth to the world as a suppressed report" The minority seized on the suggestion, ceased to ask for its reception, and have sent it forth in blazing capitals as a suppressed report.

Mr. Speaker: in the appeal to the American people, which the minority have been pleased to take, we most heartily unite. We are perfectly willing to meet them at the bar of an enlightened and impartial public opinion. But we want that appeal to be fairly presented, with no errors of fact to mislead, and no false clamor of injustice and oppression to excite public sympathy. We mean to stand at that bar as the advocates for the supremacy of the popular will; they must be there as the defenders of the conduct of those who have violated and outraged that supremacy. We will be there, relying on the broad merits, on the truth and justice of our cause, they standing on nothing but technical presumptions, at open war with the facts, and on the supposed magic of the broad seal, desecrated as it was in this bold attempt to destroy the rights and liberties of the people of New Jersey. The minority, in sending forth their appeal, invoke a decision in their favor, in order to save this Government from becoming "worse than a Turkish despotism!" We assert that the danger lies altogether in a different direction. We maintain that whenever the time shall arrive when returning officers begin to substitute their wills for that of the people—when your State Governors assume to make Representatives in Congress, in face of the very records of our elections, then indeed "a worse than Turkish despotism" will have fallen on this country.

SPEECH OF MR. CLAY,
OF ALABAMA,

In Senate, Tuesday, April 21, 1840.—The bill supplemental to the "act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," having been read a third time,

After some remarks from Mr. CLAY of Kentucky,

Mr. CLAY of Alabama said it was with extreme regret that he had heard the remarks which had just fallen from the Senator from Kentucky [MR. CLAY.] He was at a loss whether to ascribe the Senator's course of argument to his inattention to the subject, or to his deep-rooted prejudices against the settlers upon the public lands; but he could not avoid thinking that his persevering hostility to this, and all kindred measures, must be owing to one of those causes or the other. Why, sir, said Mr. C. it is perfectly demonstrable that the Senator from Kentucky is entirely mistaken in regard to almost every material fact he has stated.

He said the Senator had commenced his remarks by alluding to the small excess, above the minimum price, which the Government had received for many years past; and he ascribed it altogether to mingling the results of all the different modes of sale at auction, by private entry, (as it was usually call, ed,) and under the pre-emption laws. As if confident of triumph, the Senator exclaims—"let us have the average of auction sales." Well, sir, he shall have them—at least so far as the sales at auction, since the enactment of the existing pre-emption law.

Mr. C. said he had given them the other day, when the bill was before under the consideration of the Senate; the Senator from Kentucky was then present, and if he had then been fortunate enough to engage his attention, the question need not now have been asked

Mr. C. said, having on former occasions heard the same complaint, from the same quarter, and having been always disposed to treat the subject with candor and fairness; conscious that such a course ought to ensure success in this body; he had called on the Commissioner of the General Land Office for precisely the statement desired, and had obtained it. He had exhibited it in the course of the debate, on Thursday last, and invited the attention of every Senator to its examination: but for the satisfaction of the Senator from Kentucky, he would repeat the substance of what he then said. This statement (Mr. C. said) comprised the sales of every kind, separately and distinctly, which had taken place since the 22d of June, 1838, up to the latest return, which had been received at the General Land Office on the 16th of January last. It showed that there had been sold at auction 1,875,854 acres, for $2 427,014 10, at the average rate of $1 29.38 per acre. This was entirely exclusive of ordinary sales, by private entry, and of sales under the pre-emption law. Now, sir, (said Mr. C.) the demand of the Senator from Kentucky is met; and he finds that the excess, above the minimum price, is but four cents, and a small fraction; and this is the important gain of his auction system, setting at naught all favor and indulgence toward those who open the way for such sales.

Mr. C. said another column of the same statement exhibited the amount of sales to pre-emptors, being only 752,972 acres. Every gentleman can ascertain the mighty loss to the Treasury by supposing that those lands, too, might have been sold as high as the general average of the sales at auction; that, however, he thought was not a very reasonable presumption. He said he had shown the other day that, if the number of persons averaged one to every half quarter, or eighty acre tract—and there were, no doubt, more than that many, as, under the provisions of the existing law, every quarter section was to be divided equally amongst all the settlers upon it, they would amount to about ten thousand, who had enjoyed the advantage of its protection. And he would repeat the question, whether an American statesman would, for the inconsiderable gain to the Treasury, have subjected ten thousand families to the hazards, and frauds, and oppressions of a sale at auction, perhaps to be broken up and again driven into the wilderness, or become miserable and dependent tenants of rich and haughty landlords?

Mr. C. said he had referred the other day to the report of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, made in January, 1838, to prove that in 1828 and 1829—the two years immediately preceding the first general pre-emption law—the average price of all the public land sold, in each, was but $1 26 per acre. Such was the result of the system before any preference was given to occupants, unless perhaps to a small number of individuals, holding under imperfect claims, derived from France and Spain. The same document showed the quantity of land sold in 1828 to have been 965,600 36-100 acres, which, at $1 25 per acre, would have amounted to $1,207,000, and the sum actually received only exceeded it $14,357. In 1829, the excess received was much smaller, in proportion to the quantity sold. The number of acres sold in that year was 1 244,860 1-100, which, at $1 25 per acre, would have amounted to $1,556,075, and the sum actually received only exceeded it $16,788. And, in the two years, the quantity of land sold was 2,210,460 acres, and the excess above the minimum, on the whole quantity, amounted to but $31,145. How paltry and inconsiderable a sum, to jeopard the security and happiness of probably thirty thousand families! He said he would only add, on this point, that in the next year (1830) with the first general pre-emption law in force after the 29th of May, the average price continued precisely the same as in the two preceding years, although the sales amounted to nearly two millions of acres. This must be considered proof conclusive that Government lost nothing worth taking into the account, by allowing pre-emptions, were he to admit (which he was by no means prepared to do) that money was to be justly appreciated above the happiness, comfort, and prosperity of freemen. Besides all this, there should be deducted the additional expense of sales at auction, $5 per day each, to the Register and Receiver of the district land office, during their continuance, (usually about two weeks,) an auctioneer at $8 or $10 per day, and extra clerk hire. Make all these deductions, and where is the pecuniary gain of this rich and powerful Government, by all the rigor of the auction system?

But, said Mr. C. the Senator from Kentucky makes another very great and most extraordinary mistake, in saying that, in every case under the pre-emption law, the settler gets a credit of two years. The Senator certainly could not have directed his attention to the terms of the law, or he would not have taken a position so broad and indefensible. He said it was only necessary to call the attention of the Senate, for a moment, to the provisions of the act of June, 1838, and that of May, 1830, to show how utterly erroneous were the views of the Senator. The former revived the latter, and continued it in force for two years. Hence the act of May 29, 1830, with all its limitations and conditions, (besides those superadded by the act of 1838,) was in full force now, and intended to be continued in full operation by the bill under consideration. Mr. C invited the attention of the Senator from Kentucky, and that of other gentlemen, to the following section of that act, which he read:

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not delay the sale of any of the public lands of the United States, beyond the time which has been, or may be, appointed for that purpose by the President's proclamation; nor shall any of the provisions of this act be available to any person, or persons, who shall fail to make the proof and payment required by fore the day appointed for the commencement of the sales of lands including the tract or tracts on which the right of pre-emption is claimed; nor shall the right of pre-emption, contemplated by this act, extend to any land, which is reserved from sale by act of Congress, or by order of the President, or which may have been appropriated for any purpose whatsoever."

Here, said Mr. C. (after reading the section,) it is rendered indisputable by the express language of the law, that it "shall not delay the sale of any of the public lands" beyond the time appointed for that purpose by the President's proclamation; and it further expressly appears, that unless the settler "make the proof and payment required, before the day appointed for the commencement of the sales of lands, including the tract or tracts, on which the right of pre-emption is claimed," the provisions of the act are wholly unavailable, and lost forever to the occupant.

[Mr. CLAY of Kentucky here rose, and asked Mr. CLAY of Alabama whether there was not delay of the sales of land subject to private entry.]

Mr. CLAY of Alabama replied that it was true, by the construction placed on the act of 1830, those who were settlers on lands that had been offered for sale at auction, and remained unsold, were allowed the whole term limited by the law, to make proof and payment. But he remarked that the number of settlers on these inferior, refuse lands, was comparatively small. There was none of that "rush of settlers" on them, which had been so often deprecated and denounced here, as regarded the fresh and rich lands; none settled on those poor lands but those who were unable to purchase a better quality. To prove that the operation of the pre-emption law, under this construction, did not retard the sale of that portion of the public domain which was subject to private entry, Mr. C referred to the same statement of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, made in January last, from which it would appear that near four millions and a half of acres had been sold at ordinary private entry, when less than two millions had been sold at auction, and only about three-fourths of a million under the pre-emption law. He said he regarded this indulgence to occupants of the poor, refuse lands, as no great favor; and it resulted in no loss whatever to the Government. So far as regarded the assertion of two years' credit being given by the law to settlers on the fresh lands that had never been offered or refused at public sale, Mr. C. repeated that it was clearly founded in mistake. There could not be an hour's credit or delay of sale, more than if there was no pre-emption law in force. That class of lands could only be sold after notice of not less than three, nor more than six months, by proclamation of the President; and the shortest period could be as well fixed now, when the pre-emption law was in force, as when there was none.

Mr. C. remarked that the Senator from Kentucky had renewed another objection, so often made by him heretofore, that the passage of the bill would be extending favor and privilege to trespassers and violators of the law, to classes who were by no means the most meritorious. Mr. C. said he was sorry to hear these charges repeated against the settlers of the new States, although in a tone and temper somewhat mitigated, compared with former occasions. Knowing them to be generally honest, industrious, and respectable, he never could hear such imputations made against them, as a class, and remain silent. Sir, said Mr. C. I appeal with confidence to you, (addressing the President of the Senate,) and to every Senator who has travelled through the new States, or has had the means of knowing the character of this portion of their population, to say whether they are not as intelligent, as meritorious, and respectable, as those engaged in similar pursuits in any of the older States of the Union. They are engaged in advancing the improvement of the country, and the cultivation of the soil; no employment was more favorable to principles of virtue and honor; and, in moral worth, they would compare advantageously with any other class. He denied that they were violators of the law, or trespassers, in any ignominious sense of those terms. He said they did not go upon the public lands to injure, but to improve them; nor did they go there to take the public property without a fair equivalent. They neither intended to take them by force, nor ask them by way of donation—the only favor they asked of the Government of their country was, that they might be permitted to retain the places of their selection in the wilderness, which they had improved by much labor, under the endurance of great privations, by paying the same price which would be received from others, who had done nothing to advance the progress of civilization. So far from being regarded as violators of the law, in the ordinary acceptation, they deserved to be considered meritorious citizens. They were generally men of small property: finding themselves situated upon exhausted land in the old States, and perhaps not the owners of that, but the humble tenants of others—with families growing up around them, whose wants were daily increasing—they went out upon the fresh and fertile lands of the West, for the highly praiseworthy purpose of improving their condition. By this laudable enterprise, persevering industry, and prudent economy, many of them acquired a competency for the support of their families, and the education of their children—rendering them useful and independent citizens, instead of day laborers, hirelings, and humble dependants. What course more meritorious could the father of a family pursue? Instead of reproach, such conduct merited the highest praise; and it was only to be regretted that greater numbers of the poor and humble tenantry of the old States did not pursue the same course.

But, sir, said Mr. C. the Senator from Kentucky takes further exception to the bill, on the ground that it is too universal and indiscriminate in its privileges. He complains that, under the phraseology, "every settler on the public lands," even "foreigners and free negroes," may become pre-emptors. Now, sir, said Mr. C. the language of the present bill is not more latitudinous than that of any of the other laws heretofore passed upon the same subject. He said that of the first pre-emption law, passed in 1830, was fully as broad as any expressions to be found in this. It declared "that every settler or occupant of the public lands, prior to the passage of this act, &c." should have the right of pre emption. There was no clause to be found in it which denied its advantages to any class or description of individuals who occupied and cultivated public land at the times specified. The act of June 19 h, 1834, pursued precisely the same phraseology; and yet he had heard no complaint of abuses growing out of the latitude of description in either.

As it regarded foreigners not naturalized, the question had been distinctly made by a proposition to exclude them, when the bill which passed in June, 1838, was before the Senate, and it was rejected by a decided majority. The Senator from Kentucky, and some of his friends, then supported the proposition; but, after full and deliberate consideration, the majority against it was so large, that Mr. C. thought the question ought to be considered definitely settled. For one, he had been opposed to it then, and was still. While the spirit of our free institutions invited the inhabitants of all other countries to come amongst us, and we proudly boasted that our country was the asylum of the oppressed, whence soever they came, he would not only extend to them the security of life and liberty, which was guarantied by our Constitution, but enable them to acquire property, and enjoy all its comforts. Should we deserve the proud name, which had been accorded to us by the friends of freedom all over the world, if we denied to the unfortunate foreigner, driven from his native land by the iron hand of despotism, even the humble privilege of purchasing a home with the fruits of his industry, labor, and economy? Mr. C. protested against it in the name of humanity, and for the honor of his country. Let us not mock the unhappy victim of tyranny, by inviting him into our country, as the abode of liberty and equal laws, and then deny him a privilege common to all freemen—denied only to slaves.

Sir, said Mr. C this objection comes with a singularly bad grace from the Senator from Kentucky. A few years ago the Senate passed a bill making a pure, unqualified donation to two hundred and thirty-five Poles, of thirty-six sections of land, to be selected from any three adjacent townships of the public lands, which had been, or might thereafter be, surveyed, situated within the limits of the State of Illinois, or the then Territory of Michigan.

[Mr. YOUNG of Illinois interposed, and remarked that the Senator from Alabama was mistaken; that the law required the Poles to pay the minimum price per acre.]

Mr. CLAY of Alabama replied, that he was perfectly aware that the bill finally passed in that shape; but, he could inform his friend from Illinois that was altogether owing to an amendment which was made in the House; the bill did pass the Senate in the shape he had stated. If I am not very much mistaken, the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] who now objects to suffering foreigners to enjoy the privilege of pre-emption—that is, even to buy and pay for the lands they have settled and improved—voted for that bill. I ask, did he not vote for it?

[Mr. CLAY of Kentucky here nodded assent.]

Yes, said Mr. C. he admits that fact—he did vote for it, as did many of his friends—notwithstanding he now considers it an insurmountable objection, that foreigners are permitted to buy under the present bill.

Mr. C. remarked, that at the time the bill, to which he alluded, passed, he had the honor to be a member of the other House, and also a member of the Committee on Public Lands, to which it was referred. He said he well recollected the feelings of indignation it excited in his bosom, when he saw thirty-six sections of the most choice portion of the public domain about to be voted away as a pure gift to a parcel of foreigners, and amounting to near an hundred acres each, when so many soldiers of the Revolution, who had fought the battles which won our independence, were tottering on the brink of the grave, destitute of land, and without a comfortable home. Yes, sir, said Mr. C. I remember well the history of that bill. My feelings revolted at the injustice of making such a donation to foreigners, when, at the same session, and only a few days before, those who were friendly to the settlers had a hard struggle—every inch of ground being contested—to obtain the passage of a law to allow many of those Revolutionary patriots, and their descendants, to keep the small tracts of land they had improved, by paying $1 25 per acre. Mr. C. remarked, that he was the mover of the amendment in the committee of the House of Representatives, which required the Poles to pay the minimum price, besides inhabiting and cultivating the land; for, while he was willing that foreigners should become proprietors of land, in his opinion justice demanded that they should pay for it, as well as American citizens. He said, when the bill was returned to the Senate, with this amendment, it was disagreed to; and he had, amongst others, exerted himself successfully, but with some difficulty, in prevailing on a majority of the House to insist on its amendment. Here, then, (said Mr. C.) is a specimen of the Senator's consistency—at one time voting to give away twenty-three thousand acres of the public land to foreigners—at another, even objecting to let them become purchasers at the same price paid by others!

The Senator from Kentucky objects, too, (said Mr. C.) that the language of the bill is so broad that even "free negroes" may avail themselves of its provisions. He said this objection was entirely new; it was now nearly ten years since the pre-emption system commenced, under terms as latitudinous as the English language could supply; nothing less than "that every settler, or occupant, of the public lands" should enjoy its benefits; and yet he had never before heard a complaint that a "free negro" had entered a single quarter section. There might be instances (Mr. C. admitted) in which that class of people had got the benefit of the laws heretofore passed; but, if there were, they must be very few, and had not yet amounted to a sufficient evil to attract attention. No, sir, (said Mr. C.) you do not find that description of individuals going into and encountering the hardships of the rough, untamed forest. They are proverbially predisposed to indolence and ease; and, instead of finding them engaged in the laborious toils of husbandry, you will generally find them in our cities, towns, and villages, pursuing habits of idleness and dishonesty, vice and profligacy. He spoke of them as a class, but admitted there were some creditable exceptions. Mr. C. added that the Senator from Kentucky might be very sincere in the objection he had raised; but, if so, he differed very widely from many of his political friends, who would doubtless not only grant pre-emptions, but make donations of land to "free negroes," and emancipate our slaves to increase the number of their beneficiaries.

Mr. C. remarked that the course pursued by the Senator from Kentucky seemed to him objectionable in another aspect. The bill has been engrossed, and is now on its third reading, and the Senator moves a recommitment to the same committee by whom it was reported, with instructions to amend or change it in several particulars. Mr. C. contended that this course was unusual and unfair, under the circumstances. He said the gentleman was present when the bill was before the Senate as in committee of the whole, and when it was open to amendment. Why did he not then state his objections, and propose his amendments? This bill had been among the first introduced at the present session, had been printed, and on the files of the Senate for more than three months; of course its provisions must have been known, and fully understood by every member. If such amendments as are now proposed had been offered at the proper stage, it would have occasioned no delay; they could at once have been adopted or rejected. But, instead of meeting a measure, to which the Senator has always been and still is opposed, in this fair, open, and usual mode, he awaits its engrossment and third reading, and then moves its recommitment, which must be followed by delay, and possibly defeat, for want of time for action in the other House. He submitted it to the Senate whether they would sanction this mode of opposition.

Mr. C. remarked that there was something strange, and, to his mind, unaccountable, in the course the Senator from Kentucky had pursued on this, and all similar occasions, in reference to the interests of the new States, for the last eight years. He had uniformly opposed, with the most persevering and untiring hostility, every attempt to grant pre-emption rights to settlers—every proposition to graduate the price of the public lands, or reduce the most inferior pine barrens, rocky mountains, swamps, or marshes, below the price of the most fertile and valuable low grounds of the Mississippi or Red river: in a word, he had not only opposed those more important measures, but every bill which tended to relax or mitigate the land system, in its operation upon the interest, happiness, or prosperity of the new States. The journals of the Senate and the newspapers of the day would (Mr. C. said) bear him out in the correctness of what he had said. Yet, (said Mr. C) what has been the course pursued by the Senator from Kentucky, in the mean time, towards the other States? To pass by his more general measure, to divide out the new States amongst the old ones—commonly called his distribution bill—by which (to say nothing of other objections at present) he would have interested all the old States, by annual receipts from the proceeds of the public lands, in keeping up their price, until the necessities of the increasing population of the new ones compelled them to purchase on any terms; and enforcing the principles of the present system, with unmitigated rigor, even to the extent of driving off the settlers by military force: notwithstanding all this illiberality, and even harshness, towards the people of the new States, we find the Senator from Kentucky, at the last session, voting for a bill that was to operate in another quarter, which fully embraced, and sanctioned, both the principles of the pre-emption privilege and graduation! Yes, sir, the Senator from Kentucky, at the last session, after his long and implacable hostility to both those principles, so far as the new States were concerned, voted for a bill to cede to the State of Tennessee "all the right, title, claim, and interest, which the United States have, in and to the vacant, unappropriated, and refuse lands, south and west of the Congressional reservation line," in that State, upon certain "conditions and limitations." Amongst those conditions and limitations were the following:

"In selling, entering, and disposing, of said lands, all and every person or persons, the legal representative of such person or persons, and the rightful assignee of such person or persons, as are entitled to the right of occupancy and pre-emption according to the laws of the State of Tennessee, shall have the preference in entering, purchasing, or obtaining, grants for their occupant and pre-emption rights, at the price of twelve and a half cents per acre for said occupant and pre-emption rights, not exceeding two hundred acres each."

Yes, sir, the Senator from Kentucky voted for this bill, which carries the privilege of pre-emption, which he has hitherto, and still denounces with so much virulence, and opposes so inexorably, farther than any measure, which has ever been passed, or attempted for the new States, and carries the reduction of price lower than any of our graduation bills. The part of the bill I have quoted, not only enjoins upon the Legislature to give the preference to all who "are entitled to the right of occupancy and pre-emption, according to the laws of the State of Tennessee;" that is, to every body residing upon the land; but to "the legal representative," and "the rightful assignee of such person or persons." Now, sir, so carefully have all our pre-emption laws guarded against the possibility of fraud and speculation, that all right of assignment or representation has been absolutely cut off and denied. The pre-emption law of the 29th May, 1830, contained this positive enactment:

"And that all assignments and transfers of the right of pre-emption given by this act, prior to the issuance of patents, shall be null and void."

Mr. C. said the same provision had been revived and continued in every subsequent pre-emption law, and would be by this, if it passed. So much afraid of fraud and speculation were the enemies of the new States, that no pre-emption bill, he presumed, could be passed for them without such a clause. In them it was merely and strictly a personal matter—there could be no assignments, nor could any heir claim in the name of an unfortunate deceased ancestor. Yet, in Tennessee, it could be made inheritable and transferable, as broadly as any other legal right, and that by the Senator's vote. So, the utmost that a settler, in a new State, could get, was one quarter section; and if there happened to be more than one settler upon it, it must be divided into as many shares; but in Tennessee two hundred acres could be given. And, instead of giving a dollar and a quarter per acre, as the pre emptors of the new States are bound to pay, a settler in Tennessee is permitted to buy at twelve and a half cents per acre—the one-sixth part of the lowest price at which we can be permitted to pass a bill for the most inferior lands in the new States. He appealed to the Senate to say whether this was fair and equal justice? Were the citizens of Alabama and Mississippi, and the other new States, less meritorious, less honorable, or less patriotic, than those of Tennessee? Had not those States been "admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever?" Or, was this declaration of the terms of their admission mere mockery? Sir, said Mr. C. to reconcile the consistency of these contradictory votes of the Senator from Kentucky is impossible, unless he can prove that poor land in Indiana, or Illinois, or Alabama, or Mississippi, is worth a dollar and a quarter per acre, when the same quality in Tennessee is worth but twelve and a half cents per acre. He must go farther, and prove that it is lawful and meritorious to settle upon and improve public land in Tennessee, while it is unlawful and criminal to do the same thing in the other States. Mr. C. said he did not complain of the Senator's vote for the Tennessee bill; he had voted for it himself, and would cheerfully do it again; but he complained that he denied the people of the new States the rights and privileges which he accorded to others.

Mr. C. concluded by expressing the hope, that the bill under consideration would receive the sanction of a majority of the Senate, as others of similar character had heretofore done, notwithstanding the opposition it had encountered.

After some remarks from Mr. WALKER,

Mr. CLAY of Kentucky moved to recommit the bill with instructions; which was negatived—ayes 8, noes 25.

The question was then taken on the passage of the bill, and it was decided in the affirmative—ayes 26, nays 9, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Buchanan, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Grundy, Henderson, Hubbard, King, Linn, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Porter, Robinson, Sevier, Smith of Indiana, Sturgeon, Tappan, Walker, White, Williams, Wright, and Young—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Calhoun, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Crittenden, Dixon, Knight, Prentiss, and Roane—9.

The bill was in the following words:

A BILL supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," approved June twenty-second, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in all cases where a settler on the public lands may reside, or have his dwelling-house upon one quarter section, and cultivate land on another and different quarter section, such settler may make his election under the act to which this is a supplement, to enter either of said quarter sections, or legal sub-divisions of each, so as not to exceed one quarter section in all.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in all cases where an individual may have made an improvement on the public land, and had afterward leased or rented such improvement to another person, who was in possession of the same on the 22d of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, and for the period of four months next preceding, or when the lessor and lessee, together, occupied such improvement during said four months, the person who made such improvement, and so rented or leased the same, shall be entitled to the right of pre-emption, notwithstanding he may have been out of possession of his improvement during said four months, or any part thereof.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That every settler on the public lands, which were not surveyed at the passage of the act to which this is a supplement, and who, since the survey of such public lands has been ascertained to have resided at the date of said act, and for four months preceding, on a sixteenth section, set apart for the support of schools in any township, shall be entitled to enter at the minimum price any other quarter section of the public lands lying in the same land district, to which no other person has the right of pre-emption, on making satisfactory proof of his or her residence as aforesaid on such sixteenth section, before the register and receiver of the land office of said district.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That every person who may have been a settler, within the meaning of the act to which this is a supplement, on any public land before its selection by any State for the purposes of a seminary of learning, under any act of Congress authorizing such selection, on satisfactory proof of the facts before the register and receiver of the district in which his improvements were situated, shall be permitted to enter at the minimum price, any other quarter section lying in the same land district, to which no other person has the right of pre-emption.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the "act to grant pre-emption rights to settlers on the public lands," approved June 22d, 1838, be, and the same is hereby, continued in full force till the 22d day of June, 1842; and the right of pre-emption, under its provisions, shall be, and hereby is, extended to all settlers on the public lands at the date of this act, with the same exceptions, whether general or special, and subject to all the limitations and conditions contained in the above recited act, and with the explanatory provisions of the preceding sections of this act; and nothing in the last proviso of the act of the twenty-second of June, eighteen hundred and thirty-eight, shall be so construed as to defeat any right of pre-emption accruing under said act, or under this act, or under any preceding act of Congress, nor shall said pre-emption claims be defeated by any contingent Choctaw location.

REMARKS OF MR. NORVELL, OF MICHIGAN.

In Senate, April 18, 1840—On the bill allowing rations to General Wool and Colonel Croghan, Inspectors General of the Army.

Mr. NORVELL said, that this bill, as he now understood from both its friends and its adversaries, proposed to allow the Inspectors General of the Army of the United States, for eight or nine years before 1833, double rations, which, under the same law, had been allowed to them since that year; and had, under the law, been allowed to other staff officers before that period. This discrepancy appeared to have been the result of the different interpretations put, at different times, by different heads of the War Department, upon the act of Congress relating to the subject. The Inspectors General were now realizing the benefit of the double rations; and what the bill contemplated was the allowance of the arrearages of double rations from the passage of the law to the time when the present interpretation of its provisions commenced. The bill established no new principle. Its liberality had, from its passage, been extended to other officers similarly situated. And, for himself, when a claim so strong, in favor of two such gallant officers as the present Inspectors General of the Army, was presented to his feelings and judgment, he could not hesitate as to the course which he should pursue. Sir, who is it that asks justice at your hands on this occasion, under a law of the land? One of these officers is the Hero of Sandusky; the hero of a battle—limited as were the numbers on one side engaged in it—which shed more glory on the country than any other military victory achieved in the late war, except that of New Orleans. The other officer gallantly distinguished himself at Queenstown, and in other battles, in the same war. Was that officer, who, when left with a handful of men by his commanding General, [Harrison,] to defend Fort Stephenson, had so nobly sustained himself against an attack from thousands of British and savage enemies—was he to be selected as a fit object of exclusion from the benefits of a law which had been extended to officers not more worthy, and certainly not so distinguished? He trusted not. What he desired was, that the services of these brave officers should not be made the ground of such exclusion.

SPEECH OF MR. BROWN, OF MISSISSIPPI,

In the House of Representatives, April 17, 1840—In Committee of the Whole, on the general appropriation bill.

The House having resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill to provide for the civil and diplomatic expenditures of the Government for the year 1840, and the general policy of the Administration, being under discussion,

Mr. BROWN spoke substantially as follows:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Since the commencement of the present session of Congress, it has been my custom rather to listen to the views of other gentlemen than to present any of my own. I have hitherto been a silent member, not from any indifference on my part as to what was passing, or any unwillingness to give expression to my opinion, but from an almost insuperable aversion to engaging in a general scramble for place on this floor. And now that I have arisen to address the committee, it would be a fraud upon its members if I did not frankly admit that it is not so much my purpose to discuss the bill under consideration, as to take part in a desultory debate which has been going on for the last ten or fifteen days. If, in the course of remark in which I design indulging, it shall become necessary for me to allude to the public or private character of any distinguished citizen of this country, I shall do it in that spirit of courtesy which becomes one gentleman speaking of another, and with all due regard to the station which it is my good fortune to occupy. I shall not indulge myself in a train of remark better suited to the medium of a grog shop than to the hall of legislation. The example has been set me by one gentleman [Mr. OGLE] of speaking of a prominent member of the other branch of the Legislature as "a common liar;" and by another, [Mr. STANLY,] of declaring that a distinguished Senator is a fiend incarnate, fit only to be associated with the howling spirits of the vasty deep. I cannot consent, sir, to follow such an example, however distinguished the source from which it comes. I leave the classical and beautiful phrases of liar and fiend to the exclusive use of the more refined and elegant gentlemen who belong to the party that claims for itself all the wealth, all the talents, and all the decency, of the country. Plain, unpretending Loco Foco as I am, rude and uncouth, I will not attempt to soar with these gentlemen into the regions of space, but shall content myself with appearing what I really am—respectful and courteous to every man, and demanding from every man that respect and courtesy which I extend to others. I assure you, Mr. Chairman, I have not the slightest inclination to distinguish myself by the use of expressions better suited to the mouth of a street bully than to the lips of a member of Congress; and I leave honorable gentlemen to the sole occupancy of this new field into which they have gone, free to reap and enjoy all the laurels that may be gathered there, undisturbed by any act or expression of mine. My object is to discuss principles, not characters. I am now about to enter the grand political arena, which has stretched its gigantic dimensions before me; but before I do so, I may as well take a very cursory view of the bill nominally under discussion; and, in doing this, I have an especial favor to ask of the senior members of this House. It is this: point out to me such items in this bill as are objectionable; tell me in what the objection consists; ought the whole item to be stricken out, or only a part? and, if only a part, how much? I ask this, and I do it in all sincerity. It is necessary for me to have some further intelligence on the subject, to enable me to act advisedly. One of the pledges which I gave my constituents, and which I am resolved to carry out, was to aid in reforming the abuses of this Government, if, indeed, any existed, and to reduce its expenditures, if they could be reduced, consistent with the public faith and the substantial interest of the country. I am here, sir, for that purpose; and now is the appropriate time to commence the great work of reform. I am not sufficiently familiar with Government to know which of the expenditures proposed may be dispensed with, or whether, indeed, the whole of them are not absolutely necessary. It is, therefore, no idle interrogatory, but one propounded with feelings of deep sincerity, and to which an answer is most earnestly solicited. Which of the proposed items of expenditures in this bill may be stricken out? We are told that the bill proposes an expenditure of nine millions of dollars; and that nine millions is an enormous sum to expend in the civil and diplomatic departments of a Democratic administration. True, sir, nine millions of dollars is a large, if you please, an enormous sum, but twice nine millions would be a sum much more enormous; and yet who will say that if the honor, or the substantial interest of the nation required the expenditure, that the appropriation ought not to be made, and made promptly? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] objects to that item in the bill which proposes the appropriation of fifteen hundred dollars to the clerk employed by the Government to sign land patents; and if I understood the gentleman aright, it was not that the service was unequal to the money, or that the office ought to be abolished, but that the officer was politically opposed to the gentleman; and for this very substantial reason, he would refuse to compensate him for his labor. Sir, the service, or a great portion of it, has already been performed—performed under a positive contract, a solemn law of Congress. This is not denied, nor is it objected that the service has not been faithfully and efficiently performed; but the person performing it is objectionable to the gentleman, and this furnishes ample reason, in his judgment, for violating the plighted faith of the nation, and disregarding the positive right of an officer of Government. If the office has become a sinecure, and there is now no longer any necessity for it let us, like men guided by reason, and not like children controlled by the caprices and prejudices of the moment go to work, pay for the service already performed, and then repeal the law creating the office, and thus get clear of the officer. But do not disgrace yourselves and the nation by taking the service of a citizen, and then refusing to pay for it, even though that citizen be the son of a Democratic President; and let it be continually borne in mind that the present Administration is nowise responsible for the passage of the law creating this office. It was passed under the late Administration, and at a time when at least one house of Congress (the Senate) was opposed to that Administration, and for the reason, I suppose, that there was then thought to be a necessity for it. If that necessity has ceased, let the law cease with it. All I now say is, that we cannot, and if we could, we ought not, in this informal manner, to get clear of this responsibility of Government. I think (and the gentleman, on reflection, I fancy, will concur with me) that he would much better have expended the time and treasure of the country in proving the law to be no longer necessary, than in abusing the President and his son for offences of which they are even more innocent than himself, and the party with which he is associated.

Again: the gentleman would have us abolish the office of Minister to Russia, Spain, and Mexico, not by a repeal of the law creating them, but by refusing to vote the necessary compensation to the respective incumbents. This, to my palate, Mr. Chairman, smacks a little too strong of agrarianism. This is levelling as with the scythe of ruin, and with no regard to law, order, or the ordinary rules of common honesty. This is the worst species of Loco Foco agrarianism. Has the gentleman properly considered this subject? Is he quite certain that the honor and dignity, and even the pecuniary interest of the nation, would not suffer by such an act? If it would not, then, sir, if the gentleman will place his proposition before the House in proper form, I will vote for it; but I cannot consent, Loco Foco as I am—and therefore prepared, no doubt, in the judgment of the very eloquent gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. OGLE] for the performance of any act, be it never so monstrous—to put my country in a light so disreputable before the world, as to refuse to compensate our resident ministers abroad for services already performed, and thus without inquiry and without reason to reduce them from the dignity and pay of Ministers Plenipotentiary to a mere Charge d'Affaires. But, sir, the gentleman, I am sure, did not make the proposition seriously. He would not vote for it himself; he only wanted something to abuse the Administration about; something out of which to make political capital; and, in the absence of all other things, he had brought forward this proposition, not wishing or expecting it to pass. The gentleman complains of the vast expenditures of Government, and when asked where they have increased so enormously, he points us to the Post Office Department; but he does not inform us of the reasons which produced this state of affairs. Nothing is said about the vast increase of mail facilities in all parts of the country—nothing about the mail being transported over millions of square miles, which but a few years since was a savage waste—nothing about the mail being carried to the door of almost every hamlet in the West and Southwest, which, under the administration of the younger Adams, to which the honorable gentleman has so often and so feliciously alluded, were total strangers to the post boy, and all the comforts and pleasures which he bears with him. The mail transportation has been greatly extended within the last eight years; but this is not the only, nor indeed the greatest reason which has produced the increase in the gross expenditures of this Department. It will be found in the cause which has produced a multitude of political evils. It will be found issuing from that grand Pandora box, out of which has come all our political evils—the existence of banks, the redundancy of paper money, a species of devouring reptile, which, like the locusts of Egypt, has overrun and laid waste the entire country. Whilst the receipts of the Department have been regulated by a fixed specie standard, the expenditures have been placed under the capricious and ever-varying dominion of an ephemeral paper currency—a currency which, though now exploded and exploding, has for the last five years placed a fictitious, nominal value on every particle of property and every species of labor. Thus, whilst the Post Office Department has been denied the right to increase its receipts by an increase in the rates of postage, a state of things is produced by which it is compelled to pay one thousand dollars for a service which, ten years ago, could have been performed for one-half the amount. A contractor who, in 1839, would have carried the mail from Washington to Frederick for two thousand dollars, would, in 1840, demand twice that amount, because his coaches and horses cost him double, and he must necessarily pay twice the usual wages to his drivers. This grows out of an increase in the amount of paper money; which, however, does not add to the current receipts of the Department. Under all these embarrassing circumstances, it is not wonderful that the expenditures are increased; the wonder rather is that the Department should have been enabled to sustain itself at all. And that which is true in regard to the Post Office is more or less so in reference to all the Departments of Government. I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that I shall be met at this point with the stereotyped declaration that the Government is responsible to the people for this inordinate issue of paper money—that it was the legitimate consequence of removing the deposites, and vetoing the Bank of the United States. Upon these points, I shall, at a proper time, take issue with gentlemen, and endeavor to demonstrate the error into which they have fallen: at present, it would perhaps be wandering a little too far from the record, to go off upon these collateral, and to this bill immaterial, issues. Though I will not now undertake to show what has not produced the present and pre-existing state of affairs, yet may I not expect the pardon of the committee, if I digress for a moment, for the purpose of showing what has, in my judgment, been the real and main cause of their production? Coming from a State upon which the evils of the day have fallen with more severity than upon any other portion of the Union, or of the world, and having been no idle observer of the grand panorama which has been exhibited in that country, I fancy that I can speak with some degree of assurance as to the causes which produced its fall, and point with some certainty to the pencil with which the awful picture was first marked out. I come from a section of the Union the most depressed and deplorable in all its monetary relations of any part of this vast and deeply afflicted Republic, affording a theme fruitful to the political economist, and presenting a melancholy example of the folly too often practised of abstracting capital from its active pursuits, and investing it in unproductive property. Mississippi can produce more real exports than the same amount of population in any part of the habitable globe; and yet, with all her energies, we find her, in a time of profound tranquillity, with the ports of the whole world thrown open to her great staples, prostrate, writhing under a load of oppression, to the sustaining of which, with all her energies, she is found inadequate. How and why is this? Let us not be told that it grows out of any action of the Federal Government on the subjects of banks and currency. It will find its origin in another quarter: in a too hasty, and, I fear, an improper disposition of the public lands. From the year 1833 to 1836, the Indian title to vast quantities of the most productive territory was extinguished, and it became the policy of the then Administration—a policy almost universally approved by all parties—to hurry those lands as rapidly as possible into market. Most of them were situate in a frontier, or, at most, in a sparsely populated country. The wants of the settler, the sturdy pioneer of the South and Southwest, whose little settlements here and there dotted the face of the wilderness, were soon supplied, and vast territories of the most productive soil in North America, that having been offered for sale and refused, now remained to be entered at the minimum of $1 25 per acre. This opened a field for speculation too inviting long to remain unobserved, and the gloating eyes of avarice were turned upon it; a tide of emigrants, from all parts of the country, flowed in, gladdening the wilderness for a season, and filling the land with joy. They, in their turn, purchased their little homes, and seemed contented. The soil was to them what property in general was to our first parents, a common stock, and each individual to himself appropriated, for an almost nominal sum, such portion as his wants required. But this state of things did not long continue. Large companies of land speculators, chiefly merchants from your Eastern cities, were organized, and vast sums of money consolidated and sent to the Southwest, to be invested in "wild lands," that were wholly unproductive; thus abstracting from the current business a portion of its necessary support, to be invested where it could, by no possibility, produce one dollar of gain; depleting and causing necessary languor and unhealthiness in the channels from which it had been abstracted, and giving no additional vigor to the other departments of business, the lands being purchased for speculation, and not for cultivation. When this species of devouring locusts came among us, and began their work of demolition on the public domain, our hitherto quiet and contented citizen became changed in his nature; the serpent had crept into his Eden, and for the first time he conceived the new idea of making his fortune by land jobbing, rather than by tilling the soil. A portion, nay, the whole, of his surplus cash, which might better have been spent in improving his little farm, or discharging some honest obligation, was invested in "wild lands;" the pernicious example, like all others of similar character, was followed by his confiding neighbor. To morrow some wanderer from his native home in search of the new Elysium, finds this land of promise; pleased with the soil, and still more with the generous hospitality of its occupants, he determines to take up his abode. Land purchased at the minimum, is sold to our honest adventurer at twice that sum; and he soon becomes regularly installed into all the mysteries of living without work; for he, in his turn, to make a penny in an honest way, sells the same land for five dollars per acre. The news sweeps over the country like an electric flash; the story of the grand speculation is on every tongue, and the same land is sold for ten dollars per acre. This is too much—

"The banner is flung to the wild winds free."

Fortunes are to be made by speculation. The horn of plenty is inverted, and all may grow fat who will feast their appetites. Drawers are searched, purses are turned, the cash that jingled about the infant's neck is taken off, and fuss and confusion reign; money must be raised to purchase more lands, that we may grow more rich. In short, sir, every dollar that can be raised in the whole country is taken to the land office, given for unproductive soil, and as essentially lost to the real business of the country, as though it had been cast into the sea. Fortunate, most fortunate had it been for my afflicted State, and for the whole country, if the folly had here ceased. But the real capital of the country being exhausted, the Legislatures were importuned to create more banks, that there might be more money to invest in more unproductive lands. These banks, without capital, had all to gain and nothing to lose; their issues were free and unlimited; the country was flooded with their paper, producing the disastrous consequences, first, of an ability on the part of speculators to purchase large quantities of lands; and, secondly, the ability to hold them at very high prices, besides stimulating every article of necessary family consumption into an inordinate nominal value. Every man felt rich in the possession of his real estate upon which he had fixed his own price, with a firm resolve to obtain that price or keep the land. The land might be kept, but it was unproductive. Holding it at very high prices suddenly checked the tide of emigration and left the country full of venders, but without purchasers. Meanwhile, a system of extravagance is began and kept up to commensurate with the fancied wealth of neighbor Humbug. The Misses Humbug, whose father is producing nothing, but who is rich in the possession of lands, have doffed their dunstables and a plain silk, and now think it quite mal-apropos with any thing short of a satin hat, mounted with a flowing white plume. Embroidered silks, satins, shalleys and velvets take the place of the old-fashioned family apparel; splendid coaches, blooded horses, servants in livery, fine houses, magnificent furniture, rich and costly services of plate, take the place of domestic simplicity and plain Republican elegance. All Europe and America are ransacked for viands to load a mahogany table that has driven the old-fashioned cherry and walnut from the dining-room of a woodland cottage into the garret of a princely mansion. The Northern merchant—as if reason had lost her dominion—excites and encourages the extravagance, by selling vast and almost incomprehensible amounts of merchandise to our country merchants; they retail them to their customers, who in their turn find it impossible to pay in any thing better than the paper of an insolvent bank, conjured into existence to answer the present purpose of some reckless speculator, that having come out of its chrysalis, has suddenly taken to itself wings and flown away. The country merchant has a wealthy customer, but one whose means are not available. He cannot collect his dues, and therefore cannot pay his merchant in New York. The New Yorker has sapped too deeply the foundation of his trade, by drawing from it large sums of money to be invested in unprofitable lands. He cannot bear up under a dishonor of his country paper. Our dealer is urged to pay, and he in his turn presses his customer; but payment is not made, because it cannot be made; presently the New Yorker fails in business; his failure embarrasses his neighbor, and his another, and anon a general crash is heard—terror and consternation possess the community. The importunities for money become greater and still more great. The wealthy Mr. Humbug determines to sell a portion of his lands, pay his debts, and live independent. He starts out with this honest purpose, but what is his surprise to find every body selling, and no one buying. He returns dispirited, disappointed, disheartened. He is sued, harassed with executions, and finally breaks; at this point he turns Whig, curses Gen. Jackson, swears that Van Buren is the greatest scoundrel that ever lived, and starts to Texas. Such, sir, is a faint picture of the causes which have produced much of the embarrassments in my own country—such a brief outline of the rise, expansion, and final explosion of the greatest bubble that ever floated on the wide ocean of popular folly. But, Mr. Chairman, there is a more interesting inquiry touching this subject than the one usually discussed in this hall. The real inquiry with the great mass of the people, is not who or what produced the mischief; but what means are to be resorted to to get clear of it. I find that on all the essential points we differ; we differ radically and essentially. It never has, perhaps it never will be, otherwise. There is no such thing as a concurrence among us as to what produced this calamity: for years has it been discussed by the ablest men in the nation, and with as little prospect of arriving at any harmonious, result now as when they began. Let us not, then waste our time in this unprofitable disputation. Let us rather act for the attainment of some present and permanent good. If the house be on fire, let us first extinguish the flames, and then go out into the streets and high places in search of the incendiary. One of the first steps to be taken, is to introduce a rigid system of economy into all the various departments of business, public and private. In Republics like ours, if the people become extravagant, the Government is likely to be infected with the same mania, since it draws its subsistence and vitality directly from the people; and I call upon members here to set an example to their constituents, worthy of emulation: let them show by their public actions that economy and reform is to be the order of the day, and it will exert a benign and happy influence over all classes of the community. But gentlemen tell me that something else must be done; that it is useless to talk of economy to a man in the last stage of mortal existence; that the community is sick to death, and, if relief be not soon procured, the patient must expire. Sir, we have proposed our remedy. That remedy, which we grant, must be slow in its operations, but will, we think, be more speedy, as well as more certain, than any other, to effect a final and permanent cure. And what have you done? You have stood between our ministering hand and the lips of an expiring patient; and you have exhorted him not to receive our remedy. Still you persuade him that he is growing worse, and that each day he is drawing nearer and nearer to his final dissolution. But what, says the alarmed, exhausted, and dying man, shall I do to be saved? And you modestly respond, turn off your present attendant, and take us into your service. Ay, sir, take you into his service; and, pray, what will you do? How will you minister to his wants? Upon this subject you are non-committal. You refuse our remedy; and yet you have no panacea of your own. Will the change which you propose be so salutary in its influence as to heal our afflictions? Will the defeat of Mr. Van Buren and the election of General Harrison act like a charm upon the country. Is this new political Messiah to work by miracles? Is he a sort of political faith doctor? Tell me, sir, what he is to do for the country, and how he is to do it. Upon what principles will he administer the Government? What great measure of reform is proposed? And how and by what means is it to be carried out? General Harrison has been before the American people for more than four months, and no man can say—no man holding a position in the Whig ranks, to give force and efficiency to his declarations, dare say—what are his opinions upon any great question of national interest. Dare any man say that General Harrison is for or against a National Bank, Internal Improvement, the Tariff, or even Abolition itself? Dare any member of the Whig party on this floor rise in his place and commit his party to the support of any measure of any kind? No, sir, they come in the impressive language of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. WATTERSON] as the architects of ruin, to pull down every thing and put up nothing. That I may distinctly understand the position which gentlemen intend to assume, I now, sir, call upon them individually, and as a party of honorable men, to come out and give us their principles. Do you commit yourselves to the support of a National Bank?

[Mr. CHINN, from his seat. I do.]

But does the gentleman speak for his party? Will his party link their destiny to a National Bank? Will it be the policy of General Harrison's Administration, in the event of his election, to create such an institution. I put the categorical question to gentlemen of the Opposition, on all sides of the House, and I shall be content to receive a categorical answer. I am impatient for an answer, but it shall be my good pleasure to await the response of honorable gentlemen. I pause for a reply. No one answers. Then, Mr. Chairman, I am justified in concluding, that gentlemen either support a man without knowing his principles, or else they are afraid or ashamed to let his principles be known to the country and to the very people whose suffrages they ask. If gentlemen can find ease and comfort in either position, I give them joy. Though, Mr. Chairman, gentlemen here will not commit themselves or their party to the support of a United States Bank—though, sir, they do not, and will not, and dare not, designate this as their means of relief, yet I choose so to regard it. All of us agree that something must be done to relieve the country, purify the currency, and move again the stagnant pools of commerce. We (the Democrats, or the Loco Focos, if it please you better) say that that something must be the adoption of the Sub-Treasury. You, gentlemen, say what? You are loud and long in your denunciations of our scheme, and swear to it an eternal hate. What may we expect of you? What do you bring forward as the great antagonist of the Sub-Treasury? Nothing; literally nothing.

I think proper to say, Mr. Chairman, to my constituents, through the medium of this House, that the present state of things must continue, or the Sub-Treasury must be adopted. Nothing else can be done—nothing else is proposed; and those who oppose our scheme, and produce none of their own, must be in favor of the existing state of affairs. If I can get no one here to take up a National Bank and oppose it as the great rival to the Sub-Treasury, I will leave this hall and discuss the question with particular reference to the state of political feeling in Mississippi. There the Whigs are more unflinching than their brethren in this latitude. They come out boldly, and avow their preference for such an institution. And now, sir, permit me to institute a brief comparison between the two schemes; first premising that in all our legislative action it becomes our solemn and imperitive duty to make our acts conform to the letter of the Constitution, and to the spirit and meaning of our Republican form of Government. Our venerable forefathers first conceived the idea of throwing off the British forms, and when they had done so, they resolved to crown the bold adventure by establishing what had been hitherto unknown in the science of government, to wit: a Government of the people. They gave us a representative Democracy, and so admirably constructed, that once in two, four, and six years, all political power reverted to the people; and so long as we adhere to that form of government, it is our duty to do no act which will take those powers out of the hands where our forefathers reposed them. Indeed it may well be questioned whether it is not a species of political treason to do so.

And now, sir, pray what is a Bank of the United States? For want of better data, I take the proposition of the distinguished statesman and orator from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY,] regarded every where as Sir Oracle, the Jupiter Tonans of the Whig party. His Bank was to have a corporate existence of fifty years, and an incorporated capital of fifty millions of dollars. And what are the important functions it is to perform? One gentleman on my right says it is to "regulate the currency." Another, on my left, says it will regulate commerce. My friend who sits before me thinks it will regulate the State banks; and the member near me wants it as the fiscal agent to collect and disburse the revenues of Government; and my friend from Louisiana, [Mr. CHINN,] who is the only man of his party that has had the boldness to come out in favor of such an institution, thinks, I have no doubt, it would perform all these various offices.

I hear the response of my friend, and it is sufficient for my purpose. I admire his honesty, and I would compliment his frankness, but I cannot, except at the expense of his discretion. Yes, Mr. Chairman, a Bank such as that of which I have spoken, might, perhaps it would, perform all these various offices. But, sir, what is the Bank to which you propose to intrust these powers, and under what influence is it placed? An association of thirteen merchants of the city of New York, under a corporate name, elevated, by a solemn act of Congress, above the great mass of the people; not subject to their will, and not reached by any influence of theirs; under no control other than that of their unbridled will, conducting their proceedings in secret chambers, and with an eye single to the interest of the stockholders and favorites of the Bank. And this is the institution to which you are to entrust the regulation of commerce, the regulation of the currency, the regulation of State banks, the fiscal agency of the Government; and, I will add, the regulation of the wages of labor, the prices of property, and the opinions of members of Congress. And for what period of time? For fifty years, or until your Bank charter expires by its own limitation, it exercises all these various powers supremely, independently, without control. Are these powers among the essential ingredients of Government? Are they not in fact the very elements of Government itself? May that be called a Government of the people, where the power to regulate commerce, to regulate exchanges, and fix at pleasure the quality and quantity of the circulating medium of the country, is taken out of the hands of the people, and entrusted, for a period of fifty years, to a coterie of bank directors, owing no responsibility to the people or to their representatives, but acting by sanction of law, in a sphere above and beyond the power and influence of the ballot-box? Is that, sir, a representative Democracy, where all the essential elements of Government are taken from the Representative chosen by the people, and placed in the custody of a corporation—an immaterial thing; a thing not visible or tangible? Answer me these things; and if you answer as I know you must, then tell me, sir, whether you are violating the letter of the Constitution, immolating our forms of Government, insulting the shades of our fathers, and converting what they intended should ever remain a representative Democracy, into a sort of incorporated political oligarchy—whether, sir, you are wresting from the people the powers of Government, and surrendering them into the custody and keeping of a corporation. Gentlemen insist that the United States Bank is to regulate the local or State banks. By this I understand it is to control the amount of their issues. If it expands, they expand; if it contracts, they contract: thus, at its beck and nod, money is plenty or scarce. If the Bank of the United States wills it so, money is plenty, property rises in value, and wages grow higher. Presently, from inclination or necessity, it contracts its issues, money becomes scarce, wages go down, and property sinks in value. Thus, by contracting and expanding its issues, which it does at will, it regulates the wages of every man's labor, and fixes the value of every species of property, and with as much ease and facility as you, sir, would regulate a clock by raising and sinking the pendulum; and all this is done in a Government where the people are flattered with the story of their supremacy, and cajoled into the belief that they are in fact the sovereigns of the land.

But, says my distinguished friend over the way, we must tie up the Bank with the strong cords of the law—subject it to the frowns and indignation of the people—let the thunders of an outraged constituency fall upon the ears of our bantling, and bid it pause in its career of ruin. Alas! sir, it has no ear; it will be deaf to your lamentations, here and elsewhere. You may scowl upon its conduct, but it is blind to your indignation; it is a mere ideal thing. You hear the winds, but you do not see them; you feel the rays of the sun, but cannot put your hand upon them; and as well might you attempt to lock up these invisible and intangible things, as to attempt, by legal enactments, to restrain a bank within its chartered limits. Æolus locked up the winds in the mountain caverns, and the sun stood still at the bidding of Joshua. But, alas! there are no Æoluses, no Joshuas now. All time, all experience, has shown that the tendency of corporations and of associated wealth, is to place themselves above the law, the Constitution, and people; and as well, sir, in my opinion, might you attempt to chain the lion to his lair, by throwing cobwebs about his mane, as to attempt, by legal restrictions, to keep a fifty million bank within any prescribed limits.

Permit me, Mr. Chairman, (and only for the sake of argument,) to submit a proposition to honorable gentlemen; and as I only submit it by way of argument, I beg that gentlemen may not be alarmed. Instead of giving up the powers of Government, to be exercised by an invisible moneyed aristocracy, in the form of a National Bank, I propose to give them to the President of the United States. That is, sir, instead of having commerce, currency, exchanges, local banks, and political opinions, the wages of labor, and the value of property, subjected to the controlling influence of one grand consolidated National Bank, I propose to place them under the control of the President of the United States; and I am not particular whether that President be William Henry Harrison or Martin Van Buren; nor even, sir, in the language of Mr. Clay, if it be Thomas H. Benton, Amos Kendall, Francis P. Blair, or the Devil. To the President of the United States, whoever he may be, I propose intrusting these powers. What objection do gentlemen make? Here is the man of the people's choice, selected by them from fifteen millions of freemen, in consideration of his talents, his patriotism, and his exalted moral and political worth, to preside over their destinies. To this man, thus chosen, holding his office for a limited tenure, with no motive to act corruptly, and with every inducement to act leniently, reached by the smiles and subjected to the frowns of his countrymen, with a hard earned reputation at stake, with, in fact, all to lose and nothing to gain, I propose intrusting these powers. Methinks I hear my friend over the way, to whom Executive patronage is even more terrible than the ghost of Banquo was to the affrighted Macbeth, lifting his eloquent and impressive voice against it. Why, says he, this is worse than war, pestilence and famine—more terrible than standing armies. Hark ye, friend, the people can do wrong; they are sovereign; they are capable of governing themselves; at least so you and I persuade them; and these powers are only to be intrusted to the man of the people's choice. If he act corruptly—if he play the tyrant—the people, the sovereign people, have the correction in their own hands; they have only to exercise their reserved high constitutional privilege at the ballot box, and all is right; the corruption is made pure, and the tyrant is dethroned. But, says my friend, give these powers to the Executive, and he will rise above the people and above the influence of the ballot box. If you give him these powers, you constitute him king, emperor, autocrat, supreme ruler of the land. You may still keep up the name of freedom—still cling to the withered skeleton of the Constitution; you may go through the forms of an election, but its influence is not felt; all political power is merged in the Executive, and the voice of the people is hushed, or has become as "sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal." Why, says the gentleman in the fulness of his patriotism, and in the plenitude of trepidation at the horrors of Executive patronage, there is not a crowned head in all Europe who possesses one tithe of the power you propose to confer on the American President Ay, sir, and upon whom do you propose to confer all this power? Not upon the man of the people's choice—not upon the man who is elected by the people, and amenable to the people—but upon a soulless, unfeeling, and irresponsible corporation. If the possession of the powers by the President constitutes him king, emperor, autocrat, pray, sir, tell me, in the name of all that is reasonable and right—in the name of God and our beloved country, what does it constitute the bank? Says the gentleman, the bank once exercised all these powers, and we did not feel its tyranny. It is not the possession of power that constitutes the tyrant, but the exercise of it. Elizabeth ruled over England, and her people were prosperous and happy; but the Stuarts succeeded to the throne, and with the same powers they threw terror and consternation over the land, and filled the hearts of the people with mourning. I know not, sir, by what feelings and motives other gentlemen are moved, but, for myself, if these powers are to pass out of the hands of the people, I want to see them put in the possession of a man—a thing of life—a real thing of flesh and blood. If we are to have any king or tyrant in this country, I want that he may be a living, creeping thing—something that I may see, that I may feel, into whose face I can look, and upon whose brow I can place my burning curses as he bends about these uncaptive limbs the fetters of despotism—and not a soulless, unfeeling corporation—an invisible, intangible, and immaterial thing—a thing not responsible to man on earth, or God in heaven. So help me Heaven, I could not intrust these powers to Washington himself, though his sainted and canonized spirit (which I trust is ever hovering around this Capitol, and rendering up its devoutest orisons to God, invoking His benedictions upon this people) could return to reanimate his body and quicken it into renewed existence. I could not, sir; because these powers once given away, no residuary power could make us free; and that which I could not intrust to the Father of his country, I surely would not intrust to a corporation, even though that corporation consisted of thirteen New York merchants, and they not only honest, but above suspicion. Here I am met by the declaration that I expect the Sub-Treasury to perform all these various functions, and that the Sub-Treasury is the creature of the President and under his control. Without saying how far the Sub-Treasury scheme, when it shall get into successful operation, will affect the commerce, exchanges, currency, and local banks of the country, I will suggest that it will control them, if at all, by by a fixed and determined rule—a rule not under the control of the President, but one settled by law, and which must ever remain the same until it is altered by an act of Congress. The power in a bank which makes it dangerous, and which, in truth, gives to it influence, is its ability to issue paper money otherwise than on a metallic basis, make discounts, and receive money on deposite. Give it these, and it will not be, like Archimides, in want of a place on which to rest his fulcrum; it has this; it has, in addition, all the elements of power and strength, and it needs but the will to apply them, which it is too apt to have, to repel the Government itself. Deprive it of these, and it is shorn Sampson, a fangless serpent, which may have the will, but not the ability, to do mischief. The Sub-Treasury possesses none of these powers—not one of them. Another, and not the least by far of the advantages which it claims over a National Bank, is that it is ever subject to the controlling influence of the people. The people, in the person of their Representatives, may alter, amend, or abolish it, at pleasure. And this, sir, seems to be in accordance with the spirit and meaning of our free institutions. But a bank presents the singular anomoly of a creature rising above the creator; of an institution in a Government of the people rising above the people; for, according to Whig ethics, a bank charter is not alterable, or amendable, except at the the discretion of the bank.

I regret, Mr. Chairman, that I have pursued this subject so far. I have said more, much more, than I had intended; and yet I do not well see how I could have said less; find ng it incidentally connected with the defence of the Administration against the general charge of having produced a state of calamity and ruin, and now neglecting or refusing any corrective, I have been insensibly led into these observations. If they produce the slightest effect here or elsewhere, I shall be more than compensated for all the trouble they have cost me. Asking pardon of the committee for the aggression, I return to the bill, and to the arguments of gentlemen who have spoken in opposition to its passage.

I am told that this bill is an Executive measure—that it comes here with the impress of the tenant of the White House upon it, and that it does not give evidence of that rigid economy which we were informed in the beginning of this session was to become the order of the day. Again, Mr. Chairman, I appeal to gentlemen to show me in what this bill gives earnest of the extravagance, profligacy, and corruption, of which we hear so much. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] is the only member, of the dozen and one Opposition orators who have spoken on this bill, that has deigned to tell us in what its extravagance does consist. He desires to have our Ministers recalled from foreign courts, and their places supplied by Charges d'Affaires. But he has not shown us how we are to avoid national dishonor in such an act. What, sir, will be said of a nation of fifteen millmillions of freemen, who, refusing to reciprocate an honor extended to it by a foreign power, by sending here their resident Minister Plenipotentiary, assigns for it the ridiculous reason "that we are too poor to bear the expense." I am for economy and retrenchment; but I spurn them, if they are to be purchased at the expense of national pride and national honor. Economy is wanted; but this is not the way to economize. Retrenchment is demanded; but it must not, and so far as I am concerned it shall not, commence here. I would, sir, have you commence this work of economy and reform as the physician ministers to his patient—first learning the seat of the disease, and then applying the remedy. If an arm be affected, I would not have you amputate the leg; and if a man's head be sick, I would not have you pierce his heart. And so, sir of the body politic. If the disease, the extravagance, profligacy, of which you speak, exist in the War Department, go there with your remedy: if in the Navy, go there: and if in the Treasury or Post Office, go there. But do not, I pray you, stretch the Government on the Procrustean bed, and under pretence of curing a diseased part, cut off a leg on this side, and an arm on that, until you have so mutilated its fair proportions that it withers and dies, or hobbles out a miserable existence, "the pity of its friends and the scorn of its enemies." Much, very much has been said, Mr. Chairman, about "frauds and corruption" in all the departments of Government, and it is given out that this bill is its hiding place. The great recluse, who is ever present, and always invisible, has his cavern, his mysterious and undiscovered home, in this bill. I am rejoiced that the discovery has been made. I congratulate gentlemen and the country that we are at least so close upon the heels of the many headed monster; and to prevent every possibility of his escape, I propose that we station some of our best tacticians around this bill after the fashion of surrounding the Pontine marshes, and that gentlemen go with fire and sword, if they please, and drag this monster from his den. Sir, I rejoice that this grand crusade, after the far famed "fraud and corruption," as at last drawing to a close. Unlike the Seminoles in Florida, you have traced him to his hiding place. You have the soldiery under your command, and if the enemy be not now taken, it is your fault. Then be not sleeping on your posts—gird on your armor, and let the work of war be heard with the coming in of to-morrow's dawn. Hitherto you have complained that the soldiery were not of your; that their cause was not your cause; that their feelings and attachments were with the enemy, and that they did not carry on that relentless warfare which the emergency of the hour and the perfidy of the enemy so imperiously demanded. Sir, you can no longer make that complaint. The captain general of this House (the SPEAKER) is he whom you have chosen to the high command—and he has not betrayed you He has chosen the captains and lieutenants and drill sergeants from your own ranks, and after a campaign of three months, they return, throw down their armor, declare that there is no enemy in the country, and ask to be disbanded. But the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] whose quick ear detects the slightest sound, and from whose watchful eye no phantom can escape, avers that there is an enemy in the country; that he has seen him and felt him; and with a zeal and energy which does equal justice to his head and heart, he demands, in the name of his beseiged country, that the army be not disbursed. Sir, I agree with him, and I will go with the honorable gentleman in his opposition to this abrupt termination of a seven years' war. If for nothing else, in very charity I will do it. For it would be be an unkind cut, after all we have heard about this monstrous enemy of our country for the last seven years, to permit gentlemen now to acknowledge that there was indeed no such enemy in the land. Nay, sir, I will do more. I will give my humble aid (and I can say as much for my honorable colleague) to the elevation of the honorable gentleman [Mr. WISE] himself, to command. If he is not pleased with the conduct his honorable friend [Mr. BRIGGS, chairman of Expenditures, &c.] perhaps he could be pleased with his own mode of warfare. The gentleman has some experience, too. His celebrated cruise to New York (on the Swartwout Committee) won for him laurels, green and glorious, but laurels on which one so young and valiant would not be content to recline, when others, still more rich, were to be gathered in the same field. I thought, myself, that the celebrated Swartwout campaign was a little too Quixotic—had a little too much of the windmill about it; but in this I may have erred; and, in the error, may have done the honorable gentleman some injustice. I am, therefore, the more anxious that he should assume the command, and by an exercise of that chivalry and high bearing, which I know he possesses, terminate the worst of all our wars—this war against "fraud and corruption."

If the gentleman will allow me, and will receive the suggestion in all kindness, I will remark that the country expects him to take the lead in this war. If my memory does not betray me into error, the honorable member made pledges to the country on this subject—pledges which the country is anxious to see fulfilled. And I again tender my humble services to the distinguished gentleman in enabling him to carry out those pledges.

But, Mr. Chairman, in all sober seriousness, I do beg of gentlemen, either to cease this eternal clamor about frauds and corruption, or go to work and expose them. They have ample verge and scope; they elected their Speaker, and have all the committees organized to their liking; and if this is not satisfactory, if committees of their own friends, whose duty it is to investigate the frauds and expenditures of Government, will not perform their trust, let them ask for another organization of committees; or, if they please, for select committees. Let them ask for any thing and every thing, and I, and the party with whom I am associated, are prepared to give it to them. We ask one of two things, either that they cease their clamor about frauds, corruptions, and perjury, or that they go with committees, organized after their own fashion, and ferret out the evidence of these abuses. One of these things I ask, in the name of the party with whom I act—in the name of the whole country—in the name of justice, decency, and propriety; and from this day forward I want it distinctly understood, that the Whig party have had, now have, and will continue to have, full, ample, and unlimited power to search, winnow, and investigate, every department of this Government, from the State down to the Post Office, in all their various ramifications.

When I came here, Mr. Chairman, I expected the first note that would have fallen upon my ear had been a Whig lamentation, that the party in power would not permit investigation; that the most enormous frauds were daily perpetrated, and that the spacious mantle of Executive and Legislative connivance was thrown over to conceal them; and I left home with the firm purpose, without regard to consequences to my party or to myself, to assist in removing that mantle, and in exposing this perfidy. Imagine, sir, my surprise, when almost four months of the session had gone, to hear, for the first time, an anxiety expressed to see these frauds investigated; and how much greater was my surprise, when I heard the very gentlemen who had been loudest and longest in their outcry against these things, the most reluctant to engage in the work of investigation—one gentleman [Mr. BRIGGS] wishing to have his committee discharged, and another [Mr. WISE] lecturing him for his want of devotion to the country, but still reluctant to take his place. Why, sir, I expected, after the announciation of the last winter, by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. WISE] that the clerks of the Departments were in the habit of coming secretly to his chamber at midnight, and disclosing to him the enormous frauds that were going on, that no space would have contained him, if he had been denied the privilege of carrying on his investigations; but, instead of this, the gentleman has been as quiet as a lamb, and even now shows no inclination to commence the great work. I submit to the honorable gentleman, whether it is quite patriotic in him, convinced as he doubtless is of the existence of these enormous frauds, not to be more vigilant and industrious in ferreting them out? Or has the gentleman concluded with me, that it was no real thing that whispered in his ear, but a mere creation of his heated imagination—a kind of spirit, that, like the ghost of Hamlet's father, said:

"But that I am forbid
To tell the secrets of my prison house,
I could a tale unfold, whose ligh est word
Would harrow up thy soul; freeze thy young blood;
Make thy two eyes, like stars, start from their spheres;
Thy knotted and combined locks to part;
And each particular hair to stand on end
Like quills upon the fretful porcupine."

Ay, sir; that it was in fact in ghost, I do not doubt; but that it was an honest ghost, I do doubt most essentially.

In connection with this subject, I do not feel inclined to discuss the merits or demerits of the aspirants to the Presidency. But there was a remark of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] to which I must allude. He informs us that the President of the United States has been defeated in his native State, (New York,) for no better reason than that he is "a Northern man with Southern principles." This remark, coming as it did from an avowed Abolitionist, struck me with peculiar force. I felt deeply and sensibly the truth of the suggestion, and I could but ask myself how it was received by Southern Whigs, acting in concert with the gentleman in his opposition to the President—whether it fell upon their ears like the dulcet vibrations of an Æolian harp, or whether it was not to them like the death-knell of Southern hopes and Southern rights. The South will learn ere long to know her friends, and, learning this, she will find that her bitterest foes do not always live north of Mason and Dixon's line, but within her own borders, living upon her soil, honored with her confidence, and receiving the protection of her laws; are men who hold the hemlock to her lips. Unfaithful friends are more to be dreaded than the most open hostile enemy; and I pray that the South may not fall, if fall she must, by the treachery of her own sons, or, expiring, she may not have cause to exclaim:

"The shaft that deepest in my bosom went
Was from the bow pretended friendship bent."

With the candidate of the Whig party I have nothing to do. I do not possess the power, and if I did, I would not exercise it, of plucking one laurel from the wreath that decks his veteran brow. His official acts are matters of record, about which it ill becomes me to be lecturing those who have as ample opportunity as myself to learn. I pass over, therefore, in silence, his military career. I have nothing to say about the battle of the river Raisin, nothing about the abandonment of Fort Sandusky. With the sacrifice of the gallant Daviess I have nothing to do. The battles of the Thames and the far-famed Tippecanoe were fought; by whom, and with what honor to the country, I leave history to decide. Nor shall I pause to inquire whether General Harrison had an honorable or dishonorable discharge from the army. It is enough that he resigned his commission, and was succeeded in the command by one who brought the war to a brilliant and glorious termination. I will be permitted, however, to remark that it is not in good taste to have opposed Gen. Jackson's elevation to the Presidency because he was a military chieftain, and to advocate Gen. Harrison's pretensions on the same grounds. Of General Jackson it was said that it were better that war, pestilence and famine should visit the country, than that a military chieftain should be chosen to rule over it. And yet, by the same men, we are exhorted to vote for Gen. Harrison because he is a military chieftain. Why, say gentlemen, in the darkest hour of our political travail, when clouds and darkness overshadowed the land; when cowardice and treachery had brought disgrace upon our arms, and clothed this broad land in mourning; when the eyes of the whole country were anxiously looking for some redeeming spirit, Harrison came forth; he rallied to the rescue; he changed our mourning into public rejoicing; he raised the tattered star spangled banner from being soiled and trailed in the dust, to be borne aloft amidst the "Shock, the shout, the frown of war;"

that he wrung the laurel from the bloody fangs of the British lion, and wove it in the glossy plumage of the American eagle, and sent her soaring through the skies, the glad harbinger of glory and of victory. All this may be true, but if it is, history has done the General exceedingly great wrong, not to have recorded the facts, or to have done it so bunglingly that another has received the homage of a people whose gratitude should have been bestowed on him. But as military services do not always afford the best evidence of a man's qualification for the Presidency, may I not be permitted, with proper respect to the General and his friends, to inquire what are his civil claims? We present a candidate whose opinions are clearly defined, and every where understood. You attack the errors of those opinions, but you deny us the privilege of either concurring in, or dissenting from the opinions of General Harrison, because you will not let us know what those opinions are. We are gravely informed that the great Harrisburg Convention did not deem it prudent to make any general declaration of the opinions and principles of the Opposition party; and that the committee into whose hands the candidate of the party has been placed for safe keeping, have determined that he should make no more disclosure of his opinions, whilst occupying his present position. I venture the assertion that this is the first time in the history of this Government, that any aspirant to popular favor has taken the broad ground that he would make no declaration of his opinions to friends or foes, during his candidacy. It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that gentlemen put a very poor estimate upon the intelligence of the people, whose suffrages they seek. Instead of coming out with a bold and fearless declaration of their opinions and sentiments, in imitation of that "time-serving, wire-working, non-committal candidate of the Republican party," they deem it most advisable to keep their opinions concealed; and, as if they thought the people a great booby, who could be cajoled and flattered with sweet cakes, candies, and sugar plums, they discourse him most eloquently about distress, log cabins, crackers, and hard cider. And who, sir, is it that is keeping up this perpetual clamor about "log cabins and hard cider?" Who, sir, but the lords, aristocrats, and nabobs of the land; men, who live themselves in marble palaces, and drink the best wine that France ever produced? who use the people at elections as a farmer does his horse, to perform a drudgery, and then to be turned out to graze until he is wanted again, and again to be caught up by shaking a bundle of hay, or pounding on a cider barrel. Sir, I demand of gentlemen whether any thing is known of the principles or opinions of General Harrison? whether any thing is urged in his favor, except that he lives in a "log cabin, and drinks hard cider?" And are these qualifications that befit a man for the Presidency? If so, sir, I congratulate my colleague and myself that we represent more than 25,000 freemen, any one of whom is qualified for the first office in the gift of this great Republic; for they live in log cabins, in fact, cabins unlike the General's—which, in sooth, looks very like a splendid country mansion—but the real thing, built of small logs, and clap-boards; and, though our constituents do not drink hard cider, (thank God, they are a little above that,) they can boast of as signal service to the country in quaffing a few glasses of old whiskey; and if gentlemen really think that these are the only qualifications necessary for a President, I stipulate, as a matter of economy, to furnish Presidents from my State for the next five hundred years, for five hundred dollars a piece. In this, I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will go with me, since it is economy on a much more extensive scale than that of supplanting our foreign ministers. I say nothing of General Harrison's political opinions, for the reason that they are veiled in mystery, or have been expressed in such dubious language as to give no definitive idea of what they were. I have a word or two in conclusion, Mr. Chairman, to say in regard to a practice that has obtained very generally in this House, and which is justly esteemed throughout the country as one of bad moral and political tendency, not likely to produce any good, and out of which grow most of our personal broils and disasters. I allude, sir, to the practice of assailing, without reason, the personal and private character of political opponents, and more especially the character of the distinguished men of the country. The character of our great men belongs not to this House or this Congress, but to the whole country. It is the pedestal upon which is built the fairest fabric that human wisdom has ever devised. It is the pillars, the arches, in truth the edifice itself, of our Republican Government; destroy this, and the whole fabric totters from its basis, and crumbles into atoms. Rome owed her greatness to her Senate, and Greece to her philosopher. In more modern times the French Chamber of Deputies has given tone and energy and power to a nation's character. England's bright escutcheon has been rendered still more bright by the eloquence and energy of her sons; and America, young, happy, proud America, when she has run the full race of a nation's pride, when having filled the measure of her goodness and greatness, baffled every difficulty, and outstripped all competition, she sits quietly down upon the summit of her peculiar fame, far above the nations of the earth, she calls the Bissett of the new world to record her history; she will bid him write upon its fairest page the names of her Calhouns, her Clays, her Websters, and her Bentons, for to these will she be indebted for her success, her greatness, and her glory. Sir, when I contemplate the character of the distinguished son of Massachusetts, I do it with pride and exultation. Differing with him in political sentiment as wide as the extremities of earth, I can, nevertheless, do him that justice which his greatness demands. He is an American, and as an American do I honor him, and I envy not that heart whose contracted limits embrace nothing but its especial favorites. Look upon this man, sir; how calm, and yet how great; how like the deep and placid lake that never moves but in a storm; and then, foaming and casting high the billows of passion, sentiment and wit, he seems from the very bottom of his soul to be throwing up the collected contents of a thousand years. And the great orator of the West, he in whom nature has been pleased to blend all that is grand and peculiar—see how, like the great father of waters, he moves on in sullen, solemn, grandeur, with ever and anon a ripple or a spray, a gentle heaving of the water's surface, a thing that you may look upon with awe, and yet with admiration—one of nature's noblest, greatest works, a man whose name is commensurate with the ends of the earth, and whose fame is as boundless as eternity itself. Entertaining no sentiment in common with him, I view him as only as an American statesman, and as an American I am proud that America has given birth to such a son, and no party will or discipline shall deter me from saying so. I turn, Mr. Chairman, from the contemplation of these characters, to pay the humble tribute of my admiration to one nearer my heart—one whose feelings and sentiments are in unison with my own—one who comes from my native land, from my own loved and sunny South. And how—how, sir, shall I speak of him—he who is justly esteemed the wonder of the world, the astonisher of mankind? Like the great Niagara, he goes dashing and sweeping on, bidding all created things give way, and bearing down, in his resistless course, all who have the temerity to oppose his onward career. He, sir, is indeed the cataract—the political Niagara of America; and like that noblest work of nature and of nature's God, he will stand though all after time no less the wonder than the admiration of the world. His was the bright star of genius that in early life shot madly forth, and left the lesser satellites that may have dazzled in its blaze, to that impenetrable darkness to which nature's stern decree had destined them; his the mighty magazine of mind, from which his country clothed herself in the armor of defence; his the broad expansive wing of genius, under which his country sought political protection; his the giant mind, the elevated, spotless mien, which nations might envy, but worlds could not emulate. Such, sir, is John C. Calhoun; such the object of gentlemen's denunciations; such the man whose motives are impugned and whose actions are derided. Such an one needs no eulogium from me, no defence from human lips. He stands beneath a consecrated arch, defended by a lightning shut up in the hearts of his countrymen—by a lightning that will not slumber, but will leap forth to avenge even a word, a thought, a look, that threatens him with insult. The story of his virtuous fame is written in the highest vault of your political canopy, far above the reach of grovelling speculation, where it can alone be sought upon an eagle's pinions, and gazed at by an eagle's eye. His defence may be found in the hearts of his countrymen—his eulogium will be heard in the deep-toned murmurs of posterity, which, like the solemn artillery of heaven, shall go rolling along the shores of time, until it is ingulfed in the mighty vortex of eternity. Little minds may affect to despise him; pigmy politicians may raise the war cry of proscription against him: be it so; insects buz around the lion's mane, but do not arouse him from his lair. The confidence of Americans will never be shaken in the wisdom of this man's acts, nor, sir, in the patriotism of his counsels. Imprecations will add but other links to the mighty chain that binds him to his countrymen; and each blast of your war trumpet will but awaken millions to his support. His firm adherence to principle, in defiance of every danger, and his noble sacrifice of personal prejudice upon the altar of his country's good, whene'er his country's good has demanded the sacrifice, has placed upon his brow a wreath of imperishable glory which there shall flourish in immortal bloom. Who, sir, is John C. Calhoun, and where is he? the noblest son of the sunny South—her genial rays have awakened a feeling of patriotic devotion upon the altar of his heart which the ice-bound bosom of your Eastern serf has never felt. He stands, sir, like the sun-gilt summit of some lofty mountain, around whose base the angry clamors of petty politicians waste themselves in vain—

> "Like some tall cliff, whose awful form
> Swells from the vale, and midway leaves the storm:
> Whilst round his base the rolling clouds are spread,
> Eternal sunshine settles on his head."

Why, sir, it was but the other day that I heard him sneeringly (rather sneeringly, I thought, for one who had been his friend) denounced as a Loco Foco. What, sir, John C. Calhoun a Loco Foco! If so, I desire for myself no more honorable appellation. If, in the eloquent language of Carolina's most eloquent son, [Mr. PICKENS,] that man, the grandeur of whose soul and the splendor of whose genius breathed not only inspiration into the holy cause of freedom, but throws a halo of glory around those burning pages which he devoted to American liberty, be indeed a Loco Foco, then, sir, let me ever rejoice in the thrice hallowed name of Loco Foco. Fling out that banner to the breeze—inscribe upon it the deep-detested name—and, my life upon the issue, thousands upon tens of thousands, nay, sir, millions upon millions, from every clime, of every creed and color in the universe, will hurry to its standard, and if it fall, they will fall with it. Nor, sir, will they deem it else than immortal honor to be shrouded in its folds. If the principles of John C. Calhoun are the principles of the Loco Focos, then, sir, are the Loco Focos the friends of the Constitution and equal rights, the opponents of tyranny in all its forms—the friends of law, and its just administration—and the uncompromising opponents of every species of oligarchy, whether sole or aggregate. Then, sir, do they take the illustrious Jefferson for their political Mahomed, and the doctrines of '98 for their political Alkoran. With these professions and these practices, I, sir, am ready to enter with them the Sanhedrim of their political faith, and commune with them as brethren of the same church. For, sir, in these principles, which you tell me are the principles of the Loco Focos, I recognise the principles of Virginia, the principles of liberty—the principles of right—principles which, forty-five years ago, sprung from the master mind of Jefferson, like Minerva from the brain of Jove, all radiant in the armor of liberty and truth. They wanted but a name to stamp them with the genius of their author, and dedicate them to the eternal cause of human liberty. They have that name. They have it, sir, in your deeply damned name of Loco Foco. Let them wear it through all after time, fit emblem of their worth—fit memento of their illustrious origin. Do you, sir, love your country; go practise upon these principles. Would you perpetuate her institutions; go practise upon these principles. Would you have the star of her glory be onward in its course to the upper sky; go practice upon these principles. Would you have the winds of Heaven saluting her flag, and the extremities of earth acknowledging her name; go practise upon these principles; and you may perpetuate the honor and power, and glory of this country, until the last trump of time shall be sounded upon the confines of vast eternity, until the four angels, that stand on the four corners of this continent, shall, with one accord, lift up their voices to Heaven, proclaiming "peace on earth, and good will to all men."

NOTE.—Mr. BROWN having concluded, Mr JENIFER of Maryland rose to make certain inquiries of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. B.] He asked if he was right in supposing that the gentleman who had just resumed his seat was "General ALBERT GALLATIN BROWN?" Mr. B. nodding assent, Mr. J. read an extract from a newspaper, to the purport that Mr. B. in his electioneering canvass, had declared that he would abandon the Sub-Treasury if Mr. Van Buren abandoned it; and asked whether the facts, as set forth in the paper, were correct; and he would further inquire whether the gentleman [Mr. B.] had not been the advocate of the post note system in Mississippi—a system which had brought bankruptcy and ruin on that State.

Mr. BROWN responded. He had used language similar to that read by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. JENIFER,] but with no intention of conveying the idea which seemed to have been produced on the gentleman's mind, that he (Mr. B.) was either a lukewarm supporter of the Sub-Treasury before the people, or that he was subservient to the will of the Executive. His remarks had been garbled. What he had intended to say at the time alluded to, and what he believed he was understood as saying by all who heard him with impartial ears, was, that if the Sub-Treasury was abandoned by the prominent members of his party, it would lose its chance of success; and having lost this, he would not disturb the public mind by agitating a question no longer open for discussion. Mr. B's own opinion would remain the same, however, whatever might be the views of the President, or other gentlemen.

As to the gentleman's second inquiry, Mr. B. said, when the subject was first brought to the notice of the Mississippi Legislature by a Whig Executive, he had yielded to it a reluctant support, believing that the system would end in disaster. It was strongly urged, however, by those who pretended to more financial skill than himself, and was finally adopted, and proved, as he had supposed it would, a most signal failure; and for the last several years, Mr. B. had been among those who took the lead in opposition to the whole post note system; and it was due to himself to say, that had the system been abandoned when it was proved to have failed, and when he and his friends gave it up, none of the disasters would have befallen the State to which the gentleman has alluded, and which he is right in supposing had their origin in the system as practised in Mississippi.

Mr. JENIFER asked if Mr. BROWN had not, as late as April, 1839, given a vote in favor of post notes.

Mr. BROWN positively denied having given any such vote.

SPEECH OF MR. BENTON, OF MISSOURI.

In Senate, Wednesday, April 22, 1840.

Mr. BENTON offered the following as an amendment to the bill for the reduction of the rum and sugar drawbacks, and the fishing bounties and allowances:

"That from and after the 31st day of December next, so much of any act as lays a duty on imported salt be, and the same hereby is, repealed; and from and after the day last mentioned, salt shall be imported into the United States free of duty. Provided, That for the recovery and receipt of such duties as shall have accrued, and on the days, respectively, remain outstanding, and for the recovery and distribution of fines, penalties, and forfeitures, and the remission thereof, which shall have been incurred before, and on the said days, respectively, the provisions of the aforesaid acts shall remain in full force and virtue.

"That from and after the first day of January next, so much of any act as allows a bounty on exported salt provisions and pickled fish, in lieu of drawback of the duties on the salt employed in curing the same, and so much of any act as makes allowance to the owners and crews of fishing vessels, in lieu of drawback of the duties paid on the salt used by the same, shall be, and the same hereby is, repealed: Provided, That the provisions of the aforesaid acts shall remain in full force and virtue for the payment of the bounties or allowances incurred or payable on the 1st day of January next."

The question having been stated on the adoption of this amendment, Mr. B. said it was a transcript of the act for the repeal of the salt tax and the abolition of the fishing bounties and allowances, which passed in the last year of Mr. Jefferson's administration, and passed upon his recommendation; not that he recommended the abolition of the fishing bounties and allowances. His recommendation applied to salt only; and the bounties and allowances being in lieu of drawback of the salt duties, they fell of course when the duty ceased on the article on which they were founded. No argument was then needed to prove this. No motion was made to separate two things so indissolubly connected; and both the tax and its appurtenance fell together, and fell by the general vote of Congress, and without distinction of political parties, of geographical sections, or of interested classes. The vote in Congress might be called unanimous, there being in the House of Representatives but five voices against the repeal, and one hundred and twenty-two for it. The vote of New England was unanimous, with the exception of two votes. The representatives from the fishing districts then appeared in their natural character of enemies to a tax on an article of which they were great consumers: they saw no advantage in a salt tax, and had no idea of asking for the bounties and allowances without the tax.* The laws had not then committed the egregious blunder of reducing duties without reducing the drawbacks and bounties founded upon them. That blunder has been reserved for this enlightened age; and one of the fruits of it is, to see the greatest consumers of salt, and formerly the greatest enemies to the salt tax, converted into the friends of the tax!

Mr. B. then proceeded to speak in favor of his proposed amendment, and against a salt tax, under any circumstances, and at any time; declaring it to be a tax fundamentally wrong in itself, at war with the first principles of political economy, and peculiarly obnoxious in the United States, and especially in all the States in the valley of the Mississippi, where it had become the parent of an odious monopoly. In this great valley the tax on foreign salt, by tending to diminish its importation, and by throwing what was imported at its only seaport, New Orleans, into the hands of regraters, this tax was the parent and hand maid of a monopoly of salt, which, for the extent of territory over which it operated, the number of people whom it oppressed, and the variety and enormity of its oppressions, had no parallel on earth, except among the Hindoos, in Eastern Asia, under the iron despotism of the British East India Company. He (Mr. B.) had taken care, during the last recess of Congress, to obtain authentic evidence of the existence of this monopoly in the West, and of the abuses which it inflicted upon that section of the Union. The mass of evidence which he had collected had been communicated to the Senate, printed by its order, and laid upon the tables of members; and constituted a document replete with facts which would be incredible, except for the number and respectability of the witnesses who testify to them. The number who have given information, and sealed it with their names, amount to three hundred, but they might amount to three hundred thousand—in fact to the whole population—the whole five or six millions of the Western people; for there was scarcely one soul, man, woman, or child, in the West, who did not know of this monopoly, and who was not in some degree its victim. There was not a Senator on this floor who had not heard of it a thousand times, and who will not recognise, in the document which has been printed, details of impositions of which he has too often heard the recital at home. Happy that he had, at last, an opportunity of raising his voice in this chamber, backed by a mass of unimpeachable testimony, against a tax which he abhorred, Mr. B. would claim the indulgence of the Senate, while he presented to it part of this testimony; establishing, first, the fact of the monopoly; and then the abuses, impositions, and enormities resulting from it. For this purpose he would read, at present, but three pieces of testimony, holding in reserve as much more to the same effect as any Senator would wish to hear. The first was a statement by the honorable Mr. Miller of the House of Representatives, a member from the State of Missouri. Under date of the 20th of December, 1839, he says:

"When in Western Virginia last summer and fall, I was informed by gentlemen of the highest standing, some of whom were engaged in the making of salt at the Kanawha works, that the company paid annually to the owners of works at that place (some thirty or more in number) from seventy-five to eighty thousand dollars, to let their works lie idle; that the amount paid to each individual owning these suspended or dead works, as they are called, was about $2,500 per annum; and that an average sum of about $800 was paid to certain persons annually, who owned lands in the vicinity of the Kanawha works, (that is, to each person owning such grounds, on which it was believed salt water could be had, and owned a body of stone coal adjacent,) not to dig or bore for it. I also understood that the salt-works then in operation yielded about two millions of bushels of salt per annum; and, on making inquiry what it was thought the whole of the works on the Kanawha would most probably produce, were they all put into operation, I was informed they would yield about four millions of bushels annually."

The second piece of testimony to which I refer, is the statement of a citizen of Missouri, formerly connected with the Kenhawa salt works; the statement made and delivered to one of the judges of the State. It is this:

"About the year 1816 a company was formed at the Kanawha salt works, the object of which was to monopolize the salt trade in the Western country. They had the aid of a bank in Cincinnati, upon which they drew at 60, 120, and 180 days; the bank, by the arrangement, was bound to accept all their drafts, which was done.

"The company having the aid of the bank and the command of the salt-works, they districted the whole Western country. Then there was a company formed for each district, to whom salt was furnished, which company, by agreement, was bound to sell their salt in the bounds of their own district, and not to interfere with other districts; by this, it was intended so to distribute the salt that the supply should barely meet the demand. This arrangement so ran up the price of salt at this time, that the holders of the works believed that they could so arrange it as to find a ready sale for all the salt that could be made, and increased their furnaces to 160 or 170. The company soon found that the supply so greatly overreached the demand, that the salt could not be sold immediately; the consequence of which was, that the company and the bank both broke at the end of about three years. On the wreck of this company another one was formed, (Armstrong, Grant, and Co.) This company, in order to reduce the supply, paid what was called a dead rent; that is, paid a rent to the owners of the furnaces, and had them bound that no salt should be made at them. In this way the number of operating furnaces was reduced from 160 or 170 to 40; and the 40 furnaces were limited to make only so much per annum, which was about equal to eight months' work for each furnace. This company again districted the country, sold out to companies for each district, and, in this way, they raised the price of salt 133⅓ per cent.; that is, from 75 cents to $1 75 per bushel in their different districts where it was to be sold, the company fixing the price in each district. This company was aided by several banks in all their operations."

The third piece of testimony which I produce was furnished anonymously in 1830, by a citizen of Kanawha, the names being omitted, as it was not the object to attack individuals, but to expose a system. It is in these words:

"Dead wells are now common at the Kanawha salines, and are giving to the place a dilapidated and melancholy appearance, and doing a real injury to the country. There are many of these dead wells, and monopolizers pay the owner for letting them remain idle. * * * and * * * receive about $1,500 per annum for two dead wells. * * * receives about $3,000 per annum for one. * * * about $1,500 per annum for another. Many others receive less or greater sums upon the same terms. Besides dead wells, there are also unopened wells, whose owners are paid for not letting them be dug. I know several of this kind. * * * receives $1,250 per annum not to dig a well on his land; * * * receives $1,500 annually on the same terms. * * * receives $2,500 per annum in the same way; and I have no doubt many others, and it is all a thing of notoriety in the neighborhood. Before the monopoly, the price of salt was about a shilling a bushel, as it is called, and as often under as above that price, and it could be got for any kind of trade; since the monopoly, it is fifty cents cash, and none will be sold for retail to the people of the States, except to those who will bind themselves to avoid competition with the monopolizers at their depots. The company that monopolize the works are the chief shippers, and through their agents retail to the people in most of the Western States, fixing their own price, their own weight, and the quantity which each State is to have, except so far as they are interfered with by alum salt from New Orleans."

They also pay the professional borers, who bore for salt water, as high as $600 a year, not to bore for any body.

Mr. B. said that these three pieces of testimony established the existence of this monopoly as far back as the year 1816; and it was notorious in the West that it had existed for a still longer time, and, like all other abuses, became more heartless, more cruel, and more oppressive, with age and time. He believed that in the thirty years of its existence, it had never been more oppressive than at present. He would remark that he read only the testimony which applied to the Kanawha works. There was other testimony, which applied to the Holston works in Virginia, and to the monopoly of imported salt at New Orleans. A view of the salt facilities of the Western country, would show how easy it was for companies of speculators, combined with banks, to monopolize the supply of this article in the whole Valley of the Mississippi. Three points secured, would accomplish their purpose—Kanawha, Holston, and New Orleans. The aid of banks was necessary, to enable them to secure the two first; the aid of the Government of the United States was necessary, to enable them to secure the third. By the aid of banks, the monopolizers either rent all the wells, and let half of them lie idle, or purchase all the salt from the manufacturers, binding them to make no more than a given quantity. In either event, they become the sole possessors of the domestic article, and then regulate its sale as they please. The possession of the Kenawha and Holston works, being the great fountains of the domestic supply, enables these monopolizers to domineer over all the smaller establishments, and to force or seduce them—no difficult task—into their cruel system. This makes them masters of the domestic supply. But there is another point to be secured—a point of danger to be guarded against; and here they must have the aid of the Government of the United States, as well as of the banks: this point is New Orleans—sole seaport of the West—sole point of entrance of foreign salt into the vast Valley of the Mississippi. Here the Government comes to their aid with its revenue regulations, and its duty upon foreign salt, and gives them double and effectual aid. First, the duty impedes the importation of foreign salt. In the second place, by requiring the duty to be paid, or bond with American security given to pay it in nine months, all the imported salt is thrown into the hands of regraters, or monopolizers, who watch the arrival of the vessels, and relieve the importer from all trouble about the duty and his securities by giving him his price for the salt, and assuming, advancing, or going his security for the duty. This duty, though now reduced to about six cents on two-thirds of a bushel, is still upwards of one hundred per centum on the cost of the article; and is high enough both to stint the importation, and to embarrass the importer. If salt was free of duty it would be imported in immense quantity as ballast; but ballast cannot be imported at one hundred per cent. and subject to custom-house regulations besides: if free, it would enter the river without obstruction, pass up it without halt at the custom-house, be sold to any boat in the river, or to any person on the levee; would escape not only the burthen of the tax, but all the delays, the detentions, the expenses, and the restrictions incident to an imported article subject to the custom-house regulations. In this respect the amount of duty makes but little difference. While one cent of duty remains, it will answer the purpose of the monopolizers perfectly well; and, therefore, they are just as anxious to keep up a duty of six cents now as they were to keep up one of twenty cents ten years ago. Any thing, no matter how small, a cent, or half a cent, will answer their purpose; for a small duty is just as effective in stopping the salt at the custom-house, and throwing it into the hands of regraters, as a large one could be.

From this view of the salt facilities of the West, it would be seen, Mr. B. said, how easy it was for monopolizers to command the supply of the whole country as long as the Government, by keeping a duty on foreign salt, first stinted its importation, and then threw what was imported into the hands of regraters. This was the case at present. All the great points of supply were secured. Banks which could not loan a few hundred dollars to a farmer or mechanic for a few months, and which could not pay specie in redemption of its notes; these banks could advance hundreds of thousands of dollars to enable speculators to monopolize domestic salt at the great works of the interior, and to intercept foreign salt at New Orleans; and thus get the whole into their own hands, and to oppress the people of ten States and Territories at their merciless and heartless pleasure.

Having established the fact of the salt monopoly in the West, and shown it to be coeval with the revival of the salt tax during the late war, Mr. B. proceeded to show the evils of that monopoly, and to establish the existence of the numerous abuses, impositions, and enormities which resulted from it. At the head of these evils, he placed the abuse, or, as he should rather call it, the crime, of adulterating this article, which enters into the composition of every thing we consume, which is mixed with almost every thing eaten by man or beast, from the bread of the one to the hay of the other. The adulteration of such an article is a crime against man and beast—a crime against the wisdom and goodness of God, which have dispensed pure salt over the earth, as the preservative principle of life and health. And now let us see how the evidence stands on this head, in relation to Western salt. Let us appeal to the evidence: and this we find in the document No. 196, printed at this session, by the order of the Senate. The first piece of testimony which I use is taken from the statement, already quoted, of a citizen of Missouri, formerly connected with the Kanawha works, of which he speaks. His statement applies to the year 1816.

"While the monopolizers were speculating in the sale of salt, in the making of it, also, a great speculation was made by adulteration. It was thought almost, or quite, equal to the rents to be paid for the furnaces.* The manner of adulteration was about like this: After the process of boiling is over, the brine is put into grainers. In graining off, the bittern, or bitter water, would separate from the salt; to prevent this, a lump of tallow (which is best, though tar is sometimes used) is thrown into each grainer: by this, the salt forms a kind of cup, or hollow substance, which retains the bitter water. This, however, is not sufficient to retain it all; a portion of it escapes, or runs off, and is caught and put into the grainers again, and boiled until it is burnt and adheres to the kettle, and becomes as white as chalk. This is allowed to remain on the grainers until, by the application of cold brine, after being cooled from the boilers, being thrown into the grainers, it makes this adhesion to them all melt, or dissolve into fine particles, mixing up with the salt. This substance is remarkably heavy, and is what tends, more than any thing else, to give to salt its fine glossy white appearance. To a man who is not a judge of the manner of adulteration, the greater the adulteration the better the salt seems, from its frosty white fine appearance. Doubtless the community have often seen in the Kanawha salt white lumps, apparently as hard as a rock; the reason of which is this: where too much tallow and bitter water are combined, or have been added, and the consequent great heat which is necessary to be applied to make the salt retain this heavy substance, the salt and the bittern become melted together, and form those lumps; these the makers call "tallow balls," and are never made except by an over anxiety to adulterate."

*MEMORANDUM, BY MR. BENTON.—The author of the foregoing statement told me, at his own house, in July last, that the rents of the furnaces were about five thousand bushels of salt each, per annum, at the time he knew them, and that this rent could be paid with one hundred weight of tallow; that is to say, the hundred weight of tallow used for the purposes of adulteration would make a gain in the weight of the whole

Mr. B said that such a statement as this required no commentary; it, in fact, admitted of none. The statement was explicit and pointed; it was that of an eye witness; and it displayed a horrible abuse which had no parallel except in a place which he would presently name. The point at present was to corroborate this statement; and for that purpose he would have recourse to several pieces of testimony contained in the document which he had mentioned. Prefixed to that document, were "thirty queries," addressed by himself to his constituents last summer on the subject of the salt trade of the West: one of which queries related to the adulterations of salt, and was in these words:

"QUERY 20. Do you know, or have you heard from credible sources, of any practices among the salt makers to adulterate their salt by using tallow, or other substances to cause lime, or bitter water, or other impurities to be retained in it to increase its weight? Do you perceive inmpurities in the salt you use? and if so, how do you detect them? by chemical analysis, or common observation?"

To this query, many affirmative answers were given, of which I will read a few to the Senate:

1. The answer from Howard county, signed by a committee of fifteen citizens of both political parties, says:

"We have been told that some of the salt makers of this country are in the habit of putting tallow and such like substances in their salt to make it retain all the bitter water and other impurities, in order to make it weigh as heavy as possible."

2. The answer from the collector of the port of St Louis, Mr. Rannev, says:

"By common observation, we can easily detect impurities in the Kanawha salt, and we can always do so to a great extent by chemical analysis."

3. The answer from New Hope, Lincoln county, drawn up by a committee of six citizens, chosen in a public meeting, says:

"We have two practical salt boilers present, who state, when salt was sold by measure, the measured bushel would frequently weigh not over forty pounds. When the law authorized the sale of salt to be fifty pounds to the bushel at those licks, the boilers were then directed to put in alum and other ingredients, and to retain in the salt the lime and bitter water, to increase the weight of the salt."

4. The answer from a public meeting of the people in Madison county, signed by their chairman and secretary, says:

"That tallow is used by salt makers to adulterate their salt, there is not a doubt. We have it from good authority, that tallow is sometimes used to retain the bitter water, so as to increase the weight of the salt; and we know that, in salting pork, ashes are frequently mixed with the salt, to make it dissolve."

5. The answer from a public meeting in Jefferson county, signed by their chairman and secretary says:

"Being remote from the place of manufacturing, we are unable to speak from knowledge, but from very credible sources, that tallow is generally used for the purpose of retaining the bitter water, with the view of increasing the weight of the salt."

6. The answer from Taney county, signed by the committee of a public meeting, says:

"We have known, and heard from credible sources, that salt makers use tallow to retain bitter water in their salt, to increase its weight."

7. The answer from Platte county says:

"What may be the practices resorted to, to make salt weigh heavy, I do not know; but this I do know, that it frequently appears in the most villanous shapes. I have seen it perfectly calcined by the fire, and as hard as brick; I have seen it poured so hot into the barrels as to burn the inside of the barrel to a coal; and I have seen it again in such questionable shapes, stripes, and shades, that the maker himself would not know what to call it, and most certainly would not call it by its proper name, were he to call it salt."

8. From Pike county, signed by a committee of fifty, says:

"Situated as we are, at a long distance from the Kanawha salt works, it is impossible for us to furnish you with an accurate account of the 'practices among salt makers to adulterate their salt.' Judging from the quality and the appearance of much of the domestic salt brought here, we are satisfied that many gross impositions are practised in its manufacture."

9. From Pike county, (Ashley:)

"We have no doubt but that tallow is used by salt makers, to adulterate their salt. We have it from good authority, that tallow is sometimes used to retain the bitter water, and so as to increase the weight of the salt, which often renders it necessary to put ashes with the salt, to dissolve it, in salting meats, &c."

Mr. B. said that these answers were sufficient to show the fact of the adulteration of salt at the great source of supply for the West. That it is adulterated, and wilfully, and that for the purpose of making it weigh heavy, is universally known in the West, and is now proved in this chamber. The principal ingredient in the adulteration is bittern, commonly called bitter water, a poisonous fluid, of great weight, and by the retention of which the weight of salt may be increased almost two to one. The degree to which the adulteration actually extends, will be seen under another head of abuse, which I propose to examine; for the present, I limit myself to saying that the proof will establish an average of more than fifty per cent. The effect of this adulteration is injurious in many ways. In the first place, it defrauds the purchaser in the measure, or quantity, of salt which he receives. In the next place, it injures the salt itself, mingles an an ingredient with it which promotes putrescence, and often occasions the loss of provisions, and endangers health in many instances. In the third place, it injures the character of Western bacon, beef, and pork, in foreign markets, and does essential injury to that branch of Western trade.

Mr B. could not quit this part of his subject without remarking that the salt water of all springs and wells, held many foreign substances in solution; the separation of which was carefully enforced by the laws of most countries where salt was artificially made. In our own country, in the State of New York, an inspector and supervisor of salt works are appointed by law, to guard both the measure and the purity of the article, and who had officially reported to the Legislature of the State, twelve months ago, the difficulty and almost entire impossibility, with all their care, of totally preventing adulteration. An extract from their report may be seen in the salt document, No. 196, of the present session. The English have severe statutory regulations on the subject, and officers always present to enforce them; who, besides all possible care to prevent adulteration, often had recourse to chemical analysis, the only infallible test, to ascertain the purity of the article after it was made; and condemned it if any foreign ingredient should be detected. The document, No. 196, contains a notice of all these regulations in England, to guard the purity of their salt, and to save the community from the mischiefs of adulteration. This being the case—the salt water itself containing impurities difficult to be separated from the salt—it being the interest of the manufacturer to retain these impurities—and the presence of laws and officers being hardly sufficient to protect the purity of the manufacture; this being the case with boiled salt, where there is law to regulate it, how must it be where there is no law, and where the owner of the wells, disregarding his true interest, surrenders his property to monopolizers to treat it as they please, and to practise every species of abuse to swell the profits of a brief lease? That an adulteration of fifty per cent. is to take place under such circumstances, is just as naturally to be expected, as it is here fully proved.

The next abuse resulting from this monopoly, which Mr. B. would bring to the notice of the Senate, was in the measure, or, as it was practised in the West, in the weight of this article. Universally over the West salt was sold by weight, instead of measure; and fifty pounds were allowed to the bushel, not by any law in Missouri, but the law of the company itself. This arbitrary measure was copied from the custom-house, where it was insidiously introduced, as explained in the report on the fishing bounties, by General Hamilton, in the year 1792, in order to increase the product of the salt revenue, by diminishing the size of the bushel. Thus introduced through the custom-house, where fifty-six pounds was the standard of the bushel, the monopolizers had reduced it to fifty, and applied it to every kind of salt, notwithstanding the difference of its specific gravity. Thus, the sun-made salt, which weighs eighty-four pounds to the measured bushel, was sold fifty pounds for the bushel; thus defrauding the purchaser of thirty-four pounds in every bushel; and thus the Kanawha salt, which, dry and pure, would weigh about fifty pounds to the measured bushel, was so increased in weight by adulteration, that a half bushel measure would hold the fifty pounds. In the measure, four different species of imposition occurred, the joint effect of which were to reduce the nominal bushel to about one peck. The first was in the bitter water, which was equal to fifty per cent. upon an average, of additional weight. The second was in the difference between "lick weight" and true weight, the difference being from ten to twenty per cent and the purchaser bound to purchase at "lick weight," or pay the difference, if re-weighed. The third was in the tare allowed for the weight of the barrel; twenty-five pounds being the allowance, while from thirty-five to fifty pounds was the real weight. The fourth was in the wastage and leakage from exposure, the barrels being brought down the Ohio river in open boats, exposed to every weather, and after arriving at the place of sale, still lying out in the open air, on the ground, exposed to sun and rain in summer, and to rain, hail, sleet, snow, and mud in the winter. From all these causes, the quantity of salt was so reduced in the nominal bushel, that when the purchaser had paid for a bushel, he had received but a peck!

Mr. B. then read numerous quotations from the salt document, No. 196 consisting of answers to his queries from the 7th to the 14th inclusive, which fully established all that he had said in relation to the false measure by which salt was sold in the West. To enable the Senate to better comprehend the answers, he read the queries first to which they applied. The queries were:

"7. When sold by the barrel, is salt sold according to the real weight at the time of sale, or according to the weight marked upon the barrel when first filled, commonly called lick weight?

8. Is the real weight generally, or always below the marked weight? And if so, what is the usual difference, and what the greatest difference that you have heard or know of? What is the tare allowed for the barrel, and what its real weight?

9 Are the barrels sometimes exposed in the open air to the sun and rain, either while coming to market, or waiting sale, so as to add wastage from such exposure to defective weight from drying and leaking?

10. Is an increased price demanded for the salt if re-weighed? And, if so, what is the usual amount of the increase?

11. How many bushels by weight are usually marked on a barrel?

12. How many measured bushels would the same barrel contain?

13. After deducting for wastage, leakage, and drying, how many measured bushels does a barrel usually contain? And what is the lowest quantity it has been known to contain?

14. What would be the weight of a measured bushel of each variety of salt in your neighborhood?"

The answers to these queries were:

1. From the Surveyor of the port at St. Louis:

"7. It is generally sold by the weight barked on the barrel, but sometimes by re weight.

8. The actual weight is almost always less than the marked weight. I have known it to lose in weight from 20 to 90 pounds on the single barrel.

9. It is generally exposed to the weather, without wareheusing until the article is disposed of by the agent.

10. When salt is re weighed, it is sold from 10 to 15 per cent. above the price when taken at the lick weight.

11. The barrels at the lick weigh from 275 to 400 pounds, and average from 5 to 7½ bushels.

12 The same barrels would contain, in measure, from 3 to 4½ bushels.

13. I have not known a barrel of Kanawha salt to hold less than 3 measured bushels, nor more than 4½ measured bushels; 25 pounds only are allowed for the tare or weight of the barrel when empty; but its actual weight is from 35 to 50 pounds.

14 Kanawha salt weighs 75 pounds to the measured bushel, and foreign coarse salt about 67 pounds to the measured bushel."

2 From Pike county:

"8. Between the real weight and the marked weight, there is, we believe, invariably a difference; sometimes the difference is not more than 15 to 25 pounds in the barrel; but when the salt has been kept on hand for some time, we have known barrels to fall short from 50 to 60 pounds.

quantity of salt made, equal to five thousand bushels of salt and that this was actually done. Others have told me that tallow was also used to prevent the concretion, and adhesion to the sides of the kettles, of the lime which is held in solution in some wells and springs of salt water, and so retain it in the salt.

9. In relation to the manner in which the salt is treated when coming to market, we cannot answer, only from report; we, however, believe that we hazard nothing when saying that it is frequently, if not most usually, exposed not only to the open air, but to the sun and rain; and, when the salt is received, by far the largest proportion of the barrels bear strong evidence of having been roughly handled and much abused."

3. From Howard county:

"8. The real weight is always less than the weight marked upon the barrels. The usual loss is from twenty-five to seventy-five pounds.

9. The salt sold in this country generally lies out exposed to all kinds of weather, from the time it is brought to the country until it is sold to the consumer.

10. An increased price is always demanded when weighed to the purchaser. Twenty-five per cent. is about the usual advance asked between lick weight and the real weight.

11. They are variously marked to contain from five to nine bushels.

12. From two and a half to three and a half.

13. We suppose from two to three. With respect to the smallest quantity a barrel has been known to contain, we have no particular information.

14. A measured bushel of Missouri made or Kanawha salt weighs about fifty pounds, when made dry and pure. As commonly made, it weighs from eighty to one hundred pounds."

4. From Jefferson county:

"7. In selling by the barrel, it is customary to sell by the lick weights; but if reweighed, a higher price is universally demanded.

8 The real weight is always below the weight marked at the lick; generally about 15 per cent.

9. They are frequently exposed on board of boats, and almost always at the landings and place of sale.

10. The increased price when re-weighed is from 12½ to 25 cents per bushel.

11. About six bushels, or 300 lbs. is the usual mark on the barrels.

12. The same barrel would contain about three and a half measured bushels—not exceeding that.

13. It is almost an impossibility to estimate the loss per barrel for Kanawha salt, the wastage, leaking, and drying of different barrels of salt is so different; but we may safely estimate the lowest quantity at about two bushels."

5. From Platte county:

"Answer to questions 7, 8, and 9. When sold by the barrel, it is sold by the St. Louis weigh, and generally falls short of the real weight about 10 per cent. I have known barrels marked 400 pounds to weigh but 300; and have known barrels not more than two-thirds full to be imposed on the consumer (he knowing the fact) as full barrels, and the consumer was compelled to take it or do without; they are frequently exposed to all the inclemency of the weather at all seasons of the year, and lose according to the original dryness or wetness of the salt when made.

Answer to question 10. An increased price is always demanded if the salt is re-weighed, depending entirely on the caprice of the seller.

Answer to questions 11, 12, and 13. The barrels are of different sizes and hold from 500 to 800 pounds, and measure from two and a half to four bushels, making the necessary allowance between very dry and very wet salt."

6 From Pike county:

"7. In selling by the barrel, the lick weight is the weight sold by.

8. We believe the real weight is always below the lick weight; generally it is from 10 to 20 per cent. below.

9. They are in most places; and such exposure, no doubt, contributes to the defective weight.

10. Salt is offered for sale, according to the lick weight, by the barrel. If re-weighed, an increased price is demanded, of from 12½ to 37½ cents per bushel.

11. From 5½ to 6 bushels, by weight, is usually marked on each barrel.

12. The same barrel would contain from 3 to 3½ measured bushels.

13. From 2½ to 3 measured bushels; and sometimes as low as 2 bushels.

14. Kanawha salt usually weighs from 80 to 90 pounds the measured bushel."

7. From Jackson county:

"6. Salt is sold here by weight, fifty lbs. to the bushel; and 50 lbs. (the bushel) of the salt, which I tried, (without pressing) measured 1 89 5952 5 1000000 ths solid inches, making 4 gallons 1.4632 10000 ths quart, dry measure, which is but very little over half a measured bushel. Therefore, when salt is two dollars the 50 lbs we have to pay at the rate of $3 62½ the measured bushel. This is oppression in a free country; this is the fruit of the tariff.

7. In selling by the barrel, the weight of the barrel and the nett weight of salt is sometimes, and most commonly, placed on the barrel; but the weight of the barrel is marked much less than its real weight.

They make no deduction for the drying of the salt. One barrel I particularly weighed out, and it lost twenty pounds; and I am credibly informed that some have lost as much as fifty."

8 From Platte county.

"7. Generally sold at lick weight, allowing 25 pounds tare for the barrel, whereas the barrel frequently weighs considerably more.

8. The real weight is nearly always below the marked weight from the smallest difference up to 75 prounds; more generally, from 30 to 50 pounds

27. We have known of a barrel being sold at lick weight, where the head had been burst and about one-third of the salt had been spilled and destroyed; the supply being insufficient, the purchaser was compelled to take at the lick weight, or none."

9 "Statement of the honorable Mr Lyon, of Kentucky.

That, being a member of a mercantile house, which received a quantity of salt from the Kanhwha Salt Company, to sell on commission, in the years 1826 and 1827, with instructions to sell at the original mark, or lick weight, finding many of the barrels greatly deficient in weight, varying from 10 to 20 per cent. they re-weighed and sold a quantity at the real weight; that, when the agent of the company came on, he was dissatisfied, and said it was their custom to sell elsewhere at the original mark, and that it must be so sold there; which they refused to do. The agency and the salt on hand, were transferred to other hands; and that he has great reason to believe, the necessities of the people, in many instances, compelled them to purchase the deficient barrels at their marked weight."

10. From Buchanan county:

"7. When sold by the barrel, it is sold by the weight marked upon the barrel, commonly called lick weight.

8. The real weight is always below the marked weight, and the usual difference is about 40 pounds on the barrel. The greatest difference we have heard of is 70 pounds on the barrel.

9. The barrels are always exposed to the sun, rain, and atmosphere, either while coming to market or waiting sale.

10. An increased price is always demanded, if reweighed, which increase is 25 cents on the bushel.

11. The number of bushels marked on a barrel is generally seven.

12. The same barrel would contain four measured bushels.

13. A barrel usually contains three and a half measured bushels, after deducting for wastage, leakage, and drying. The lowest quantity such barrel has been known to contain is three bushels.

14. The weight of a measured bushel of the Kanawha or domastic salt could not be less than 94 pounds, supposing 84 pounds to be the weight of a measured bushel of pure alum sun made salt."

Mr. B. here ceased his quotations, not because he had read all, but because he had read enough to show by what measure the monopolizers were now selling salt to the people of the West. He begged the Senate to observe, and to mark well, the complication of the cheat in the measure. It was so complicated that it required a careful consideration to detect the whole of it. First, 50 pounds, at the lick, was counted for a bushel. Secondly, five of these bushels were put into a two and a half bushel barrel, six of them were put into a three bushel barrel, and nine of them into a four and a half bushel barrel. Thirdly, 50 per cent. on an average of these 50 pound bushels, were bitter water and lime. Fourthly, an average of 20 per cent. was wasted out of the barrel before it was sold. Fifthly, from 15 to 25 pounds of every barrel was in wood, being the usual actual weight of the barrel above the tare allowed for it. The result of such measurement was to give about one peck of pure salt for the nominal and pretended bushel.

Having thus shown the quality of the salt sold in the West, and the quantity allowed for a bushel, Mr. B next proceeded to the natural inquiry of the price; and went on to show what was the price paid for such bushels of such salt. For this purpose he again had recourse to the testimony contained in document No. 196 authenticated, he repeated, by the signatures of more than 300 respectable names, which might be increased to more than 300,000—to as many, in fact, as there were purchasers of salt in the ten States and Territories of the West. He then quoted from the document in answer to the queries 5 and 6:

These are the queries:

"5 What is the present selling price of different kinds of salt in your neighborhood by the single bushel? and what has been its highest and also its lowest price by the single bushel at any time within the last five or ten years?

6 What is the price by the barrel? and also what is the highest and what the lowest price by the barrel at any time within several years past?"

And these the answers:

1 From Howard county:

"5. Kanawha and Missouri made salt is now selling in this county by the bushel at one dollar and fifty cents. No other kind, of consequence, in the county. We have known it to vary in price, within the last ten years, from seventy-five cents to three dollars per bushel.

6 It is now selling in Fayette, by the barrel, at ninety-six cents per bushel. The variation in price by the barrel has been about the same as stated in the preceding answer by the bushel."

2. From New Hope, Lincoln county:

"4. In our section of the country we have but one salt merchant, who is an agent employed by the Kanawha Salt Company.

5. The present price per single bushel of fifty pounds is $1 25; the highest price $2 50; the lowest 62½ cents."

3. From Callaway county:

"Answer. The present price of salt by the single bushel is $1 75; the highest price $2 75; the lowest $1.

Answer. The present price by the barrel, at lick weight, is $1 25; highest price was $2, and the lowest 87½ cents."

4. From Cl ay county:

"5. Kanawha, $1 50; ground alum, $1 75; Turk's Island, $—. Highest price, within the last five years, $2; lowest, $1, for Kanawha, in the year 1836.

6. By the barrel, re-weighed, $1 25; lick weight, $1 12½. Lowest price by the barrel, 93¾ cents; most generally, $1. When sold for cash, $1 12½."

5. From Jackson county:

"5 Kanawha salt is selling at $1 50 per bushel at the present time. Ground alum salt is selling at present at $2 50. Kanawha, within the last five years, has been as high as $2 50 per bushel, and as low as $1 per bushel. Ground alum has been sold generally at about $2 per bushel, within the abovenamed time.

6. The price by the barrel at present is $1 25 for Kanawha, which is the only kind sold by the barrel. The lowest price within the last five years has been about $1 per bushel by the barrel."

6 From Madison county:

"5. By the single bushel it is selling at present $1 50. Last winter it was $2, and for several years past has not been lower than $1 per bushel.

6. By the barrel at $1 12½; the highest priee $1 75, the lowest 87½ cents."

7. From Cape Girradeau county:

"5th. The price of salt at present for Kanawha is $1 25; (in second hands, the agents selling only by the barrel.) The price, however, varies much from circumstances, it being the object of the company to prevent the importation of foreign salt; they, therefore, regulate their prices in reference to that object. For instance: when freights are low, they put down the price of their salt to 50 or 6 ¼ cents per bushel; and when freights are high, or the navigation obstructed, the price is raised to $1 or $1 25 per bushel. Thus, too, it has happened that, at New Madrid for instance, where the navigation is almost always open, the company's salt has been sold at 50 cents; when, at the same time, at places within one hundred miles on the river, where the navigation was obstructed, the price has been put up to $1 or $1 25.

6th. 75 cents. The highest $1; the lowest 62½ cents."

8. From Greene county:

"4. There is but one salt merchant in our section of the State, except when sold by him to our immediate traders.

5. The highest price generally paid here for a single bushel (50 pounds) is $3, and the lowest $1 75."

9. From Miller county:

"5. Present price is $1 37½ per bushel for Kanawha and saline; for alum, $1 50 per bushel; lowest, September 1st, 1838, $1; highest, 1st of February, 1839, $2 50 per bushel of 50 pounds, lick weight.

6. $1 25 per bushel, by the barrel, lick weight; difference for several years from 75 cents to $2 50 per bushel, by the barrel, lick weight."

10. From Taney county:

"5th. From $3, to $3 50 is the present selling price by the single bushel, and $3 by the barrel. Within the last five years it has been as high as $5, and as low as $2.

6th. $3 by the barrel, and has been as high as $5; the lowest $2 50."

11. From Benton county:

"5th. From $1 12½ to $1 50, with an addition of 12½ cents per bushel for reweighing."

12. From Buchanan county:

"5. The present selling price, by the bushel, is $2 25; and the highest price in this part of the country, has been $3 per bushel, and the lowest has been 75 cents per bushel.

"6. The present selling price, when sold by the barrel, is $2 per bushel; the highest price, during the last ten years, has been $2 50 per bushel, and the lowest 75 cents per bushel."

13. From the Hon. Mr. Miller of Missouri, of the House of Representatives:

"As it regards the price of salt in Missouri, I can only say I was informed by gentlemen of high respectability, that, from early in the month of November, 1838, and during the ensuing winter, salt sold in Boon, Howard, and other central and western counties of Missouri, at the onerous rates of from $2 50 to $3 per bushel, or 50 pounds; and I have further understood, that the article of salt sold, during the same periods, in Wiskonsin and Iowa Territories, at from $5 to $6 per bushel. This oppressive state of things was produced, as I have the best reason to believe, from the fact, that the article of salt, at the time here spoken of, was mainly held and monopolized in Missouri, and some of the other Western States and Territories, by the Kanawha Salt Company."

14. From the Hon. Mr. Chapman, delegate in Congress from Iowa; being answers to questions put by him to merchants in that Territory:

"BURLINGTON, I. T. November 3, 1839.

"GENTLEMEN: By answering the following questions, you may perhaps lend some aid towards remedying the evils of the salt monopoly, and its consequence, the very high price of salt in this country.

Question 1. What was the highest price of salt in Burlington during the last winter?

Answer. $6 per bushel.

Question 4. Are you not the agents of the salt company, and bound by their directions in fixing the price?

Answer. We are.

Question 5. Have you not been recently directed by the general agent of the company to raise the price of salt? If so, to what extent, and on what account?

Answer. We were directed as above to raise, and have done so. The rise was 25 cents on the bushel; as the agent said, on account of high freights.

Question 6. Is freight higher now than for two or three months past?

Answer. It is not.

Question 7. Was the salt upon which you have raised the price freighted recently?

Answer. Freighted in June, when the water was high, and freight low; down to 7 cents per barrel.

Question 8. What quantity have you on hand upon which you have raised the price and when freighted?

Answer. 200 barrels on hand, freighted in June, when freight was low.

Question 9. Have you not sold at a lower price than your present, a considerable quantity of salt freighted at the same price as that on hand, upon which you have raised?

Answer. We have.

Messrs. SAMSON, BRIDGEMAN, AND Co."

Having made these quotations of prices of salt in different parts of the West, Mr. B. went on to compare the price of the article with its measure and its quality; and, taking the whole together, to ascertain what was the real price paid for as much pure salt as would make a measured bushel. He affirmed that it was as clear, from the evidence he had read, as any proposition in Euclid, that what was sold for a bushel of salt was not more than a peck; and this he demonstrated in several different ways. First, he said, the nominal bushel of 50 pounds was but half a measured bushel; and this was proved by all the testimony in relation to the capacity of the barrels; for all this testimony proved that the barrels which were marked five bushels, or six bushels, or nine bushels, could in reality, hold no more than two and a half bushels, three bushels, or four and a half. This at once reduced the nominal bushel to half a bushel, or two pecks. Then came the adulteration, which was proved to add from 25 to 30 pounds to every 50: this would have to be deducted from the two pecks, and would reduce it 50 per cent. or to one peck and a half. Then came the wastage, dryage, leakage, and the weight of the barrel over and above what was allowed for the tare; and all this might be safely rated at half a peck: and thus the evidence was complete, that what was sold for a barrel of six bushels of Kanawha salt was in reality no more than six pecks! what they called a bushel was a peck! and thus, all the prices quoted must be understood as applying to pecks, and not to bushels. This rule would give twenty-four dollars a bushel for salt in Wiskonsin, and as high as twelve, or sixteen dollars a bushel for salt in Missouri. It would make the common rates in Missouri range from four to eight dollars a bushel! Subjected to a chemical analysis, and Mr. B. undertook to say that his conclusions would be verified to the letter. He wished to see it tried; he wished to see the test applied, and the experiment made. Let any one in the West purchase a barrel of this salt at lick weight; let it be analyzed, and the pure salt measured by the bushel measure; and the result would be that six peck measures would hold the contents of a six bushel barrel, lick weight; and so on of all the other barrels from the lowest to the highest. A barrel marked five bushels, would yield five pecks; one marked 450 pounds, or nine bushels, would yield nine pecks! and to this imposition the people of the West are forced to submit; their only relief being in the free importation of foreign salt, which the Federal Government refuses to permit.

The false measure being established, and the deficient quantity proved, Mr. B. said there was another way to test the quality of this salt, and that was from its capacity, or rather incapacity, to preserve beef or pork in the pickled state, or to make bacon, which would bear exportation, or to preserve butter, which is to be long kept. The queries were directed to this point, and the answers were all explicit, and in the negative. Bacon for home use, with the help of drying and smoking, and much care, might be made with it; but no such bacon could go to the South; and as for pickled beef and pork, it would not answer in any climate. All such beef and pork was excluded from the army and navy of the United States by express regulations; and the character of all Western salted provisions was injured in the market by the suspicion of being put up with domestic salt. In proof of this, Mr B. referred to a letter from a merchant in Philadelphia, to be seen at page 50, of the salt document, which, after giving an account of a quantity of Western bacon, which spoiled on the hands of the purchaser, said:

"Dealers and consumers here entertain the opinion that meat put up with domestic salt is dangerous to meddle with. Persons there, who saw the said bacon and hams spoiled in the hogsheads, ascribed it to be the inferior quality of the domestic salt that had been used; instances were stated that lime had been put with such salt by the manufacturers, to improve its color. From these or other causes the packers of the West have experienced ruinous losses enough from spoiled bacon and hams to convince them of the necessity of applying more sea salt, and using more care in curing properly their salted provisions."

The next point in this history of the salt monopoly in the West to which Mr. B. called the attention of the Senate, was the mode of conducting the trade by means of districting and allowancing the country, with general and special agents to superintend the sales, and to see that all the regulations prescribed by the monopolizers should be strictly enforced. This was a curious head of inquiry, and the testimony upon it should be full and explicit. The 23d of the queries applied to this point, and was in these words:

"23. Do you know, or have you heard from credible sources, of any arrangements among salt makers and monopolists to district the country for the sale of their salt, or to have the exclusive supply within certain limits; and, if so, the particulars which have come to your knowledge."

The answers were:

1. From the committee in Howard county:

"23. It has been represented to us, by one of the salt merchants of this county, that the members of the Kenawha salt monopoly each has a certain district of country allotted to him, with a certain allowance of salt, and with a fixed price upon it. For instance: the country lying upon the Missouri river is allotted to one, that upon the Upper Mississippi to another, Cumberland river to a third, Tennessee river to a fourth, and so on."

2. From the Surveyor and Collector of the port of St. Louis:

"23. I do not know of any arrangement entered into by salt companies for the present supply; but I do know that one salt company, for which Mr. Fielder is the agent, furnishes both the States of Missouri and Illinois exclusively."

3. From a committee of fifty members at Louisianaville, Pike county:

"21, 22, 23, 24, and 25. From common report, and from the authority of the agents selected for the sale of Kanawha salt, we are of opinion, nay, bound to believe, that there has been a company formed for the manufacture and sale of salt in the Western and Southwestern States; and that this company, by means of its local and travelling agents, do, to a considerable and injurious extent, monopolize not only the manufacture, but the sale of that description of salt. We also believe that the company restricts the manufacture of salt to such quantities as will be barely sufficient to supply the demand at the various points at which it is deposited with their agents, thereby insuring a ready cash sale for all manufactured within the year, at a very handsome profit; that the various portions of the Western and Southwestern States have been districted by the salt company; and that particular sections or districts have been allotted to particular individuals, whose business it is to inquire into the probable demand for salt, to superintend its delivery and sale, and to report, for the action of the managers, such matter as is calculated to promote concert of action, and more effectually to carry out the views of the monopolists."

4. From a public meeting in Jackson county:

"23. We have understood that it is the practice of the monopolizers to district the country for the sale of their salt, and believe, from the arrangement of their agencies in this part of Missouri, that their object is the exclusive control of the article; thereby regulating the quantity and price, to the prejudice of the community, and to the personal aggrandisement of the company, which has been their practice for the last twenty years, throughout the entire Western country."

5. From a public meeting in Greene county:

"25. We have been credibly informed that the agents of the Kanawha Salt Company are instructed not to sell salt under a certain price; and that these agencies are established in all the commercial towns in this State."

6. From another public meeting in the same county:

"23. Our section of the State is districted out by the salt monopoly, and they have established their agency one mile below Warsaw, in Benton county, Missouri."

7. From Platte county:

"Answer to questions 21, 22, 23, 24, and 25. As a fact it is well known, and is only doubted by those interested in the sale of salt, that there is a perfect understanding with all the great western salt makers as to price and quantity; they have it all their own way; give us what they please, and when they please: the only check we have on them is the foreign salt. If they could only get rid of competition with that article, most deplorable indeed would be the condition of the consumer. Thirty years back, before the invention of steam-navigation, I have known salt of the most base description sold in the West at ten cents per pound; and the same state of case would exist at this moment, but for the competition of foreign salt. We in the far and distant West, on the very verge of civilization, certainly have difficulties and expense sufficient, to contend with the strong and boiling Mississippi and Missouri, without adding to our burdens a duty on salt, benefiting no one but the maker and monopolizer."

8. From a public meeting at Rocheport, in Boone county:

"The Kanawha salt is sent here by the salt company, and deposited with their agents to sell for them, at certain points along the river; never subject to competition; and is, to all intents and purposes, a monopoly."

9. From a committee in Buchanan county:

"The selling of the Kanawha or domestic salt in this country is a monopoly, and is confined to but one company, Curtis and Riley; at Liberty, Clay county, who have the exclusive privilege of selling the article in four large and populous counties, viz: Clay, Clinton, Platte, and Buchanan; which counties contain, altogether, upwards of twenty thousand inhabitants."

"23. We know that a proposition has been made by ths company at Liberty, alluded to in our answer to the fourth question, to an individual in this county, the object of which was to make this county a district in which he was to be allowed the exclusive privilege of selling the domestic salt for and on behalf of that company."

10. From Howard county:

"The business of selling salt in this county is not subject to that general competition which governs and regulates other business of the country, but may justly be considered a monopoly; there being but one salt merchant now in the town of Fayette, where we have some eight or ten mercantile houses."

11. From St. Louis:

"4 and 5. Kanawha salt is furnished by a company residing out of the State, through an agent, (Mr. Fielder, of Louisville,) and does not reach us through the legitimate channel of trade, and is known to be a concerted monopoly. Mr. Fielder has recently removed to, and resides in, St. Louis, and is the sole salt merchant for the sale of country salt in the market."

12. From Pike county:

"14. The article of Kanawha salt, the one of most general use in the country, and in the sale of which the agricultural portion of our community is most deeply interested, is not "subject to general competition," but is to all intents and purposes a monopoly in the hands of a particular house, under the supervision and control of the salt company, either in Louisville, Kentucky, or at the Kanawha works; and so adroitly do this company manage their operations, that in the spring season, when the waters are flush, and the navigation of the rivers easy, they, by means of their own boats, deposite with some one house, at the most prominent points along the river, a quantity of their salt, sufficient to meet the wants of the country; where it most usually remains on deposite until late in the fall, or the closing of the river by ice; then, if the stock of the other varieties of salt happens to be light, this company never fail to turn their forecast to a profitable account, and to avail themselves of the necessities of to obtain an exorbitant price for their salt. In the other varieties of salt there is a general competition; but they are as yet so little used by agriculturists, and the quantity sold is so small that their price is an object of no great importance to the community, nor can it have much influence on the extensive operations of the salt company."

13. From Clay county:

"4. The selling of Kanawha salt is a monopoly, and four-fifths of the salt used in this section of the State is of this kind. There is only one out of sixteen stores in this place that is allowed to sell this salt, and this house has the agency for the whole county. The trade in this description of salt for the entire West, as we understand, is in the hands of Messrs. Fielder and Co. They have purchased, we are informed, the whole quantity made at the Kanawha works, in Virginia. The agency in this place sell as they are directed by the company, and frequently rise in the price of the article. The selling of the other descriptions of salt is free for other merchants; but the price is so high below, that few bring the article on. Previous to some time in the year 1837, the salt trade was open to all the merchants, and most of them kept the article. It was then sold at a small but certain profit, which justified them in keeping a supply. The merchants are now effectively kept out of the trade, and that branch of commerce is to them, in effect, as absolutely interdicted as it could be by the power of any despotic Government. It is true, they could purchase salt in St. Louis at seventy-five cents per bushel, (the present price by the barrel,) but, the freight being added, they could not possibly compete with the agency here, as they would, in the first place, have to purchase of the agency there."

14. From Jackson county:

"4. For the last few years the sale of salt has been confined to two merchants, one of whom is a regular agent for a salt company, and is governed in his sales by instructions from said company, and might for the last few years be considered a monopoly.

15. From Madison county:

"4. The Kanawha salt that comes to this part of the country, is deposited by the salt company with their agents to sell, at certain points along the river: is not subject to competition, and is, to all intents and purposes, a monopoly."

16. From Cape Girardeau county:

"4th The Kanhawa salt is sold exclusively by the agents of the salt company, whose establishments are confined to the river. Applications have been made to the company for the establishment of agencies in the interior, which have been declined, alleging that it would subject them to too much inconvenience in collecting, thereby compelling the citizens of the interior to go to the river for their supplies, some of whom are obliged to travel from fifty to seventy-five miles for salt. In this village we have no agent for the company, and but two or three in the county. Our merchants, however, usually keep on hand a small stock of foreign salt. I am not aware that the sales of the agents are confined to any particular limits."

17. From Taney county:

"4th. It is a monopoly in the hands of a few. We get our salt principally from Boonville, from agents of the Kanawha company, who supply the southwestern part of Missouri."

18. From Platte county:

"4. It is a monopoly, so far as we know, of one company, with two agencies in Platte county."

Mr. B. would extend his quotations to one additional head, to show that, with all these impositions in the salt trade of the West, there was still one more evil to be added—the evil of scarcity—the evil of an insufficient supply, with a rigorous exaction of ready money, and the consequent injury to stock and provisions, for want of an adequate supply, and the duresse of the purchaser, in the hard necessity he was under to take what he could get, and on such terms as the cruel company prescribed. The supply was insufficient; and this very insufficiency was necessary to complete the success of the general plan. Three of the queries applied to this point, and were:

"27. Have the people in your part of the country ever been so necessitated for salt as to be obliged to submit to impositions, and to take such as they could get, at such price and measure as the monopolists chose to prescribe, and of such quality as they offered?

28. Is salt sold or bartered for produce in your part of the country, or only for ready money?

29. Would the people of your part of the country use more salt, if they could get it cheaper, and of good quality, and fair measure?"

Without following the answers to these queries, county by county, Mr. B. would limit himself to a few quotations, taken at random:

"27. We have known salt to be so scarce here on some occasions, that the people were compelled, by dire necessity, to take it at any price that the sellers thought proper to put upon it. We have seen the most inferior quality of salt sold by the barrel, and by lick weight, at $3 per bushel of 50 lbs. nominally; the bushel being always deficient, more or less, by the barrel.

28. It is sold exclusively for cash in hand, or upon a very short credit; and rarely, if ever, bartered for the produce of the country.

29. Not a doubt exists with us that the people of this State would use greatly more salt than they now do, if they could get it cheaper, and of better quality."—[Howard county.

"27. During the last winter, the people were so necessitated for salt that they were obliged to submit to impositions, and to purchase such as they could get, at such price as the monopolists chose to prescribe.

28. It is a very rare occurrence when salt is sold or bartered for produce. Such occurrences do sometimes happen; but when salt is given in exchange for produce, it is for an article which readily commands the cash.

29. If the people in our part of the country could get salt of a good quality for a less price, we feel assured that the quantity used would be much increased. Many of our more experienced farmers are becoming satisfied that the quantity of salt heretofore given to stock has been too small, and that a more liberal use of it would contribute much, not only to their health, but to their improvement. Whilst the present high prices of salt in the Western States continues, its consumption will be reduced to the smallest quantity."—[Lincoln county.

"27. See answer 17th for imposition; their necessities at that time forced them to submit.

28. See answer 7th for answer to this.

29. They would unquestionably use the article of salt much more abundantly; and as ours is properly a grazing and stock-growing country, a large supply of the article is necessary for our support and our occupations; would say that the article should be sold at proper weight and a fair price, in order that there might be no stinting in the case, as there has been heretofore, owing to the exorbitant price."—[Jackson county.

"27. The people are sometimes entirely dependent on the agents of the company for their supplies, and, under such circumstances, the price is raised in proportion to the necessities of the people.

28. The company's salt is sold for cash only. The merchants frequently exchange foreign salt for produce.

29. More salt would be used if it were cheaper, particularly for stock."—[Greene county.

"27. We have been compelled at times to take any kind we could get, and at any price the holders saw proper to ask.

28. It is never bartered in this section of the country for any kind of produce, but is always sold for ready money.

29. There would be four times the quantity used in this county if it could be got at a fair price, and of good quality."
[Taney county.

"Answer to questions 27 and 28. These two questions I have, think, answered in answering the preceding questions.

Answer to question 29. If salt could be procured sufficiently cheap, I would venture to say more than ten times the quantity now used would be used; the farmer's sheep, hops, cattle, and horses, (if brutes have sympathies and affections,) would be astonished and delighted, to say nothing of the vast benefit they would derive from the exchange, agreeable to them, and profitable to the owner; for but few farmers can afford to give their stock any thing like a sufficiency of salt. It is used here more as an article to keep stock gentle, than with the expectation that the small quantity given will be of any real advantage to stock. Salt, to be really useful to stock, should be dealt to them with a liberal hand; in fact, it should be so placed that they should be able to get it whenever they want it."—[Platte co.

These are quotations enough to show the insufficient, the scant, and the stinted supply of salt which monopolizers allot to the West, and the rigorous exaction of ready money pay. The credit system does not extend to salt in the Western country; and the monopolizers, the Bank men, prefer hard money. Gold and silver, or its equivalent, is what they demand!

Mr. B. would make no further quotations, nor would he make any commentaries on what he had read. He had proved every point in the case: the monopoly—the suppressed production—the adulteration—the false measure—the extortionate price—the districted distribution—the stinted allowance—and the establishment of the general and special agents to reside in the districts, and to enforce all the regulations of the monopolizers. He had proved all this; and proved it to exist in a country which possessed a free Constitution, and a representative form of Government. He would undertake to say that there was not another country upon the face of the globe in which such an abuse existed, except one, and that one he had mentioned in the commencement of th se remarks: it was the East Indies—that part of the East Indies which had been conquered by the arms, and was subjected to the despotism—the iron hearted, moneyed despotism—of the English East India Company. There, on the banks of the Ganges, and the Indus, among helpless and depressed Hindoos, a parallel was found—an exact parallel—to the salt monopoly which now prevails on the banks of the Ohio and the Mississippi, among the free people of a proud and independent Government. Mr. B. said the British Parliamentary papers for the year 1832, now in the Library of Congress, contained the authentic evidence of the salt monopoly in India; and it was among the curiosities of the times that, while our library contained authentic details and elaborate testimony on the East India monopoly of salt, it was with great difficulty, and after a most strenuous resistance and protracted opposition, that he had been able to get the evidence of our own monopoly printed! The order for printing had been vehemently resisted—resisted for an entire day—but finally prevailed; and now our legislative archives will show the history of the American, as as well as of the Asiatic, monopoly of salt. The Senate and the country will be astonished to see the closeness of the parallel, and to observe how identically the spirit of monopoly has worked alike in the two quarters of the globe, and at such an immense distance apart. The entire diameter of the terraqueous globe was between them; communication and concert was impossible; yet in both places the dire and fell spirit of the salt monopoly is the same! its operations the same; its results the same; its history the same; an account of one an account of the other, varied only by the change of names, and the diversity of localities and manners which belong to the two quarters of the globe. The East India monopoly was brought to the knowledge of the world in the same manner that the American monopoly is now brought before our Congress. Petitions from India went to London to lay their complaints before the Parliament, and to claim redress for their cruel wrongs. It was in the year 1832. Parliament appointed a select committee to hear their testimony; and, from the testimony taken by that committee, I propose to read the evidence of two of the witnesses, one a Hindoo, the other an Englishman. This is what they say:

"Extracts from the report of the select committee of the British House of Commons, on the affairs of India: 1832.

SALT MONOPOLY.

Answers of Rammohun Roy to queries on the salt monopoly.

Rammohun Roy, a learned Brahmin pundit from India, was examined before the committee, and the following are his answers to queries upon the salt monopoly:

Question. Have the poorer classes in India been prevented, at any time, from procuring a sufficiency of salt by its high price?

Answer. As salt has, by long habit, become an absolute necessary of life, the poorest peasants are ready to surrender every thing else, in order to procure a small portion of this article. The dearth of salt is felt by the whole community; and the people in general are, therefore, obliged to make use of a bad quality; and few, comparatively, are able to incur the expense of procuring it in a purer form.

Question. Do you consider salt as necessary to the food of the natives, and the want of it a great deprivation of comfort?

Answer. The food of the people in Bengal is chiefly boiled rice, which without salt is a most insipid article.

Question. Do you suppose that a reduction in the price, and an improvement in the quality, would tend to any very considerable increase of consumption?

Answer. Salt, being an absolute necessary of life, is now purchased even by the poorest individuals at the sacrifice of every other kind of seasoning, and of every kind of food but rice, the staff of life. If salt were rendered cheaper and better, it would greatly promote the common comforts of the people. I do not know that it would immediately cause a very considerable increase of consumption. But to a certain extent it would, undoubtedly; and from its cheapness it would be used by the people for seasoning the fond of cattle, for which purpose large quantities were used before the Government monopoly. The poorer classes, at all events, would not be compelled to sacrifice other comforts to procure it.

Question. To what extent is the salt of the Bengal monopoly adulterated before it reaches the consumer?

Answer. The adulteration of salt is carried to an enormous extent by mixing it with one-third, or even one-half, of earth, until, instead of being like salt, it more resembles the earth of which it is composed. Persons in comfortable circumstances generally purify it over again before they use it, or purchase it already refined, often at double the common price; but the poorer classes cannot afford the expense of either.

Question. What is the retail price of salt in Calcutta?

Answer. The price of adulterated salt, at the time of my departure from India, was seven or eight seers for a rupee, or fifty cents for sixteen pounds, (one dollar and a half per bushel.) Pure salt costs fifty cents for nine pounds, (three dollars a bushel.)

Examination of Holt Mackenzie, esq.

Question. Are you of opinion that, if salt of a better quality could be supplied at a lower price to the ultimate consumer, a very considerable increase might take place in the quantity consumed throughout the country?

Answer. I have no doubt at all upon the point. I believe that many of the natives are very partially supplied with salt, and that what they do consume has much foreign matter mixed with it.

Question. What are the circumstances under which salt is manufactured on the cost of Coromandel?

Answer. It is manufactured on the coast of Coromandel as in Bengal, on account of Government. It is produced by solar evaporation, and at a low price.

Question. In what state is the salt generally sold to the retailer? Is it as pure as when supplied by the Government, or is it adulterated after it is sold by the Government?

Answer. I have been told that, to increase the quantity, dirt or sand is sometimes thrown in.

Question. What is the present amount of the salt monopoly in Bengal?

Answer. It would be safe to estimate it at 1,400,000 pounds sterling, or 7,000,000 of dollars, annually.

Question. Will you inform the committee in what part of Bengal the salt monopoly is carried on?

Answer. It is manufactured in Cuttack and the mouth of the Ganges principally.

Question. What is the mode of operation?

Answer. There are six manufacturing agencies, which employ a vast number of people who contract to make the salt.

Question. Is each agency attended by a European salt agent?

Answer. By an officer of the company.

Question. When the salt is delivered, how is it disposed of?

Answer. It is carried to the Government agencies.

Question. What is the comparative merit of the two kinds of salt?

Answer. The value of unboiled salt has greatly increased.

Question. Does not the duty on salt amount almost to a prohibition?

Answer. It does.

Question. Is it not limited to a certain quantity?

Answer. Undoubtedly it is. This is the spirit of all the East India Company's monopolies. If they were to supply the market equal to the demand, at a fair price, one cannot say to what extent the consumption would go. The consumption would be incalculable, by bringing it within the reach of the consumer. We see this in coffee, sugar, and every article upon which the duty bas been reduced.

Question. Can salt be produced in large quantities on the Coromandel coast?

Answer. It is naturally produced in immense quantities by solar evaporation. It is strong, good, coarse salt.

Question. How is salt produced in the Bengal provinces?

Answer. By collecting the surface earth, and very often ploughing the banks of the river to increase the deposite, filtering the water through it, and boiling the brine into salt.

Question. How is the East India Company able to preserve its monopoly?

Answer. By a branch of police under the direction of the salt agent. On the coast of Coromandel the salt forms by solar evaporation in large quantities, and the natives are forced to destroy it for the purpose of preserving the company's monopoly.

Question. What is the price of salt to the consumer?

Answer. From six hundred to one thousand per cent. upon first cost.

Question. How was salt manufactured before the monopoly?

Answer. Salt pans were ranged parallel to the coast. Into these the sea was admitted, and salt was formed by solar evaporation."

Having read the statements of these two witnesses, thus taken before a select committee of the British House of Commons, Mr. B. said that those Senators who wished to see further evidence to the same effect, might find it in the British parliamentary papers, now in the library of Congress. For himself, he would read no more, but would make some use of that which he had read. He would run the parallel, in a few particulars, between the Asiatic and the American monopolies. He would compare them at a few points; and show the Senate with what faithful similitude—with what precise resemblance—the spirit of monopoly conducted its operations in two regions so distant from each other, and how exactly they came to the same results, at the same time, on the two opposite sides of the globe.

1. As to the adulteration. The fact of adulteration—wilful, intentional adulteration, for the purpose of increasing the quantity—was proved in both cases. The quantum of adulteration was proved also to be about the same in each case, and to be about the one-half. Thus, in the fact, and in the quantum of adulteration, the two monopolies were on a par; but when we come to the adulterating ingredient, the parallel ceased, and the advantage was on the side of the Asiatics. They used an innocent ingredient, to wit, earth and sand; while the American monopolizers used bittern and lime; poisonous ingredients which promote, instead of preventing putrescence, counteract the properties of the salt, and do mischief to the provisions which are put up with it.

2. As to the measure. This is proved to be by the pound, and not by the measured bushel, in each case. But here again the Asiatic monopolizer is the fairest of the two; he gives 56 instead of 50 pounds of his stuff for a bushel; and he gives full weight, not lick weight; he does not compel the purchaser to take 25 pounds weight of wood for salt in every barrel; nor does he compel the purchaser to pay for what has been lost by leakage, dryage, wastage, and exposure to the weather.

3. In the price. This is proved to be near the same in both instances. The price for adulterated salt in the Asiatic monopoly was about $1 50 for 56 pounds: for purified salt, the double of that; which would bring the price to about $4 50 for the measured bushel of 84 pounds. This would make the peck cost about $1 12½ cents; and this may be assumed to be about the common price of Kanhawa salt in the greater part of the West. A dollar a peck!

4. In the districted distribution. In this the two monopolies are proved to be identical. The English East India Company divide the vast region of their Asia into salt districts, just as our American monopolizers divide out the vast valley of Mississippi. The boundaries of the salt districts are defined in the two regions; and each district placed under the care of agents, with an allotted quantity of salt to each, with orders to sell at prices which may be increased according to circumstances. The orders given to these agents are supreme and absolute. No agent can disobey them; no power can repeal them; no supplications or remonstrances can soften them.

5. In the suppressed production. Here again the conduct of the two companies is the same; their object the same; the result to the community the same. No difference between them, but in the mode of operating, and that difference resulting from position and power. The American monopolizers operate by the moneyed power, and with the aid of banks. They borrow money and rent the salt wells to be idle; they pay owners of wells not to work them; they pay other owners not to open new wells. Thus, among us, they suppress the production, by preventing the manufacture of salt. In Asia, the monopolizers operate by the military power. Having a standing army at its command, the English East India Company sends out detachments of troops to compel the natives to go down to the sea shore, and there destroy the pure salt which the sun has made for them out of the sea water, and which they might use almost without price and without trouble. This being destroyed, the unhappy people must then go to the company's agents, and purchase their adulterated stuff at the rate of 600 to 1,000 per centum profit to the company.

6. In the scant supply. This is the same under both monopolies. The supply of salt allowed to a district is always below the wants of the district, in order to increase the demand, to augment the price, and to compel the purchaser to take such as he can get.

7. In ready money pay. Here again the parallel is complete. The exaction of money in hand for salt is equally rigorous on the banks of the Indus, the Ganges, and the Burrampooter, as on the Ohio, the Missouri, and the Mississippi. The credit system has no application to the salt trade in either place.

Such is the spirit of monopoly! Such the workings of this fell spirit! Such its enormities and oppressions! and that in the most free as well as in the most enslaved of countries—in America as well as in Asia—on the opposite sides of the globe—and at the distance of the earth's entire diameter apart! and all this in the nineteenth century! In an age when people were reading, with astonishment, of the monopolies which existed in Europe two hundred years ago, and expressing their amazement that such things could have existed; and yet not one of which was equal to the enormities of the salt monopoly existing in our own day, in our own country, and under a form of Government which rests upon the equality of laws and rights.

The people of India, continued Mr. B came to London to solicit, from the British Parliament, the suppression of the monopoly which afflicted and oppressed them: the people of the West appear at the bar of their own Congress to solicit similar relief. They prove up their case in the document of testimony which has been produced, and of which the Senate has ordered ten thousand copies to be printed. Not a doubt of the truth of the testimony can remain upon the minds of any one; if it did, the amount of the evidence could be increased an hundred fold. With this proof in their hand, the people of the West appear at your bar, and ask for relief; not by interfering with the property of the monopolizers; for with that Congress has nothing to do. It belongs to the State of Virginia to regulate a local concern within her limits; and she might act justly by the community, and beneficially for the proprietors, to follow the example of other countries (and even her own in the case of tobacco, flour, and provisions) and establish an inspection over the measure and purity of salt. Such an inspection might prove to be as beneficial to the owners of the property as to the consumers of the salt. But that is not the question here. Congress has nothing to do with it; it has no power over the property or conduct of the monopolizers. But it has power over its own revenue laws—over the duty on foreign salt—that duty without which the monopolizers would in vain combine with banks, and in vain rent wells to let them lie idle! The duty impedes the importation of foreign salt; it throws what is imported into the hands of regraters; it makes them masters of the foreign importation as well of the domestic production; it enables this gigantic monopoly which bestrides as a colossus the vast valley of the Mississippi; it enables this colossus to plant one foot firmly in the city of New Orleans, while the other remains deeply rooted on the Kanawha and the Holston. This is what the duty on the foreign article does. That duty is the ægis of the monopolizers. It is their shield and protection—the indispensable ally, without which all their combinations would be defective and vain. It frees them from competition, the only thing they dread. It frees them from the only competition which can contend with them—which can bring them to a just price, a fair measure, a pure article, and a full supply. The people of the West ask for the abolition of this duty—for the cessation of this protection to monopolizers. They ask for a free trade in salt; that article which, in the catalogue of human and brute wants, ranks next after bread and grass. They ask for free ingress to the inexhaustible supplies of this article, which the Gulf of Mexico presents at the mouth of their great river, and which the Federal tax repulses from our shore. They ask that salt may be freed from tax and monopoly in a country where luxuries and trifles—silks and perfumes—are free!

This is what they ask—a free trade in salt, and no aid to the monopolizers. This is their petition—this the application of the people of the West. It is certainly a reasonable request, and such, it would seem, as could hardly be opposed, but opposed it is; opposed it has been, and opposed it will be; and that with an energy and desperation which do honor to a better cause. Never has any thing been resisted on this floor with more vehement determination than the repeal of the salt tax; and powerful is the combination of interest and talent which now resist it. The salt manufacturers, the Western monopolizers, the Northeastern fisheries, the authors of the compromise act, all stand together to resist this repeal; and they constitute a formidable opposition to my bill. Unfounded, unreasonable, and unjust as this opposition is, it is yet too powerful to be contemned. It is able, with its combined strength and its delusive arguments, to obstruct and impede our attempt, and to keep up an odious tax, fundamentally wrong in itself, and the parent of the heartless monopoly which now afflicts the West. It becomes my duty, as the author of the repeal bill, to review this opposition—to examine its arguments—to show their nullity—and to convince the Senate that such an opposition and such arguments ought not to be allowed to defeat the great measure which I propose. This review I will make; and will examine in their order, and briefly, the interests and the arguments which oppose the suppression of the salt tax.

1. The compromise act, as it is called, of 1833. At the head of all the elements of opposition to my bill, stands this act and its authors; this act which released luxuries from taxation, and left taxes upon necessaries—which no two authorities can construe alike—which reduced duties without reducing the drawbacks founded upon them—which undertakes to tie up the hands of Congress till 1842, and to regulate its consititutional action afterwards—which adjourned, without settling, the tariff question. This act and its authors [Messrs. CLAY and CALHOUN] oppose my bill, and pretend it will be a breach of the compromise to touch the question before the year 1842. Not admitting the sanctity of that act in any respect; protesting against its pretensions to inviolability; believing it to be the most injudicious, incomprehensible and faulty act that ever appeared on the statute book, I proceed to oppose compromise to compromise, and to show that there are no less than three solemn compromises in favor of the repeal of this odious tax; the whole of which have thus far been violated. The first of these compromises was in the enactment of the law itself, which limited its duration to the continuance of the war with Great Britain, "and for one year thereafter, and no longer." It was a war tax, laid after the war was declared, limited to the war and to one year thereafter; and except for this limitation could not have been laid at all. The history of the act, as given in the report on the fishing bounties and allowances revived at the same time, and the words of the act itself proves this. The concluding section of the act is in these words: "That this act shall continue in force until the termination of the war in which the United States are now engaged with Great Britain, and for one year thereafter, and no longer." Such was the compromise on which the revival of the salt duty was obtained in 1813; but even then there was a strong opposition to it. Many sagacious statesmen, opposed at all times to a salt tax, and knowing how difficult it was to repeal a tax after it was once laid, and how easy it was to violate the conditions upon which it was obtained, refused altogether to vote for it; and preferred to raise the means for carrying on the war from taxes on any thing else. Among these was the venerable Mr. Macon, of North Carolina, who utterly refused to vote for the act—recorded his name, and lifted his voice, against it—and declared his belief that he should never see the tax relinquished. His forebodings were prophetic: more than a quarter of a century has elapsed since the termination of the war, and the tax still continues. It should have ceased in February, 1816; for the war terminated in February, 1815; instead of that it is still in force in 1840. Thus, the first compromise for the cessation of the act, the sacred one upon which its passage was obtained, has been violated. The second compromise for its speedy cessation was in the act for its continuation in the year 1816. That continuance was obtained to prevent a deficit of $700,000 in the Treasury, and until the public lands in Alabama and Mississippi could be brought into market to supply that sum. The document on the fishing bounties and allowances proves this; and, at page 24, contains this statement, in a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives. After giving a view of the finances, he [Mr. Crawford] says: "It therefore appears that, if the salt tax shall be repealed, there will be a deficit in the revenue of more than $700,000 annually, until the proceeds of the sales of the lands in the State of Mississippi and in the Alabama Territory shall be applicable to the current expenses of the Government." Upon this statement, the act was continued, and continued generally, without naming how long, to meet the contingency of the forthcoming sales of public lands in the Southwest. The sales came on in 1817 and 1818, and produced far more than the $700,000 required; and the tax should then have been discontinued; but it was not; and here is the breach of the second compromise for the cessation of the salt tax. But the contingency did not occur without an attempt to repeal it: the year 1818 saw two such attempts—one in each House of Congress—and these were defeated from a patriotic desire to extinguish, in a brief period, the national debt which was then drawing so large an interest. Mr. Lowndes, chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report in favor of continuing taxes for that patriotic purpose, and calculated the total extinction of the debt by the year 1827. With this view he recommended the continuation of several taxes, and among the rest that of the duty on salt. This patriotic policy prevailed. The attempts to repeal the act failed, and failed on the sole ground of keeping it up until the public debt was paid. That debt has been paid, not in 1827, as calculated by Mr. Lowndes, but in 1834, under the most glorious administration of President Jackson. The debt has been paid near seven years. President Jackson, like Mr Jefferson, recommended the suppression of this tax in the last year of his administration; yet it continues: and thus is violated the third compromise for the cessation of the tax. Three compromises to discontinue the tax have been violated; and now a new compromise, made under extraordinary circumstances, and without the least reference to that tax, is set up to continue it again; —to protract its existence until 1842—and then to throw it into hotch potch with all the multifarious objects of a general tariff bill, to be again compromised, and imposed upon the country in the chaffering and bargaining arrangements to which such a bill is subject. And this is the spirit of taxation! All agreements to limit the duration of taxes are void: all agreements to continue them are sacred.

2. That the duty is already greatly reduced, and is going down as fast as the general interests of the country will permit. This is what is also said by the authors of the act of 1833, (Messrs. CLAY and CALHOUN,) and upon which they resist my bill. But this is an error—an error of fact; and paradoxical as the assertion may appear, I can say there is but little reduction in the rate of the salt duty—in some kinds none at all—although the duty has gone down from twenty cents to six cents on the bushel. This is an assertion no less actually true, than apparently false. The document No. 368—the report on the salt duties and fishing bounties—explains it, and shows that the price of salt, the sun made salt, has been declining all over the world for the last twenty years, and has actually declined about in the proportion to the reduction of our duty; so that the rate of the duty remains about the same. The duty which was about 100 per centum on the value at 20 cents a bushel, is still about the same at 6 cents. The document mentioned contains, at page 79, a table of the cost of salt in all the countries from which we obtain it—nearly forty in number—showing the respective prices for a series of years, from 1822 to 1838. This table shows that the cost of all the salt which we receive from abroad, except that from Liverpool, has regularly and largely declined during that time; that all sun made salt, the only strong and pure kind, has actually undergone a decline of from one half to two-thirds in that time. This is an important view of the subject, and deserves to be substantiated by particular references. I will give these references, beginning with the West Indies, our nearest fountain of supply, and a fountain able to supply us, without any other limit on the quantity than the limits to the quantum of sunshine and sea water. Thus the salt of the British West Indies, (Turks Island, and other Bahama islands,) from which we receive about seven hundred thousand bushels annually, has declined in price, in the period mentioned, from 14 to 10 cents. That of the Dutch West Indies, from which we receive about four hundred thousand bushels annually, the price has gone down from 18 cents to 7 cents. That of the Swedish West Indies has gone down from 19 to 7; that of the Danish, from 22 to 7; that of the French, from 21 to 7; that of the Spanish, from 15 to 8. Such is the gratifying reduction of the price of salt in the Gulf of Mexico—the immediate neighborhood of the great West—the point to which the Western trade tends—and the most ready and convenient fountain of supply which we can have for salt. On all this salt the duty may still be said to be what it was twenty years ago, namely, 100 per centum on the value; and, therefore, it is an error to suppose that the duty is rapidly diminishing, and going down as fast as the general interest permits. In all other countries from which we obtain alum salt, and all salt made by solar evaporation out of sea water, comes under that description; from all these countries the same results are more or less perceivable. Thus, from Colombia, the price is reduced from 10 cents to 5; from the Argentine Republic, from 25 to 7; from the Atlantic coast of Spain, from 7 to 4 cents; from its Mediterranean coast, from 9 to 4 cents; from Portugal, from 10 to 6 cents; from the southern coast of France, from 8 to 7; from other countries and islands in the Mediterranean and Adriatic seas, the price has declined from 7, 6, and 5 cents, to 4, 3, and 2. I omit fractions in all cases, and give the round numbers nearest the sum. It is, therefore, seen that the price of the sun-made salt has been decreasing all over the world for the last twenty years, and there is no telling how much lower it will go, but probably will become as cheap in the Gulf of Mexico as in the Mediterranean sea. At this rate, if free from duty, salt would become the universal ballast of all ships trading in the warm latitudes which produce it; and, being thus the universal ballast, it would be sold at first cost in all our seaport towns. This is what the good of the country requires, and what our tax on the article now prevents. Upon this state of facts Mr. B. rested the assertion, that the rate of the salt duty was as great as ever, and that total abolition, not reduction, was what the good of the country required.

3. That the duty will be reduced, in 1842, to twenty per centum on the value. This is what the authors of the compromise say, and they seem to think that salt may very well continue to bear that duty in time to come. To this I utterly object, and for many reasons: and first, because salt is an article of prime necessity, and universal consumption, and ought to be as free from tax as air and water; secondly, because any tax, no matter what, will answer the purposes of the Western monopolizers, by enabling them to engross the foreign salt which is subject to duty in New Orleans; thirdly, because any tax, no matter what, will be a pretext for keeping up the fishing bounties and allowances, now drawing $320 000 annually from the Treasury, of which two-thirds are unduly drawn; fourthly, because any duty, no matter what, will keep up the custom-house standard of weight for measure—of fifty-six pounds for the bushel—which has improved into fifty pounds by the regraters and monopolizers, and whereby the consumer loses 34 pounds in the bushel. Mr. B. said that this substitution of weight for measure—this substitution of a false for a true bushel—was one of the great abuses of the salt trade of the West; and its origin was clearly traceable to the salt revenue laws, and to the tortuous and crooked policy of General Hamilton. It was one of his contrivances for increasing a tax without seeming to increase it; and while this was his only object in the year 1792, when, as Secretary of the Treasury, he recommended this change, yet it has led to a most injurious and lasting imposition in the measure of salt, which has spread all over the Western country, and is now fully exemplified in the exhibitions of the "lick weight" which have been made to the Senate, and by which barrels lacking one-fouth of being full, and only capable of containing two and a half, or three, or four and a half bushels, if filled to the brim, are forced upon the purchaser for five bushels, six bushels, or nine bushels. All this has its root and origin in our custom-house substitution of weight for measure; and it is necessary to abolish that process entirely—to keep the salt away from the custom-house altogether—in order to let the measured bushel re-establish itself under the laws of the States, and by the equity and fair dealing of the importers and purchasers. Mr. B. said that he could not leave this topic without verifying what he had said in relation to the substitution of the weighed for the measured bushel. It was a point of great moment to the people of the West, and was but imperfectly understood by them. They knew the evil, but not its source, nor where to apply the remedy. The report on the fisning bounties and salt duty would explain it all; and for this purpose he read an extract from that report, at pages 12 and 13. It was as follows:

ACT OF MAY 2, 1792.

"This act raises the duty on salt by the indirect means of altering and reducing the standard of the bushel, substituting a weighed bushel of fifty-six pounds for a measured bushel of eighty-four pounds, and increasing the fishing allowances in the same proportion. The history of this change in the bushel, which, at the time, increased a tax on a necessary of life without professing to raise it, and which has been attended ever since, and is now attended, with such injurious consequences in the West, may be traced to its source in General Hamilton's financial reports, as follows.

"On the 16th of March, 1792, the Secretary of the Treasury (General Hamilton) reported in favor of raising additional supplies for the support of the Government and the defence of the frontiers; and, among other means of increasing the revenue from imposts, recommended the salt duty to be calculated upon the weight, instead of the measure; and that fifty-six pounds should be counted for a bushel. His recommendation was as follows:

"'It is represented that the duty on salt operates unequally, from the considerable difference in weight, in proportion to quantity, of different kinds of salt: a bushel weighing from about fifty six to upwards of eighty weight. It would have an equalizing effect if the bushel were defined by weight; and, if fifty-six pounds were taken as the standard, a valuable accession to the revenue would result.'—(American State Papers, vol. 5, page 160.)

"In the same report, at page 161, the Secretary, under the head of "Estimate of probable additional revenue from the proposed duties,' says:

"'Salt, from the equalizing regulation proposed, will probably yield one sixth more, or two cents per bushel; which, on two millions of bushels, would yield $40.000.'

"This recommendation of General Hamilton had its effect. In two months thereafter the weighed bushel was established by law. The act of May 2, 1792, entitled 'An act for raising a further sum of money for the protection of the frontiers, and for other purposes therein mentioned,' increases the duties on many articles; and with respect to salt, and the fishing bounties and allowances, made the following provisions:

"'SEC 3. That, from and after the last day of June next, in computing the duty heretofore laid upon salt, a bushel of salt shall be deemed not to exceed the weight of fifty-six poundal avoirdupois; and, as often as the actual bushel of salt shal exced the said weight, such salt shall be charged in the proportion of the present rate of duty per bushel, for every fifty-six pounds of its actual weight.'

"This is the act which has introduced into some parts of the United States the idea of selling salt by the weighed instead of the measured bushel, and has led to one of the greatest impositions now practised by the salt monopolizers of the West. Improving upon the idea of this weight for measure, they reduce the fifty-six to fifty pounds; they then sell by lick weight, which is always below true weight, and frequently as much as twenty or thirty per cent below it. Thus, to raise the salt tax indirectly, by diminishing the bushel, an immense and permanent injury has been inflicted upon the Western States, where the weighed bushel prevails, and a false idea of the national supply is created; for, when we say so many bushels imported, or manufactured, the mind is deceived—for they are not measured bushels weighing eighty-four pounds, but weighed bushels, one-third less than the measured bushel. The reported importation of seven millions of bushels per annum, is but a little upwards of four millions. Such are the consequences of a single indirect, and apparently, a small indirect movement in legislation! To increase the salt revenue in 1792, by altering the standard of the bushel, the nation, and especially the whole Western country, has since been cheated out of one-third of its salt; and since the monopoly in the West, the cheat in that quarter (lick weight and adulteration being considered) is fully one-half.

"But this change in the salt measure, though introduced into our laws on the recommendation of General Hamilton, and as an indirect mode of increasing the duty, was not original with him: it had previously been done, and for the same purpose, in Great Britain. Fifty-six pounds to the bushel had there been adopted, in order to increase the number of bushels, and thus augment the product of the tax. By this contrivance, the salt tax, both in England and America, while nominally on the bushel, was, in reality, on two-thirds of a bushel; but, in the year 1822, the English relieved themselves from this imposition, and from all the burdens of the salt tax, by repealing it in toto, and making salt free of tax in that country."

With this explanation of the manner in which the weighed bushel was brought into use in our country, and a declaration that 20 per centum was just as bad as 20 cents on the bushel, Mr. B proceeded to notice the next of the objections which the sticklers for the compromise, as it was called, interposed to his bill. It was:

4. That salt must wait for the general regulation of the tariff, and be taken up at the same time with all other articles, and be included in the general bill which settles and arranges all the duties. To this, said Mr. B. I utterly object. I object to postponing this article to a general settlement day, then to be mixed up with all other articles, to abide the bargaining arrangements to which every general tariff bill is liable. To all this I object. I claim for salt a distinct and separate consideration—a trial by itself—a decision upon its own merits; and that for many and urgent reasons, of which I will mention a few; the rest being implied or included in other parts of my speech. And, first, I say that the salt tax is now wrongfully, almost fraudulently, upon our statute book—that it is there in violation of three compromises—the one upon which it was enacted in 1813—the one upon which it was continued in 1816—and the one upon which its repeal was prevented in 1818: and being thus wrongfully there, honor and good faith require it to be taken off. Secondly, I claim for it a separate consideration, because salt is an article which stands alone in the economy of nature, having neither rival nor substitute; and being of indispensable use, and universal consumption. From the palace to the cottage—from the ox to the epicure, neither man nor beast can do without it, nor find a substitute for it. Such an article should not be thrown into hotch-potch with luxuries and trifles in a general tariff law. Thirdly, salt is now an article which stands alone in our statute book. The duty on it was repealed by a separate act in 1807—revived by a separate act in 1813—continued by a separate act in 1816—partly repealed by a separate act in 1830;—and the only law on the statute book which now keeps it alive, is a separate act. Thus, this tax now stands alone in our revenue code; and by itself let it continue to stand, or let it fall. It is a tax too odious and execrable to be honored with company in its life, or solaced with companions in its death. Fourthly, I claim for salt a separate act because, when the authors of the compromise act framed their general bill, and arranged their long list of free articles—most of them articles of luxury, and many the merest trifles; when this was done, salt was not admitted into the favored list. This famous compromise act gives us a free trade in linens, silks, shawls, and cambrics; in camomile flowers, coriander seed, and catsup; in essence of bergamot, and otto of roses; in rattans and reeds; in tortoise shell combs, and juniper berries, and other berries; in cochineal and opium; in emory, sulphur, borax, oxhorn tips, aqua fortis, and tartaric acids: it gives us a free trade in all these luxuries and trifles, and in many others, "too tedious to enumerate," and leaves a tax upon salt! and now the effort is to prevent the salt tax from being abolished in a separate bill, after refusing to include it in the exemptions of a general law! Such are the impediments by which we are met—such the obstacles which oppose our progress! obstacles which extort the exclamation, when will the proper time come—what will the proper form be—to repeal a salt tax? And to this inquiry, experience and the past, answer, NEVER, until the people take the question into their own hands, and fix the term for the end of their own wrongs.

5. Protection to the domestic manufacture. This is a reason urged by many to keep up the duty; but there are answers which invalidate it. 1. Fifty years of protective duty has not answered the purposes of protection—has not given to the country an adequate supply of a better and a cheaper article. The salt, of the West especially, is still high in price, and inferior in quality. 2 It has not produced a supply of alum salt at all; the Western salt works cannot produce it; no artificial process can ever make it. The whole West is now dependent, and must forever be dependent on the SEA and the SUN for a supply of this kind of salt; without which beef and pork cannot be pickled; bacon cannot be sent to the South, and butter becomes rancid. No amount of protection can produce a home supply of this article; and it is folly and tyranny to try it. The West must continue to purchase the sun made salt, cost what it may, and although the domestic salt should be furnished gratis. 3. If protection was just or necessary, freight and distance would give it. The central parts of the valley of the Mississippi are twelve or fifteen hundred miles from New Orleans; many parts of the valley are two thousand miles and upwards from that port. The transportation of salt over this long distance, must be several times more than its original cost—must be equal to a protecting duty of several hundred per cent. This is sufficient, if protection can do any good. A duty upon the foreign salt, in addition to this expense of transportation, can answer no purpose but to foster monopolies and oppress the consumer. 4. Besides all this, the protective principle is surrendered by the compromise; it is given up; and, if it was not, it would be an outrage to any legislative body to ask protection for such manufactories of salt as we have had disclosed in the evidence. Protection to what? To monopolies! To dead wells—adulteration—suppressed production—peck bushels—extortionate price—districted distribution—agency regulation—stinted allowance! Wo to the man who stands up and demands protection for such abominations!

6. The fishing bounties and allowances, for the keeping up of which the substratum of a salt tax is an indispensable foundation. Here, said Mr. B. in this strange objection we have the exemplification of the evils of careless and erroneous legislation. By an error in the compromise act, and the previous act reducing the duty on salt, the strange effect is produced of converting the greatest consumers of salt into the supporters of a salt tax—converting the former greatest enemies of this tax into its greatest friends! This is the case with the Northeastern fisheries, the great consumers of salt, and formerly the great enemies of the tax upon it. This interest was the first to memorialize Congress against the salt duty fifty years ago; their Representatives voted unanimously, with the exception of two voices, for the repeal of the tax in 1807; they voted nearly unanimously against the temporary revival of the duty, as a war tax, in 1813; now they are for it; and this strange conversion is the effect of our own faulty and vicious legislation, in reducing duties, and not reducing the drawbacks dependent upon them. The fishing bounties and allowances are a drawback of the salt duty—a drawback of the duty paid by the fishermen on that part of their fish which should be exported from the United States; and being a drawback, there was no profit attending it so long as the drawback and the duty were the same. But these have been rendered unequal by the blunders of recent legislation; the duty is reduced two-thirds, while the bounties and allowances remain what they were! Thus a tax has become a profit! two-thirds of these bounties and allowances have become clear gains; next year all will be clear gain; and the year after, the whole salt revenue of the Union will be insufficient to pay the drawback upon it!—a drawback it will be, with a vengeance, when it takes all, and more too, to pay it! Far from being a reason for keeping up the salt duty, these bounties and allowances, and especially their present condition, are among the strongest reasons for suppressing it. By the fault of our legislation, they have ceased to be drawbacks, and have generated into naked bounties—gratuities—out of the Treasury—the ne plus ultra of the protective system! This is a state of things which neither the Constitution of the country, nor justice to the community, can tolerate. National bounties were proposed by General Hamilton, and attempted to be justified on the "general welfare doctrine;" but they have been scouted as equally unconstitutional and injudicious; and, until now, in the case of these fisheries, not a voice has been heard in favor of national bounties since General Hamilton's report in their behalf was overruled by the country near fifty years ago. The recent reason which has been invented for bolstering up these bounties to the fisheries, that they are in a depressed state, and cannot be kept up, to train mariners for the navy, unless by the aid of national bounties, is as unfounded in fact, as they are unconstitutional in law, and injudicious in practice. These fisheries are not in a depressed state, but in the most prosperous condition of any branch of industry in the Union! This is a fact about which there will no longer be two opinions. The report of the recent committee of the Senate on the salt duties and the fishing bounties and allowances, settles this point, and settles it forever. Here is an extract from the report, founded on authentic data, which must carry conviction to every mind:

"1. As to the depressed and suffering state of these fisheries. Very far from that condition is their actual state; and that is susceptible of proof which admits of no contestation. The proof comes from the fishery itself—from its own returns of its own business. In the year 1837, the assessors of each town in the State of Massachusetts were required, by an act of the Legislature, to make return to the Secretary of the Commonwealth of all the branches of the manufacturing industry of the State, particularly rating the amount of capital invested in each, the number of persons employed and its annual product. The return necessarily comprehended the fisheries, and exhibited the following result for the State:

	Value.	Hands employed.	Capital invested.
Fishery, (whale, cod, and mackerel,)	$7,592,290	20,168	$12,184,078
Oil, (refined whale and other oil,)	2,030,321	145	1,135,500

"Such is the state of the Massachusetts fisheries! Close upon ten millions of dollars upon a capital of less than fourteen millions, managed by twenty thousand persons; and this for the fishing season (so far as cod and mackerel are concerned) of three and a half or four months. The proceeds are near $500, for less than the third of a solar year, to each hand employed. They are at the rate of above sixty per centum on the capital invested; and that for three months and a half, leaving the fishermen (except the whalers) the other eight months and a half of the year to pursue other avocations, both themselves and their ships. And this is to be called a depressed and suffering business, only to be kept alive by Treasury donations annually doled out to it! Compare it with any branch of agricultural industry in other parts of the Union—with the tobacco crop of the whole United States, with all the capital invested, and all the hands employed in the production of that crop, and yielding annually an exportable value of about seven or eight millions of dollars. Compare the fisheries, even those of Massachusetts alone, with the condition of this great staple, or any other great staple of the Southern, Western, and Middle States; make this comparison, and it will be seen that the fisheries are in a state of prosperity immeasurably above them. Passing from the gross product of the fisheries of Massachusetts to detailed statements confined to cod and mackerel, and it will be seen that, in many places, the results are still more favorable than the average of the gross amount would give. Thus, for Boston, at page 2 of the report, the cod and mackerel fishery at that place, independent of the whale branch of the business, is thus stated:

"'Vessels employed in the cod and mackerel fishery, 152; tonnage of same, 9703; codfish caught, 127,250 quintals; value thereof, $108,509 90; mackerel caught, 42,266 barrels; value of the same, $320,165; salt used in the cod and mackrel fishery, 142,567 bushels; hands employed, 1,794; capital invested $593,200.'

"Here is a result, in some particulars, more striking than the gross statement. A capital of less than $600,000 yields a product, in less than four months, of more than $700,000; and divides, for that time, upwards of $400 to each hand engaged in it.

"Again: at page 133, the following is found, under the head of Dorchester:

"'Vessels employed in the cod and mackerel fishery, 16; tonnage of the same, 1,050—codfish caught, 9,000 quintals; value of the same, $25,000—mackerel caught, 5,000 barrels; value of the same, $35 000—salt used in the cod and mackerel fishery, 20,000 bushels; hands employed, 128; capital invested, $50,000.'

"Here, again, is a result far exceeding the profits of any agricultural business: a capital of $50,000 yields $60,000 in four months! 128 hands average a dividend of $483 each!

"One more instance, and the committee will cease this examination. They (referring to the volume itself, in the library of Congress, for the ample details which prove these fisheries to be quite independent of national bounties) take the town of Gloucester, for the particular reason that it has lately been the scene of some excitement in relation to the salt duties and the fishing bounties and allowances, and has sent memorials to Congress to arrest their repeal. At page 9 of the same report, the cod and mackerel fishery of this town, exclusive of the whale fishery of the same place, is thus stated:

"'Vessels employed in the cod and mackerel fishery, 221: tonnage of same, 9,824; codfish caught, 55,181 quintals; value of same, $186,516; mackerel caught, 43,934 barrels; value of same, $335 566; salt used in the cod and mackerel fishery, 113.760 bushels; hands employed, 1,580; capital invested, $349 000.'

"This gives, upon a capital of $349,000, a product of above $522,000, and a dividend of about $330 to the hand; and all this for a business pursued from three and a half to four months in the year!

"Half a dozen other towns, taken at random, and limited to the cod and mackerel fishery, give the following results:

Towns.	Capital.	Value.	Hands.	Salt Bushel.
Plymouth - -	$79.500	$95,574	362	35,400
Barnstable - -	16,200	26,307	104	6,950
Chatham - -	41.200	56,100	198	18.637
Eastham - -	10.770	30.900	91	6,120
Orleans - -	33,000	91,100	261	31,000
Wellfleet - -	61,556	120,700	496	29,350

"The committee pursue this inquiry no farther; the result given are sufficient to show that the fisheries are doing well—far better than any branch of agriculture, and that what they want from the Government is a free trade in salt."

This, continued Mr. B. is the state of the fisheries, incomparably more productive than any other branch of national industry, and the very last to claim a bounty to sustain them. They are now prosperous, and have been regularly improving with the increase of the home market; of which they have the exclusive supply. They now have the monopoly of the market for seventeen millions of people—a people doubling their numbers every twenty-five years. This monopoly is the true cause of their great and growing prosperity; and, while in possession of such an advantage, let them not ask for bounties in addition to monopoly. To do them justice, many of them do not. The owners of the vessels, who may be ordinary merchants, are the chief sticklers for bounties, because they get three-eighths a piece, while the whole crew get but five-eighths among them. Salt, free from duty, and consequently at less than half its present price, with good markets for their fish, is all the fishermen need; and this let them have.

When he had finished answering the objections to the repeal of the salt duty, Mr. B. said there were numerous arguments in favor of the repeal, of an urgent and peculiar nature, not stated or implied in his previous remarks; a few of which he would present to the Senate. Avoiding a repetition of what he had already presented, he would confine himself to the peculiar reasons to which he had alluded; and, passing over each one with all possible brevity, he would claim, for what he said, the attention and consideration which was due to a subject rising above all party considerations—connected with no politics—and solely directed to the good of the country.

1. At the head of these reasons, he placed the great consideration of the full use of salt for the stock of the Western country; for the horses, cattle, swine, and sheep of the Great West. Stock was more or less valuable in every part of the Union; but in the West, and especially in the upper half of the valley of the Mississippi, it was a main source of individual and of national wealth; and was entitled to every aid which would promote and increase its value. Every person knows that salt was indispensable to the well-being of stock in all countries, and especially in those which, being far from the sea, have not the benefit of saline dews on the grass; and where, consequently, all their green food is fresh and watery. Every person knows this; still it is only in England, France, and Holland, and some other European countries, that learned societies, enlightened men, and practical farmers, have prosecuted a course of experiments to ascertain the full benefit of a free use of salt in rearing stock. In these countries a series of experiments for more than half a century, have established the fact that a full use of salt will make a difference of from one-third to one-half, in the value of stock; that food for stock can be made to go nearly twice as far when well salted; that the health and growth, the flavor, the flesh, milk and butter, and the fineness of the hair and wool, and the general improvement of the whole animal, are wonderfully promoted by it; and that no animal will take too much when left to its own will; and that all should be allowed to take as much as they please. The agricultural books of the countries I have mentioned are full of facts and evidence to this effect, part of which may be seen in the salt document printed by the order of the Senate at the last session. A recapitulation, or even a reference, to these important details, is impossible in a speech; but there is one species of stock, the condition of which in the United States is so far behind that of other countries, that a quotation in relation to it may be tolerated, even towards the end of a long speech: I speak of sheep; and of the effect which a free use of salt produces upon the health and growth of the animal; upon its fattening; upon the flavor of its flesh; and upon the quality of its wool. I quote from Young's Annals; a name which is only to be pronounced in an agricultural circle to awaken respect and command attention; and I take the example which he has drawn from one of the southern provinces of France. He says:

"In the jurisdiction of Arle, in the county of Provence, there is a district called the Craw, extending in length about six leagues, and in breadth about three, the whole surface of which is covered with small rough stones, and not a tree or bush to be seen in the whole district, except here and there upon the borders; yet on this spot, so seemingly sterile, by the free use of salt, more numerous flocks of sheep are bred and reared than upon any other common, of equal extent, throughout the whole kingdom. And what is no less remarkable, the sheep are healthier, hardier, and endure the severity of winter with less loss—though they have fewer sheep cots for covering them—than those bred and fed on more copious pastures; and, besides, they have not the advantage of more convenient shelter. Add to this, that the wool of the flocks bred and brought up in the Craw is not only the finest in the whole country, but bears the highest price of any in France. From hence he concludes that it is to the unlimited use of salt that these surprising effects are to be ascribed; for it frequently happens that the Craw is so burnt up in the summer that the poor animals are forced to turn up the very stones to come at the few blades of grass that grow round them, and yet none perish for want of food. Let every excellence, therefore, that can reasonably be supposed inherent in the herbage, be allowed to it, yet the quantity of it is so small, that, without the abundant use of salt, a fourth part of the sheep kept in the Craw could not subsist in it.

"But, as a still further demonstration that this astonishing effect is solely to be attributed to salt, we have (says the writer) in Languedoc, on the borders of the Rhone, a spot of the same kind of stony land, in every respect similar to that of the Craw, yet, for want of the free use of salt, that in Languedoc does not maintain the tenth part of the number of sheep that are brought up in the Craw, though in other respects it is no ways inferior—their wines and other fruits produced in the borders of both being, in their goodnes and other essential qualities, equal."

Such, continued Mr. B. is the testimony of an English author on this point, so important to agriculture. The testimony of a French author, of the highest celebrity, which I will superadd, may be read with profit and pleasure by the statesman and the farmer. Who is there, in the literary and scientific world, who has not heard of CHAPTAL, that eminent chymist and amiable man, created Count of the Empire and Peer of France by the great Napoleon, not for feats of arms or policy, but for the application of the greatest talents to the most useful affairs of mankind? Who has not heard of this great man, and will not receive with attention his opinions upon the impolicy of a salt tax, and the benefits to a nation from a free use of salt in agriculture? I flatter myself that I render a pleasure to all enlightened and candid minds by quoting them: and this is what he says in one of his most useful works—"Introduction to Chymistry applied to Agriculture"—a work in which the highest results of science are brought down to useful application to the affairs of life, and in which instruction is imparted to the laborer in the field, and to the statesman in the legislative hall:

"In order to realize all the evil which results to agriculture from the duty upon salt, it is sufficient to know the extensive advantage arising from its employment.

"Salt is of the utmost importance to all ruminating animals, increasing their relish for the insipid food, exciting the action of their membraneous and weak stomachs, and preventing those obstructions of the intestines which are produced by the use of dry forage during the winter. It is generally observed that those animals are preferred in the market, which have been habitually fed upon saline plants, and that their flesh is of a superior quality. There is no farmer, who has not been able to see the difference, at the close of a winter, between those animals which have received their supply of salt and those that have been deprived of it; the first are well shaped, large, and fat, their hair is glossy, their eyes lively, and their motions prompt and firm; the second present images of suffering and misery; the sheep have lost nearly all their fleece before shearing time, and that which remains is falling from them in locks; the neat cattle are lean and sickly, their organs of digestion are impeded in their action, and it is only after having browsed the juicy herbage of spring that they recover their health.

"During the time that salt was freed from any impost, (in France,) the use of it in agriculture became each year more extensive; it was mixed with manures to increase their activity; it was spread at the roots of trees to reanimate their languishing powers of vegetation; and the quantity of salted provisions, both for market and for home consumption, was much increased.

"The impost upon salt is to agriculture a real calamity, since it has taken from it many of its sources of prosperity; and at the same time the public Treasury has received no advantage from the tax, equal to the injury which it has inflicted upon agriculture."

2. Passing from the subject of stock, Mr. B. said another of the peculiar reasons against a salt tax was in its inequality; that it was the most unequal tax in the world, falling in the most unjust proportions on the different parts of the community, and with its greatest weight upon the most meritorious part, and the part least able to bear it. It fell upon the farmers, who handle little money, and not upon the merchants and bankers, who handle much. It might safely be said that a Western farmer, with half a section of land, and a small stock, paid more salt tax than Stephen Girard did with his fifteen millions of dollars in money. This is perverting all the principles of taxation, and should not be tolerated in a free country.

3. The drawbacks allowed to the northeastern fisheries, as a return of the duty paid on the foreign salt used in curing fish, was the third of the peculiar reasons urged by Mr. B. for the total repeal of the duty. It was a gross injustice, he said, to all the other classes of consumers of the article; an injustice to the curers of beef and pork, and to the lake fisheries of the Northwest; and to the bay, river, sound and gulf fisheries of the Atlantic coast, and of the South. All these classes had as much right to the drawback as the Northeastern fisheries; and up to the year 1807, the beef and pork curers enjoyed it in the same degree with the cod and mackerel fishery. They still had a right to it in point of justice; and were only omitted in the act of 1813 because of its limited and temporary character. Farmers and the other fisheries had an equal right to this drawback; but a universal drawback would be absurd: better that no one should pay in than that every one should draw back what he paid; and this was precisely what he [Mr. B.] aimed at. To elucidate this point, and to show the injustice and partiality of the salt tax, Mr. B. here read a paragraph from the report on the fishing bounties:

"The third answer to this objection is, that, if it were both necessary and constitutional to give national bounties to the cod and mackerel fishery, it would be unjust to do so, without extending the same bounties to other branches of American fisheries, and to the salted provision trade of the United States. This is a clear and indisputable proposition. With respect to fisheries fifty years ago, when the bounties and allowances began, we had none of any consequences but those in the Northeast; since that time the fisheries of Lake Superior, and other northwestern lakes, have been developed to great advantage. Those of the bays and rivers of the Atlantic board (the Delaware and Chesapeake bays, the Potomac river, the Albemarle sound, and other places) have risen to a high degree of importance, exporting something, and furnishing a large quantity of fish for home consumption. Florida, too, has been acquired since that time; and, round the shores of that peninsula, the fisheries, now carried on by Spaniards from the West Indies, promise to be as valuable, in proportion to their extent, as those of Newfoundland. Such is the opinion of General Jesup, formed in a two years' service in that quarter, and expressed in a letter which has been printed among our documents. All these fisheries consume salt—much salt—and all of it foreign, which has paid duty to the Government, and the cost of which is increased by the duty far beyond the amount of the duty itself. All these have the same claim to bounties and allowances with the Northeastern fisheries; and the postponement or denial of these claims cannot be expected if the allowances are continued to others. To the beef and pork trade, the cessation of the bounty on exportation, which they formerly enjoyed in lieu of a drawback of the salt duty, has been particularly injurious, and cannot be expected to continue in one case without being restored in the other. The first act that ever laid a duty on salt, (that of 1789,) and every subsequent one until 1807, gave the same bounty to the exporter of beef and pork which was granted to fish. The amount of the bounty was the duty paid on a bushel of salt for each barrel of beef or pork, which was the same that was allowed to a barrel of pickled and a quintal of dried fish. This continued until the repeal of the first salt tax, in 1807. Up to that time, the farmer and the fisherman were equally the object of all the bounty laws. At the revival of the salt tax, in 1813, they parted company—doubtless because the act was of a temporary character, and was constantly expected to terminate. It has not yet terminated, and the disadvantage to the farming interest has already been great. Of beef and pork, the exportation is greater now than of fish, consequently the bounty should be greater; yet these two products of agriculture receive nothing, while the fisheries annually receive $320,000. The total amount received by the fisheries since 1789, and much the largest portion of it since the revival of the salt duty in 1813, is about $7,000,000. Computed in bushels of salt, as this allowance is computed in the annual Treasury reports, and it amounts to near fifty millions of bushels! In other words, the fisheries have received 50,000,000 bushels of salt free of duty, while the farmers have not only paid duty on all that they consumed, but, in the West, have been subjected to the abuses of a heartless monopoly. The fisheries are now actually receiving a drawback which represents more than 3,000,000 bushels of free salt; while the farmers not only pay the duty, but, in consequence of the duty, are, in a large section of the Union, subjected to a heartless monopoly; and all this under a constitution which guaranties the equality of taxes, and under a Government where their own Representatives makes the laws! Such a state of things must cease. The farmers have a right to be restored to the bounties in lieu of drawback, which they formerly enjoyed; but as a general drawback of duty in favor of all consumers would be idle and absurd, as it would leave nobody to pay, the true remedy is, to make all even, in the first instance, by abolishing the tax; and thus sweeping away all claims and pretensions from all classes of consumers for any return of duty in any shape whatsoever."

4. The fourth of the peculiar effects which a salt tax produced on the article to which it applied, to which Mr. B. would advert, was in its pernicious influence over importations and prices. Duties upon other articles only affected importations and prices in some reasonable proportion to their own amount; but in the case of salt, this influence was out of all proportion to the quantum of the tax; and the reasons were these: In the first place, salt was seldom imported as an article of merchandise for profit, but merely for ballast; and to tax one species of ballast, was to discourage its introduction, and to cause another kind to be substituted. Thus, stones, and even heavy wood, were now used by many ships at a loss, which would prefer salt if free from duty. The other reason was, in its influence upon the price. Every body could see the price of the article in the seaport towns, and that it was usually forty or fifty cents a bushel; that is to say, three times the cost of Liverpool; five times the cost of West India; eight times the cost of Spanish and Portuguese; and ten to fifteen times the cost of the Mediterranean and Adriatic salt. This was an increase of price out of all proportion to the duty, resulting from its falling into the hands of intermediate dealers who advance the duty for the importer, engross the article, and then put up the price of the whole to the highest mark. Mr. B. said that Senators deceived themselves when they undertook to say the duty on salt being six cents a bushel, it only added six cents to the cost. This was a great error, and argued a want of practical information on the subject. All duties add more than their amount to the cost of the article. The seller must have his profit upon his whole outlay—upon the cost—the duty—and all the expenses. This was the case in all articles; but in respect of salt, the effect was what had been shown—an increase of price out of all proportion to the amount of the duty.

5. The drain of specie (Mr. B. said) was another of the peculiar evils of the salt trade in the West. It was there a ready money business, and a hard money business. All the testimony in the salt document, No. 196, proved this fact. All over the West, ready money, and hard money, or its equivalent, was exacted for salt. The credit system did not extend to it; nor did the barter system reach it. It could not be obtained, like other merchandise, on a credit of some months; nor in exchange for produce. Money in hand, and good money, was the word. The consequence was an immense drain upon the West for gold and silver, amounting to several millions of dollars per annum, and constituting one of the powerful causes which shake the banks and derange the currency of that region. If a free trade in salt was allowed, all this would be altered. Salt would be like any other foreign merchandise, purchasable for produce, and upon credit. New Orleans would become the great point of supply, and many Western farmers would there purchase for themselves and neighbors at first cost, and in exchange for their surplus products

6. Another of the peculiar reasons for suppressing this tax (Mr. Benton) was in its known tendency and effect to do infinitely more mischief to the community than good to the Treasury. By shutting the use and increasing the price of salt, it did an injury to agriculture infinitely beyond the amount of the tax. The national wealth, in the important branch of agriculture, was injured to the amount of many millions annually, in order that Government might receive a few hundred thousand dollars. This has been one of the enlightened objections to the tax in all countries; and was one of the effective arguments in causing its suppression in England about twenty years ago. The salt revenue then amounted to seven and a half millions of dollars per annum; and it was the opinion of practical farmers, and enlightened statesmen, that the annual injury to the country was far beyond that amount. Whatever the degree of injury might have been in England, I am free to declare it as my opinion, and that bottomed upon data, that it is far greater in the United States.

7. Again. The navigation of the West requires the addition of the salt importation. Our steamboats go down to New Orleans loaded, and with difficulty obtain return cargoes, and especially heavy articles for under cargo, and to serve as ballast. Salt is the identical article to answer their purpose; and if imported in the quantity which the country requires, and which the Gulf of Mexico is ready to supply, to say nothing of other sources, would supply more return freight than all other foreign articles put together. The present population and stock of the West would require an importation of four millions of bushels of salt, equal in weight to one hundred thousand tons; to be annually increased in all time to come.

8. Insufficiency of the supply is another of the peculiar reasons for the free admission of foreign salt. This insufficiency is attested by every witness where testimony has been read to the Senate. The stint is universal, and severe, all over the West; and while most severe there, it is also sensibly felt in other parts of the Union. The national supply of salt is insufficient; and this truth, felt and lamented by all consumers, is easily demonstrated upon authentic data. The Senate will pardon some details to elucidate a point so important: it will receive with indulgence some statements and calculations to establish a fact of such great national importance. I am of opinion that the supply of salt for the United States, taken as a whole, is not the one-third part of what it ought to be; taken sectionally, and for the valley of the Mississippi, and I am of opinion that it is not the one-fifth part of what it ought to be. These opinions are not crude conceptions, or wild guesses, formed without data, and utte ed without consideration; but they are the result of a careful examination into supply, the consumption, and the uses of salt in the United States, and in other countries, proper to be compared with our own, (England and France for example; and a comparison of the state of the supply in each. In this comparison the supply of the Union, and of the West especially, will be discovered to be lamentably deficient. In the salt document, No. 196, there is a statement of all the foreign salt imported, and of all the domestic salt made in the United States; they are authentic and official statements, and will be taken as the basis of my calculations. The foreign importation, for the year 1838, the last of which the returns are made up, is, in round numbers, seven millions of bushels; but these are custom-house bushels, one-third below less than real bushels; so that the actual importation is only 4,600,000 measured bushels. The domestic supply is nominally about the same with the importation, say seven millions of bushels; but in reality far less, for, while in New England, and on the Atlantic coast, the measured bushel prevails, and a bushel is a bushel; and while at the New York works 56 pounds of good inspected salt is allowed for a bushel; yet in all the West the bushel is counted at 50 pounds; and that subject to all the deductions which have been shown in the evidence, and which there reduce the simulated bushel in the case of Kanawha salt to about one peck. The evidence does not apply to other works, but there is doubtless some adulteration at all. With all these deductions, and making an average of the whole, the domestic supply of salt cannot exceed three and a half millions of measured bushels; making a total of about eight millions for the home and foreign supply put together. This being the supply, we will now look to the consumption and compare it with that of England, the fairest object of comparison, both for numbers of people, their stock, and the habits of the two countries Their population is nearly equal, but that of the United States, greatest; in stock, England exceeds us in the number, as well as in the value of sheep; is inferior to us in the number of swine, and may be pretty nearly even in horned cattle and horses, though I presume the number of each would be greatest in the United States. Such being the relative numbers of people and stock in the two countries, the next inquiry is into the quantity of salt consumed in England, first by people, and then by stock. The English economists compute the consumption of salt per head, for their whole population of 16 500 000 of souls, at 22 pounds each; which gives for the whole an aggregate of 363,000,000 millions of pounds, or 160,000 tons, or 6,400,000 custom-house bushels.* This, of course, included all that went into food of every kind. The salt for the stock in England, exclusive of swine, was computed at 22,000,000 of bushels, (custom-house measure.) The details of the computation may be seen in the salt document of the last session, No. 269. The stock was computed at 30,000 000 of sheep, 4 600,000 horned cattle, and 1,500,000 of horses, the few mules included. These two heads of consumption alone about double the nominal number of bushels consumed in the United States; still another large head of consumption is to be included, that of manufactures, and the arts. This is a great and increasing source of consumption both in the United States and in England: no less than fifty varieties of manufactures carried on in England, and most of hem in the United States, require the use of salt, either in its proper state, or as a chemical preparation; and this without counting two applications of the article, the use of which is now acquiring a prodigious extension; that of chrystalized soda† for washing, and frigorific mixtures for cooling or congealing fluids. This additional head of consumption being included—the quantity of salt used in England in manufactures, upon stock, and in human food—and the consumption there must more than double our nominal quantity of fourteen millions, and exceed three to one our actual quantity of 8 millions. This makes good my opinion that the supply of the United States, as a whole, is one third too little, assuming the English supply to be sufficient. But that is not admitted. The English supply was held to be insufficient; with the actual consumption which I have exhibited, and which was made in 1816, the supply was held to be insufficient; the country demanded larger supplies, and a free trade in the article; and in the year 1822, a free trade was granted it, the salt tax being entirely suppressed! Passing from the national to the sectional supply—from the whole Union, to the West—and Mr. B said, it was easy to see that the insufficiency was far greater there than in the Atlantic States, and far below the average of the whole. This was easily proved. Thus, of the seven millions of imported custom-house bushels, there was imported at New Orleans in 1838, and it was the largest importation ever made there, only 634,000 bushels; that is to say, not a tenth part; while the population of the West is a third part of the Union; and her due proportion would have been two millions of bushels. This is a deficiency of two thirds of her proportional part of this kind of salt. Of domestic salt, the nominal supply of the West, counting all the works on the Western waters, great and small, is about four millions of bushels; but these are fifty pound, and lick weight bushels, badly adulterated; six of which can be put into a three bushel barrel, and that without filling it!! The result of the whole is, that while the national supply of salt may be assumed to be one third too little, that of the West may be safely affirmed to be not one fifth part enough.

Such is the deficiency of salt in the United States, and especially in the great West. Such the stint of an article of the most indispensable use, and of the most universal consumption, and of which nature herself has prepared such an inexhaustible quantity. It is probable that salt is the most abundant substance of our globe—that it is more abundant than earth itself. Like other necessaries of life—like air, and water, and food—it is universally diffused, and inexhaustibly abundant. It is found in all climes, and in a great variety of forms. The waters hold it in solution; the earth contains it in solid masses. Every sea contains it. It is found in all the boundless oceans which surround and penetrate the earth, and through all their fathomless depths. Many inland seas, lakes, ponds, and pools, are impregnated with it. Streams of saline water, in innumerable places, emerging from the bowels of the earth, approach its surface, and either issue from it in perennial springs, or are easily reached by wells. In the depths of the earth itself it is found in solid masses of interminable extent. Thus inexhaustibly absndant, and universally diffused, the wisdom and goodness of Providence is further manifested in the cheapness and facility of the preparation of this necessary of life for the use of man. In all the warm lattudes, and especially between the tropics, nature herself performs the work. The beams of the sun evaporate the sea water in all the low and shallow reservoirs, where it is driven by the winds, or admitted by the art of man; and this evaporation leaves behind a deposite of pure salt, ready for use, and costing very little more than the labor of gathering it up. In the interior, and in the colder latitudes, artificial heat is substituted for the beams of the sun: the simplest process of boiling is resorted to; and where fuel is abundant, and especially coal, the preparation of this prime necessary is still cheap and easy; and from six to ten cents the real bushel may be considered as the ordinary cost of production. Such is the bountiful and cheap supply of this article, which a beneficent Providence has provided for us. The Supreme Ruler of the universe has done every thing to supply his creatures with it. Man, the fleeting shadow of an instant, invested with his little brief authority, has done much to deprive them of it. In all ages of the world, and in all countries, salt has been a subject, at different periods, of heavy taxation, and sometimes of individual or of Government monopoly; and precisely, because being an article that no man could do without, the Government was sure of its tax, and the monopolizer of his price. Almost all nations, in some period of their history, have suffered the separate or double infliction of a tax, and a monopoly on its

* In France, it was computed by Mr. Necker that the consumption of salt in those provinces, which had purchased an exemption from the gabelle (the salt Government monopoly laws) at 19½ pounds per head.

† Soda is a decomposition of salt: it is one of its component parts Salt is composed of muriatic acid and soda in the proportions of 53½ per centum of soda, and 46½ per centum of muriatic acid. It is easily decomposed into its two constituent parts by chemical process; and the separate parts, though no longer answering the purposes of salt, become useful in a great variety of manufactures, and in many household operations. Of these, hard soap and crystalized soda for washing, are among the most common. No hard soap is made without one of the component parts of salt; in washing, soda lessens the quantity of soap to be used on account of its greater causticity, and makes the soap more detergent. So that, in addition to all its other virtues, salt is the promoter of cleanliness, and furnishes the efficient agent in cleaning our persons and our clothes.

* Salt.—An English statue to prevent extortion in its sale, and to subject its price to the regulation of city and county authorities.

"And the lord mayor and aldermen of London, and the justices of the peace at their respective general sessions, may set and publish the price of salt to be sold or exposed to sale (and not intended for exportation) within their respective cities, counties and places, and may alter the same as they may see occasion; and the prices so set or altered are to be observed by every person selling or exposing salt for sale. And if any person shall sell any salt (except for exportation) at any higher price, or refuse to sell it at the price so fixed as aforesaid, he shall forfeit twenty pounds, to be levied by distress, by warrant of one justice; and, in default of sufficient distress such justice may imprison such offender until he pay the same, to be applied half to the King, and half to him who shall sue."—Act of George III. year 47 of his reign, chap 2, sec 143

salt; and, at some period, all have freed themselves from one, or both. At present, there remain but two countries which suffer both evils, our America, and the British East Indies. All others have got rid of the monopoly; many have got rid of the tax. Among others, the very country from which we copied it, and the one above all others least able to do without it. England, though loaded with debt, and taxed in every thing, is now free from the salt tax. Since 1822 it has been totally suppressed; and this necessary of life is now as free there as air and water. She even has a statute* to guard its price, and common law to prevent its monopoly.

This act was passed in 1807. The common law of England punishes all monopolizers, forestallers, and regraters. The Parliament, in 1807, took cognizance of a reported combination to raise the price of salt, and examined the manufacturers on oath. See Salt Document, No. 196.

Mr. B. said that a salt tax was not only politically, but morally wrong: it was a species of impiety. Salt stood alone amidst the productions of nature, without a rival or substitute, and the preserver and purifier of all things. Most nations had regarded it as a mystic and sacred substance. Among the heathen nations of antiquity, and with the Jews, it was used in the religious ceremony of the sacrifices; the head of the victim being sprinkled with salt and water before it was offered. Among the primitive Christians, it was the subject of Divine allusions, the symbol of purity, of incorruptibility, and of perpetuity. The disciples of Christ were called "the salt of the earth;" and no language, or metaphor, could have been more expressive of their character and mission, pure in themselves, and an antidote to moral, as salt was to material, corruption. Among the nations of the East salt always has been, and still is, the symbol of friendship, and the pledge of inviolable fidelity. He that has eaten another's salt has contracted towards his benefactor a sacred obligation; and cannot betray or injure him thereafter, without drawing upon himself (according to his religious belief) the certain effects of the Divine displeasure. While many nations have religiously regarded this substance, all have abhorred its taxation; and this sentiment, so universal, so profound, so inextinguishable in the human heart, is not to be overlooked by the legislator.

Mr. B. concluded his speech with declaring implacable war against this tax, with all its appurtenant abuses, of monopoly in one quarter of the Union, and of undue advantages in another. He denounced it as a tax upon the entire economy of NATURE and of ART—a tax upon man and upon beast—upon life and upon health—upon comfort and luxury—upon want and superfluity—upon food and upon raiment—on washing, and on cleanliness. He called it a heartless and tyrant tax, as inexorable as it was omnipotent and omnipresent; a tax which no economy could avoid—no poverty could shun—no privation escape—no cunning elude—no force resist—no dexterity avert—no curses repulse—no prayers could deprecate. It was a tax which invaded the entire dominion of human operations, falling with its greatest weight upon the most helpless, and the most meritorious; and depriving the nation of benefits infinitely transcending in value the amount of its own product. I devote myself, said Mr. B. to the extirpation of this odious tax, and its still more odious progeny—the salt monopoly of the West. I war against them while they exist, and I remain on this floor. Twelve years have passed away—two years more than the seige of Troy lasted—since I began this contest. Nothing disheartened by so many defeats, in so long a time, I prosecute the war with unabated vigor; and, relying upon the goodness of the cause, firmly calculate upon ultimate and final success.

SPEECH OF MR. STEENROD, OF VIRGINIA.

In the House of Representatives, April 17, 1840—In Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenditures of the Government for the year 1840.

Mr. STEENROD rose and said: Mr. Chairman: In rising to address the House at this time, it is not so much for the purpose of discussing the bill under consideration as to express my views upon the great questions which have been introduced into this debate. I cannot refrain, sir, from expressing my concurrence with my colleague [Mr. SAMUELS] in the opinion advanced by him a few days since, that the Congress of the United States are responsible to the nation for the expenditures of the Government, and not the Executive Department. While it is the duty of the President to recommend to Congress such measures as the public interest may require, it is the province and prerogative of the Legislative Department, as one of the co-ordinate branches of the Government, as the money appropriating department, to judge and act on the propriety of making each and every appropriation of money, and are responsible immediately to the people for the exercise of this power.

If this Government has become extravagant, the Legislative Department must alone be censured for it; and, if reform is desired in the expenditures of the Government, it must commence here, and not with the Executive, for "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law."

Mr. Chairman, the reform desired by the people of this country, is higher and broader, above and beyond, the questions examined and discussed a few days since, by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIDDINGS] and on yesterday by the honorable member from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] It is in advance of those questions; it is the reform that looks at the very heart and soul of our system of Government; the reform that looks to the restoration of the simple, but great features of the Constitution, and the advancement of the interests and rights of the great masses, as provided for in that compact. It is the reform recommended in the annual message of the Chief Magistrate, and in other state papers which have emanated from that distinguished public functionary; that of restoring the State Governments to their municipal authority, confining the Federal legislation to our foreign and external relations; collecting, keeping, and paying out the revenue, with a strict observance of the appropriate and conceded powers of the Government; and thus reduce that overgrown Executive patronage, that extravagance in the public expenditures, which are the spectres that haunt so continually the feverish imagination of certain gentlemen on this floor, and which are the consequences of Federal usurpation, the legitimate offspring of the Hamiltonian system. This reform is all that is required to restore the Government to its Republican character and destination, to the virtue and the wisdom thrown around it by our Revolutionary fathers, and our people to the enjoyment of the equal rights and freedom provided for in its compromises.

If I know myself, I am in favor of this reform. I say this in the sincerity of my heart. I believe the country is sick, and reduced to such an extreme condition as to require aid; reduced by unwise legislation; by a total departure from the fundamental provisions of the Constitution. The Government has been legislated into the hands of bankers and brokers, and reduced to a dependence on corporations, which assume to be alike at the defiance of law and public opinion. The trade, commerce, and measure of value, are all at the mercy of stockjobbers and gamesters, and the revenues of the Government placed beyond the control and management of both the officers of the Government, and the representatives of the people.

What has reduced the country to this extremity? What will arrest the tendency of these untoward events? These are the important subjects which now invite discussion, and should engage our consideration.

The money power, sir, is dangerous in every free Government. By the framers of our system of government, it was placed above and beyond the abuse of the rulers and the ruled. The extent of the power conferred on the Federal Government was, the power "to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coins." This conferred little or no patronage or power on either the Government or its officers. Each and both were left unencumbered and unarmed with that power, which has been claimed for the Government by some to regulate the monetary concerns of the entire country. But the State and Federal Governments, by aiming at the exercise of that power which was obviously withheld and reserved by and to the people, have rendered nugatory and void this beautiful feature of our wise and free system of Government—the Federal Government, by chartering a Bank of the United States, and the State Governments, by enacting prohibitory laws against the employment of individual credit, and chartering a swarm of corporations, with privileges and monopolies denied to private citizens—with the power to withdraw from circulation the precious metals—to hoard them up—and to issue thereon a paper circulation, that is nearly the exclusive exchangeable measure of value of the labor and property of the entire country. Thus conferring upon an an association of incorporated, irresponsible bankers, who claim to be entrenched behind their charters, and above and beyond the reach of the will of the people, the power—the absolute power—to control the prices; thereby to control the subject-matter, the trade, the labor, the property, of the entire country. In obedience to the promptings of caprice, contracting the circulation, depreciating the prices of all property, and reducing the wages of labor; then, again, according to the instinct of interest, expanding the circulation, appreciating the prices of property, with an uncertain and unstable value. As one time, administering the intoxicating dreamt of wealth and power; and then again reducing the deluded followers to beggary and want.

Mr. Chairman, are these the rights of property that are secured to us by our system of government? Are these the equal rights achieved by and guarantied to us by our gallant ancestry in the Revolution? Is this the freedom that is vouchsafed to the American people by the Constitution? No, sir; if the framers of our Government divided its powers into legislative, judicial, and executive departments, between the Federal and State Governments, to avoid the concentration of power in the hands of the few—if they absolved this people from the entails, primogeniture, and the privileged order of the Governments of the old world, in their devotion to popular supremacy and popular rights, it was not to confer these privileges, this monopoly, and this power, on a moneyed aristocracy, or a legislative American nobility? No, sir! To this condition was this free people and country reduced by unwise legislation—by a departure from the Constitution. What then was the course, the action of the Democratic party—the party that embosomed the principles of the people—that impersonated the idea of the age and our institutions? To restore the Constitution, to return again to its wisdom and virtue. This was the tendency and the aim of the measures that marked and distinguished the administration of President Jackson. The charter of the Bank of the United States was doomed to expire, and the institution to close its career. The standard of value of the precious metals, which had been debased, was reinstated and restored. Mints were established, and furnished with bullion "to coin money," and supply the country with precious metals as a circulating medium; and the revenue power of the Federal Government was employed to limit the circulation of notes by the State banking institutions, and thus to enlarge and increase the specie basis, and gradually to restore the country to a sound, uniform measure of value. Is it the policy of the Republican party which causes the alternate distress and prosperity to which this country is so often subject? Is it this policy of the present Administration that justly subjects it to the charge of being the cause of these evils? No, sir; it is the departure from the great fundamental principles of our Government, the induction of this powerful element, the use, the perilous employment of the paper system, that exerts this fluctuating and destroying influence on the fortunes of the country.

Now, sir, permit me to fortify this position by the testimony of one who will be accredited by nearly all who are opposed to this opinion; and who, in 1819, was appointed one of the committee "to examine into the proceeding of the Bank of the United States, with directions to report thereon:"

one who has been selected by a great party in this country as the candidate for the second office within the gift of the people: one who might be supposed to be the exemplar of the opinions and principles of this party—no other personage than Governor Tyler, of Virginia. What did he say on this subject, in a speech delivered in the House of Representatives on the 6th of April, in the year 1819, when the report referred to was under consideration? He said:

"There remains now but one branch of inquiry with those who do not think the creation of this corporation an unconstitutional act, viz: Is it expedident to direct a scire facias, or, in other words, to put down this corporation? I contend that it is. For one, I enter my protest against the banking system as conducted in this country—a system not to be supported by any correct principles of political economy; a gross delusion, the dream of a visionary—a system which has done more to corrupt he morals of a society than any thing else; which has introduced a struggle for wealth, instead of that honorable struggle which governs the actions of a patriot, and makes ambition virtue; which has made the husbandman spurn his cottage, and introduced a spirit at variance with the simplicity of our institutions. I call upon the warm advocates of banking now to surrender their errors. Shall I take them by the hand, and lead them through our cities? Bankruptcy meets us at every step; ruin stares us every where in the face. Shall I be told of the benefits arising to commerce from the contraction of capital? Away with the delusion. Experience has exposed its fallacy. True, for a moment, it has operated as a stimulus; but, like ardent spirit, it has produced activity and energy but for a moment: relaxation has followed, and the torpor of death has ensued. When you first open your bank, much bustle ensues: a factitious goddess, pretending to be wealth, stands at the door, inviting all to enter and receive accommodation; splendid palaces arise; the ocean is covered with sails: but some alteration in the state of the country takes place; and when the thoughtless adventurer, seated in the midst of his family, in the imaginary enjoyment of permanent security, sketches out to himself long and halcyon days, his prospects are overshadowed, and misery, ruin, and bankruptcy make their appearance in the form of bank curtailments. If this be true, and I appeal to the knowledge of all men for its truth, I demand to know if you can put down the system too soon. Can we too soon escape the dangers with which we are surrounded? I know I shall be told that, even if we put down this bank, the State banks will still exist. Even if true, the position is not a justifiable one. If the State Legislatures do not follow the example which we set them, we shall have acquitted ourselves of our duty. It is all that can be asked of us. But, sir, we actually possess the lever of Archimides, and have a foot of ground on which to rest it. Our revenue amounts to upward of $20,000,000 annually. Require a fourth, or even a sixth, to be paid in gold and silver—what would be the effect? The merchant would collect the notes of banks, and demand specie for them; and thus a test would be adopted by means of which to ascertain the solvency of each institution. The demand of specie thus produced would have the beneficial effect of introducing more of it into the country; for money is like every other article, and will find its way to the market where it is most wanting. The system might be enlarged gradually until your wishes should be consummated. I know the ground I occupy when I urge these considerations upon you. A man regardful alone of the fleeting and ephemeral popularity of the hour would hesitate impressing them upon you. But I should not hold myself entitled to your countenance, Mr. Chairman—to the countenance of honest men—or, what is still more important, the approbation of my conscience, if I could be operated on by such motives or fears. Pardon me for still further extending this inquiry. There are three parties interested in the question which we are called on to decide: the stockholder, the debtor, and the Government. I contend that it is to the interest of the honest stockholder to put down this bank."

Governor Tyler, then, the candidate of the Whig party, the acknowledged exponent and representative of the principles of this party, may "protest against the banking system," as then conducted in the country, as "a system not to be supported by any correct principles of political economy—a gross delusion, the dream of a visionary," as "a system which has done more to corrupt the morals of society than any thing else;" who may condemn the bank curtailment as the cause of "misery, ruin, and bankruptcy;" who may advance the doctrine that the Federal Government, "by means of collecting its revenue in gold and silver, would not only be a test to ascertain the solvent banks, but the beneficial effects of introducing more of it into the country." Governor Tyler can advance these opinions, and commend himself to the high and favorable consideration of his party; but when the Chief Magistrate of this Republic, whose duty it is to recommend such measures as the public interest may require, advances and recommends those principles, it is charged here as a most inexcusable and damning offence against the banks, and the Administration is denounced as endeavoring to reduce the wages of labor, and restore the country to an exclusive metallic currency.

[Mr. WISE here wished his colleague [Mr. S.] to inform him where he could find the speech referred to, and was understood to endorse it as containing sound Democratic principles.]

Mr. STEENROD congratulated his colleague on his conversion to those principles, and pronounced them the principles of the Republican party, and informed Mr. W. where he could find the speech referred to.

[Mr. WISE said he did not endorse these principles, and proceeded to define his opinions on the subject at some length. He said his former course would show that he had invariably condemned the banking system when it was excessive; and, if his colleague would refer to the Debates of Gales and Seaton, he would see that he had made a regular report against eighty or ninety of those institutions for excessive issue, and his party had gone with him. At the same time, he said he did not blame the banks for the causes under which we now labor, but he thought the policy of the Administration was much to blame, and referred to the removal of the deposites.]

Mr. S. resumed. I will, then, Mr. Chairman, oppose the opinions of my colleague [Mr. WISE] with another authority—a certain "wise man of the East," one who, it is whispered, is soon to be left in the other end if this Capitol as the prominent defender of the banking institutions of the country. Yes, sir, when that setting luminary that is now lingering in his leave, and awakening so many thrilling reminiscences of the past, when he promised to be the harbinger of a brighter and better day, and cheered the hearts and quickened the hopes of his numberless admirers; when this setting luminary shall repose his blazing axle in the cooling shade of his own beautiful Ashland, the gentleman whom I now quote from as authority, will not only be the star in the ascendant, but the pre-eminent champion of the banks and the bankers. It is the authority of the Senator from Massachusetts [the Hon. D. Webster.]

Mr. S. then read from Mr. Webster's speech of 1824, as follows:

"The paper system of England had certainly communicated an artificial value to property. It had encouraged speculation, and excited overtrading. When the shock, therefore, came, and this violent pressure for money acted at the same moment on the continent and in England, inflated and unnatural prices could be kept up no longer. A reduction took place, which has been estimated to have been at least equal to a fall of 30, if not 40 per cent. The depression was universal; and the change was felt in the United States severely, though not equally so in every part of them. There are those, I am aware, who maintain that the events to which I have alluded did not cause the great fall of prices; but that fall was natural and inevitable, from the previously existing state of things, the abundance of commodities, and the want of demand. But that would only prove that the effect was produced in another way, rather than by another cause. If these great and sudden calls for money did not reduce prices, but prices fell, as of themselves, to their natural state, still the result is the same; for we perceive that, after these new calls for money, prices could not be kept longer at their unnatural height.

"About the time of these foreign events, our own bank system underwent a change; and all these causes, in my view of the subject, concurred to produce the great shock which took place in our commercial cities, and through many parts of the country. The year 1819 was a year of numerous failures, and very considerable distress, and would have furnished far better grounds than exist at present for that gloomy representation of our condition which has been presented. Mr. Speaker has alluded to the strong inclination which exists, or has existed, in various parts of the country, to issue paper money, as a proof of great existing difficulties. I regard it rather as a very productive cause of those difficulties; and the committee will not fail to observe that there is, at this moment, much the loudest complaint of distress precisely where there has been the greatest attempt to relieve it by systems of paper credit. And, on the other hand, content, prosperity, and happiness, are most observable in those parts of the country, where there has been the least endeavor to administer relief by law. In truth, nothing is so baneful, so utterly ruinous to all true industry, as interfering with the legal value of money, or attempting to raise artificial standards to supply its place. Such remedies suit well the spirit of extravagant speculation, but they sap the very foundation of all honest acquisition."

This authority attributes the disasters of 1824, principally to the paper system, when this system may be said to have been in its most successful career. It had found a lodgement in the State and Federal Governments. The Bank of the United States and the State banks, were all in successful tide of operation. The banks then were not only the fiscal agents of the Government, their paper received and paid out for the public use and dues, and their paper nearly the exclusive measure of value, but my colleague will bear testimony that the then Administration was not charged with opposing them, or warring on their rights or interests. Still, at that favorable period, with all their advantages, this high authority shows that they signally failed in accomplishing the purposes for which they were instituted, and the great catastrophe entailed on the country by the inherent evils of the system.

But, sir, I invite my colleague to follow me to another era that has been referred to by him, and distinguished by the impress made on the age and the country by the paper system. I hold in my hand the report of Mr. Tyler of Virginia, from the Committee on Finance, who were instructed by resolutions of the Senate to investigate the affairs and conduct of the Bank of the United States.

I now, sir, invite the consideration of the House to the operations of the Bank, as developed in this report, during the memorable and distinguished years of 1833 and 1834; the period that is known in the history of this body as the panic session of Congress.

"On the 24th September, 1833, the board appointed a committee of seven members, to take into consideration what measures it is necessary and proper should be adopted on the part of this Bank, in consequence of the recent intimation that the Government deposites are to be removed. That committee recommended, and the Bank adopted, the following measures.

"1. To extend the regulation of the 13th August, as to the purchase of domestic bills at the five Western offices, to those of Burlington, Utica, Buffalo, Pittsburg, Natchez, and New Orleans.

"2. To limit the purchase of bills of exchange to those payable in the Atlantic cities, and in New Orleans and Mobile, not having more than ninety days to run.

"3. Increasing the rates of collection and purchase of bills of exchange, at the Bank and several offices, on different sections of the Union.

"4. To decline the receipt of notes of State banks, except such as are established in the same place with the office receiving them, and to collect the balances due from State banks.

"5. That all the balances due by distant State banks, be collected either in specie or in drafts on the Atlantic cities; and that such balances be not permitted to accumulate."

On the 8th of October, 1838, the board further decided and ordered a general and gradual reduction of the loans and discounts. The reduction made in obedience to this order, in October, was $5,825,906 74; and on the 23d of January, 1834, a reduction of $3,320,000 was further ordered by the board. It is alleged in the report, this order is made, not in consequence of the removal of the deposites, but of other expected acts of hostility on the part of the Executive. Thus the whole reduction ordered in less than four months amounted to $9,865,435 58.

The circulation of the bank, on the first day of October, 1833, was $19,128,189 57; which circulation was protected by $10,663,440 51 of specie; its demand on the State banks amounted to $2,238,573 10, which was, in fact, equivalent to specie.

In the two ensuing months from that day, there was due on domestic exchange $5,279,320 45; thus giving the Bank the resources at command to that extent.

Here, sir, you see an institution that is the child of the Government, commence an open antagonistical operation on its welfare, "in consequence [mark the language of the resolution on which these measures were founded] that the deposites of the Government are to be removed."

They whom the people had elected to conduct the affairs of this Government in the discharge of their high public duties, intimate that the deposites of the Government are to be removed from the Bank. This arouses the ire and awakens the displeasure of the nine bankers in the city of Philadelphia. They pass the order, and issue the belligerant fulmination; and mark the consequence on the welfare of the country—the ruin and desolation. The rates of the exchanges are deranged and increased, the notes of the State banks are discredited and depreciated, the State institutions are put under the enactment of paying out their specie; or the more ruinous requirement of meeting the balances with drafts on the Atlantic cities; while, to complete the catastrophe, the contraction of the circulation of nearly ten millions is ordered and effected in less than four months! This arrested the progress and prosperity of the country, prostrated its trade and commerce, suspended the steady and uniform pursuits of industry, and brought all to that solemn, deathlike pause, that was followed by successive failure on failure, extending and multiplying over the country, until our towns and cities seemed to have been sacked, and our country pillaged with the ravages of a relentless and destructive foe.

What causes actuated this policy? what produced this prostration of the great interests of the country? The resolutions adopted by the Bank on the 24th of September, and the report made to the board thereon, recommend and adopt their policy, "in consequence of the recent intimations that the deposites of the Government are to be removed." On the 11th of July, after the deposites had been removed, and Congress had adjourned without ordering the deposites to be restored to the Bank, the board of directors of the Bank adopted the following orders:

1. "That the instructions hitherto given for a reduction of the amount of bills discounted at the Bank and the several offices are hereby revoked; and that the line of bills discounted at the several offices shall, until the further order of this board, remain at its present amount.
2. "That if, in the judgment of the committee on the offices, any particular office should require an increase of its line of bills discounted, or domestic bills, or both, in order to relieve an existing pressure upon the community in which such office is situated, the committee is hereby authorized to direct such increase."

Those resolutions, abandoning the adopted policy of the Bank, suggested by the intimation that the deposites were to be removed—abandoned when the deposites were removed, and Congress had refused to order them to be restored—the reduction of $3,320,000 of the loans and discounts in January; which the report alleges and admits "was not in consequence of the removal of the deposites, but of other expected acts of hostility on the part of the Executive," neither there specified no referred to—the evident reduction of the loans and discounts of the Bank to what was unnecessary for the protection of the Bank, and unwarranted by the interest of the stockholders—all tend to awaken the suspicion of the presence of another active and prevailing principle, above and beyond the protection of the chartered interest and rights of the Bank. What is this principle? Let us examine further this report of John Tyler—the report of a committee, the majority of which were the partisan friends of the Bank. Here the awakened suspicions are strengthened by "confirmation strong as proofs of Holy Writ." The presence of this principle is developed, tangibly and visibly, the principle that originated, guided, and concluded, this drama-like movement of the Bank. Yes, sir, here on the 42d and 45 pages of this report, and the seventh scene through which this extenuating committee has conducted us, is the open development of the principle that induced this course of operation of the Bank: the Bank sought to usurp the place of the people, and give direction to the Government; to substitute its orders for the ballot box, and make its iron will supreme over the constituted authorities of the country. And here were the weapons by which this direct warfare was to be carried on; by which it was to acquire its supremacy over the country, not only by harassing the people into a compliance to it, but by pensioning the public press, and securing seats to its favorites on this floor. Where, then, is this evidence, and what does the report say? That the Bank made loans to members of this House, or other public functionaries, upon security which was insufficient; or, that it made voluntary donations of its funds to the members of Congress; or, that it had greatly multiplied its loans, and bestowed its favors on public men or partisan presses, pending political agitations, which involved in their results the existence of the Bank itself? No! Who would expect these loyal friends of the Bank to report this? But they report these startling facts: that, in the year 1834, fifty-two members of Congress were indebted to the Bank in the small sum of $238,586! These were the impartial judges who were to decide on the rights of this institution, and honestly represent the people of this country on the question that then divided the Bank and the people—the great question, the result of which involved the existence of the Bank and the liberties of the people. This report not only shows that fifty-two members of Congress were indebted to the institution in the sum of $238,586, but it reports the expenditure of the Bank as an open and avowed advocate in elections. The report says:

"The committee cannot leave this subject without expressing their decided opinion of the impolicy of the course pursued by the directors in having thus increased the expenses of the institution in the printing and distributing the speeches and many of the pamphlets and documents which are mentioned in the vouchers. The expense is believed to have been unnecessarily incurred. It would have been more judicious and wise to have left these publications to reach the country through the ordinary channels of communication. There would have existed no backwardness in the public press, or on the part of individuals, to spread information before the people, while its own attitude would have lost nothing in public estimation by the practice of more reserve.

"The augmented amount of expenditure in the years 1832 and 1834, over the preceding and intermediate years, taken in connection with the circumstance that, during those two years, important elections were to take place, subject it to the charge, whether well or ill founded, the Senate will determine, of a direct interference in elections, from which it should have most cautiously abstained, even in appearance."

Mr. Chairman, when it was rendered evident that the iron purpose of the President would remain unshaken and unmoved, above the price and beyond the power of the Bank; when its money had been wasted in vain on the virtue of our people; they had breasted the devastation, and the country had passed through its severe ordeal of distress and pillage; when this proud and powerful institution had been thus foiled in its aim of supremacy over the country, and in its treasonable purposes against the Government, it then issues its last order of relief, assumes the fiduciary character of regulating the currency, and relieving the distress of our people; and seeks to commend itself to the favor of an injured community by whispering that the curtailment of its loans and discounts, and the derangement of the exchanges, were caused by acts of Executive hostility.

This Bank policy and power is now secretly and powerfully at work in the country to perpetuate the abuses and effect the purposes which are developed in this report.

The appeal is made in this hall, to the people, to put down this Administration as the author of the derangement in the currency and the pecuniary distress in the country, and to instal in the Presidency a Bank candidate, as a panacea for these great evils.

The report I hold in my hand, from the Treasury Department, conclusively and incontestably proves the banks and the bankers to be guilty of what is here charged upon the Administration. In 1839, the banks had in circulation $135,170,995; at the present time, 1840, they have $106,968,572, showing a reduction in the circulation of the banks of $28,000,000. All will admit that the inevitable consequence of this curtailment of the currency, is a reduction of the prices of property, the wages of labor, and the pecuniary distress of the country. This, then, is sufficient for my purpose, to show the contraction in the circulation of the banks, and it is for the banks to demonstrate to the public that this is no inherent defect in the system. And, lest some sapient politician should charge this operation of the banks to the Administration, permit me here to add, that, during the past year, the notes of the specie-paying banks have been received for the public dues, and a large portion of the public moneys have been deposited in the banks, because no laws have, as yet, been enacted by Congress, ordering the public moneys to be otherwise deposited.

If the Administration was, then, to be driven from place, was to fall under the displeasure of the people, by groundless accusations like these, will not these gentlemen (with this conclusive proof fixing those charges on the banks) exclaim, "Put down these institutions!" Will not the culpability of these corporations be visited with the same disapprobation that was avowed against the Administration? No! the President of the people may be overwhelmed with charges like these; but fix the guilt on the banks. Then all is to be silenced under the persuasion of the great utility of the "paper system," and the accredited infallibility of bankers.

I have here, sir, a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made to the Senate on the 26th of February, 1838, transmitting statements of the rates of exchange and prices of bank notes at different periods. From that report, I quote the prices of bank notes at Philadelphia in the years 1827 and 1836: in the year 1827, for the Bank of the United States was then in the plenitude of its power; and the year 1836, for then the State banks were in full and successful operation. What, sir, does this evidence incontestably prove? with what character does it impress these regulators of the exchanges and currency?

The following is the table:

A table showing the highest and lowest price of bank notes at Philadelphia, in the year 1827 and 1836.

The notes of the banks of the six New England States, at Philadelphia, in 1827, under the existence of the Bank of the United States, ranged from one to two and a half per cent. discount. The notes of the same banks, at Philadelphia, in 1836, during the operation of State banks, ranged from three-fourths to one per cent. discount. The notes of the banks of Virginia, Maryland, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Louisiana, and Mississippi, at Philadelphia, in 1827, during the existence of the Bank of the United States, ranged from one-fourth to twenty-five per cent. discount. The banks of the same States, at the same place, in 1836, ranged from one-half to seven per cent. discount. The notes of the banks of Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, and Michigan, at Philadelphia, in 1827, ranged from three to forty per cent. discount. The State banks of the same States, at the same place, in 1836, ranged from two to six per cent. discount. What then, sir, does this table conclusively prove and show? that the State institutions have conducted the exchanges of the country on more favorable and better terms than the Bank of the United States, at the period here referred to.

If they have, then, on other occasions, conducted the exchanges of the country on these favorable terms, at reasonable rates, rates equivalent and corresponding to the cost of transporting from one point to another, this conclusively shows the ability of the State institutions thus successfully to conduct the exchanges. If these institutions are chartered and created for this and other public purposes, they are answerable for the present unprecedented derangement in the exchanges, and for their present high and unwarranted exactions and rates for that abuse of the system, by which they fail to discharge their public trust and meet the public exigencies.

These proud American bankers, who are encompassed around with their exclusive privileges, enthroned on their chartered monopoly, in the supreme enjoyment of their unlawful gains, and whose heartless policy is extorting the profits of trade and the earnings of industry, are the ones who go out with their accustomed complacency and unblushing effrontery, into the public places, and tell the people that these ills are the consequences of the unwise policy of the present Administration. Has the Administration abstracted from circulation the precious metals, sunk them in the dark recesses and subterranean vaults, and issued thereon a paper currency that was too base to circulate, and to subtile to hoard up? Has the Administration assumed the high trust of regulating the currency of the States of this great Union; then, in a huckstering spirit of gain, with the legerdemain of gamesters, debasing the currency and deranging the exchanges? Has the Administration at one time extended facilities for the enlargement of the circulating medium, raised the prices of property, and the wages of labor; and then, without any sufficient cause, curtailed those facilities, and involved the whole country in one common distress? Has the Administration collected large revenues of the people in gold and silver at the time of great public distress, exported it abroad to meet foreign engagements, while it sought legislative exemption from home and domestic responsibilities? No, sir. These are the misdemeanors that the American bankers have been again and again convicted of before the people; and still these are the ones who are now charging the offences, of which they alone are culpable, upon the Administration! Then, why is this? what is the design of these keen Crœsus-like money changers? Is it to elect a man to the Presidency because he is a military chieftain? Is it to elect a man to the Presidency because he is the candidate of the virtuous and laborious yeomanry of the log cabin? or is the bank power openly in the political field, with its candidate? Let us look at this, and see what the past, like a faithful monitor, unfolds to us.

When the popular party in this country, on another occasion, united their support of a military candidate for the Presidency, and opposed that candidate to an Administration that had come into power against the express will of the people, and whose continuance in power was, of course, a disparagement to popular rights—in this struggle between power and liberty, of life and death—in this popular effort to restore the rights of man and Democratic freedom, and put down an Administration that was not only a usurpation, but whose continuance in place was a bold and reckless defiance to popular supremacy, by what arguments were the people then opposed? what language was then whispered in their ears? how then were their apprehensions to be wrought on to allay the increasing indignation, and to alienate them from their beloved principles? The people were then told by one with authority in the land, that "the candidate, however illustrious and successful he may be, must present some other title than laurels, however gloriously gathered on the blood-stained field;" that it was better to "visit our favored land with wars, with pestilence, and with famine, with any scourge other than military rule, or a blind and heedless enthusiasm for mere military renown;" that, as "a friend of liberty and the permanence of our institutions, he could not consent, at that early stage of their existence, by contributing to the election of a military chieftain." These, then, were the patriotic declamations of the day, worthy to be proclaimed from the proud rallying points of the party by the commandant, whose accustomed orders never failed to precipitate his marshalled forces to any one single point. These principles were recorded in the decalogue of the party—they were their settled principles of action.

At a meeting held at the capital of my own State by the citizens of Richmond in 1827, to express their disapprobation of the election of General Jackson to the Presidency, the meeting said:

"In the general constitution of things the military principle seemed designed by fate to be the irreconcileable foe and destroyer of liberty. The liberties of Greece fell before Alexander, those of Rome before Sylla and Cæsar, of England before Cromwell, of France before Bonaparte. Why, fellow-citizens, should be not profit by the example of those celebrated unfortunate States? Why should we, by the election of a citizen as our ruler, whose claims are derived exclusively by the sword, sanction the principle that military is greater than civil merit?"

What, sir, do we now witness? What change came o'er the spirit of the dream? At the National Convention recently held by this same heretofore anti-military party, for the purpose of nominating a candidate for President and Vice President, two out of the three candidates presented before this convention for nomination were men whose claims were founded exclusively on their military services; and one of these was the nominee, and is now the candidate, of this party for President. How does this heretofore anti-military party receive this nomination? With their former fears and distrust of a military chieftain? with their former shadowy apprehensions as to military rule? No, sir. Every Federal Whig journal, from the Aroostook to the Sabine, raises the military chieftain's blazonry, and wings forth, to an admiring and enthusiastic party, the praises of the military candidate for President; while here, the partisan statesman reviews the orders of the commandant, the line of march, the forces, the tent, and the field, to prove their candidate to be a military chieftain of unblushing fame and pre-eminent renown. The cavalcade of your proud merchants and rich bankers thickens on the view of the observer, crowds the field of engagement; and, with the innumerable crowd of their liveried clerks, their court-like placemen and dependants, swell the retinue, and extends the long lines of the followers of the military chieftain.

Why have these proud and ambitious ones been brought to support and follow a military chieftain as their candidate, to enter their public and humiliating recantation of their former avowed party principles? Did the late illustrious Administration of General Jackson, in its implacable hostility to undue power, privilege and monopoly, propitiate this party to the support of a military chieftain? No, sir. Before the influence of popular rights, they had been made to tremble in their strongholds of wealth and power, awakened to a sense of the insecurity of a continuance of their privilege and monopoly They have been taught that they must look beyond their charters for a continuance of their power, and to the people as the great arbiters and sovereigns of the age. And while, as men, they have at last been brought to acknowledge the political equality of man, as culprits they have been made alike to court and fear the omnipotence of the popular will. In this great metropolis, your proud merchants and rich bankers, fresh from their palaces, clothed with their chartered privileges, and gorgeous with the inherent hauteur and costly equipage of their order, have paraded through the streets the log cabin; and, in their midnight revelry, drank the hard cider, under the delusive belief that such unaccustomed condescension in them as to taste this homely beverage, and pay this apparent respect to the humble abodes of our yeomanry, would command their support for their candidate, and induce this gallant yeomanry to believe that the candidates of that party impersonated their humble virtues. How vain is all this pageantry and show! how fruitless will prove their efforts to thus impose on this people! What! General W. H. Harrison and Governor Tyler impersonate the principles of this people! General Harrison, who, in the Legislature of Ohio, voted for a law requiring the sale of poor men, "for the non-payment of a fine and cost, as a servant;" and which authorized to be instituted, between such purchaser and prisoner, the relation of master and servant; and John Tyler, who, in the Virginia Convention, voted for a law placing the rights of property above the rights of persons, denied to the "housekeepers and heads of families" of the log cabin the dearest rights of freemen—the right of suffrage. These are the candidates who are paraded before the country as the log-cabin candidates. While the nine hundred banks, with their stockholders, officers, and dependants, as partisans of these candidates, are openly, in the political field, struggling for the maintenance of the privilege and monopoly of the paper system, the control of the State and Federal Governments, the use of the revenues of the Government to bank upon; while they are supporting these candidates for privilege against right, for power over liberty, the people are to be hoodwinked, and support this candidate for his military services as the candidate of the log cabin.

Here is the secret of this newborn love for the military chieftain and log-cabin candidate by those bankers. These are the candidates who have sustained the rights of property as paramount to the rights of persons; the candidates whose principles are to be found in the rich jewelled coffers of the bankers, and not in the humble abodes of the log-cabin. These, then, are the candidates whom this people are called to support.

Who here is so credulous as to believe that they could be induced to do this; to venture on this perilous course; to not only abandon but assist in overthrowing an Administration which had been brought into power by their voice and suffrage; which had been true and constant to the public interest; which had been distinguished for its strict and unflinching support of popular rights; which had perilled its existence, its all, in defence of the rights of the people and the country, against the organized warfare of an overgrown moneyed power, aiming at supremacy over the people and the constituted authorities of the land? This patriotic, gallant, and just people, abandon an Administration like this! And for what? To commit the guidance of their public affairs to an unknown hand, to venture upon an uncertain sea, where all is involved in one impenetrable night, in a silent and forbidden mystery? For General Harrison's confidential committee have said, in a letter to the public, "the policy is, that the General make no further declaration of his principles for the public while occupying his present position."

A people who have been educated in a school which was founded on the principles of a free, open, daylight proceeding; whose love of right and liberty had been quickened by the luminous emission of light from the free and open legislation and adjudication of our form of Government—a people who had been taught to believe that the freedom of speech and of the press secured the right to discuss the claims of candidates for public places, in the newspapers and on the hustings, and that these were the elements of our freedom, the pre-eminent constituents of our system of Government; that they were established by our Revolutionary fathers as the highest prerogative of every American citizen, as the safest bulwark of freedom, are now told, in this age and country, that they are to be hoodwinked, and that one who is a candidate before them for their suffrages for the highest office within their gift, declines to make any further "declaration of his principles for the public while occupying his present position."

What should every American freeman respond to this? Perish the paper that would invade this time honored usage of our country; reproach the one that would dare to destroy it; and tell the General's confidential committee that all that can commend any public man to high and favorable consideration in this age, are principles which, like our own beloved freedom, invites discussion, eagle like, bask in the public eye, and rise above all serpent-like concealment.

All, then, that we are permitted to know of the opinions and principles of General Harrison, is what we may be able to learn and to collect from his past life. How inconclusive is this means of information to the public, and how opposing and irreconcileable are the opinions of the candidates of this party with each other on all the great questions which have divided the two great political schools in this country! On the subject of a National Bank, domestic slavery, tariff, the doctrines of the proclamation, internal improvement by the General Government, General Harrison and John Tyler, the candidates for President and Vice President, stand committed before the country with opposing principles, and antagonistical opinions on these measures, of so much moment to the people, and which have so long divided the two great parties under this Government. If this be so, who, then, can tell what are the principles of this party, what the measures which will distinguish their Administration? None; if the opinions I now read be the opinions of these candidates.

General Harrison, in reply to the letter of Sherrod Williams, said:

"The question, then, for me to answer is, whether, under the circumstances you state, if elected to the office of President, I would sign an act to charter another Bank. I answer, I would, if it were clearly ascertained that the public interest, in relation to the collection and disbursement of the revenue, would materially suffer without one, and there were unequivocal manifestations of public opinion in its favor."

Gov. Tyler said, in a speech delivered in the House of Representatives on the discussion of the report made in relation to the Bank of the United States, in 1819:

"Inasmuch as I believe the creation of this corporation to be unconstitutional, I cannot, without violation of my oath, hesitate to repair this breach thus made in the Constitution, when an opportunity presents itself of doing so, without violating the public faith. Believing, also, that it is expedient to put it down."

Gen. Harrison, in his speech at Cheviot, on the 4th of July, 1833, says:

"Should I be asked if there is no way by which the General Government can aid the cause of emancipation, I answer that it has long been an object near my heart to see the whole of its surplus revenue appropriated to that object. With the sanction of the States holding the slaves, there appears to me to be no constitutional objection to its being thus applied, embracing not only the colonization of those that may be otherwise freed, but the purchase of the freedom of others."

Gov. Tyler, in his report on Slavery in the District of Columbia, says:

"So far as the question of slavery exists in the several States, the committee abstain from any remark. It is a question to be decided by each, severally, and for itself. Over it Congress has no control. The plain recognitions of the fundamental law on which the Union rests, should place it forever at repose. To discuss it in Congress, or to agitate it in the States where it does not exist, produces no good, can be followed up by no act, and serves no other purpose than to irritate the public mind."

General Harrison is the advocate of a protective tariff. He not only uniformly voted for it in Congress, but, in allusion to a remark made by Mr. Garnett, that the effects of the political quackery of the tariff "had been to cover the streets of Norfolk with grass," General Harrison, after insisting on the benefits of the tariff, added:

"It may be asked whether, under any circumstances, I would be willing to abandon the tariff. I answer, without any hesitation, in the affirmative. Whenever the streets of Norfolk and Charleston shall be covered with grass, and our Southern friends find no market for their produce, and this state of things can be distinctly traced to the tariff, I would then instantly give my voice for its modification or entire repeal; even if I should still think that its continuance would be beneficial to a majority of the American people."

Governor Tyler not only uniformly voted against a protective tariff, but in a speech delivered in Gloucester county, Virginia, in the year 1833, referring to his course as one of the Senators of Virginia on the proclamation, says:

"The line of my conduct as the Representative of a State that had twice pronounced, in a solemn form, the tariff laws to be unconstitutional, was, according to my conception, clearly marked out. To the demand for swords and bayonets, and cannon and muskets, and armed men, to collect an unjust and unconstitutional tax, I had but one reply: do justice; repeal or modify your obnoxious laws: yield to the wishes of the whole South; do that for South Carolina and the other Southern States which England has refused to do for Ireland; repeal your tythe system, imposed not for the benefit of the parson, but the manufacturer. * * * The war-cry was in the breeze, and an unjust and unconstitutional and oppressive system was to be cemented and strengthened by the blood of freemen, and the destruction of a State."

General Harrison favored the doctrines of the proclamation, as defended by Daniel Webster. He said:

"I recommend to you, however, the proclamation of the President of the United States, issued on the 10th December last, and the speeches of Mr. Webster, delivered in the Senate of the United States, at the last session of Congress, in answer to the arguments of Mr. Calhoun, as containing the most eloquent and satisfactory exposition of those principles that have recently been published. By issuing that proclamation, I think General Jackson has rendered service to his country of greater magnitude than his splendid victory at New Orleans."

Governor Tyler, at a public entertainment given to him in Gloucester county, Virginia, in 1833, on being toasted, pronounced an ardent State Rights and anti-proclamation speech. He said:

"The alien and sedition laws are universally held as odious; and yet what were they in comparison with this? Some four or five citizens were imprisoned, and lawlessly and unconstitutionally imprisoned, under the perversion of a single clause in the Constitution. But this self-doctrine changes the whole instrument, alters its entire character, and turns to scorn the resolutions of this State, adopted in 1798, '99, threatens consolidation, and employs the whole naval and military force of the country to accomplish it."

General Harrison is the advocate of a system of internal improvement by the Federal Government, and affirms the constitutional power to accomplish the same.

To sustain this fact, (which I have never heard denied by any one,) I beg leave to refer you to his votes upon that subject, upon certain resolutions introduced into Congress in 1818:

"1*st resolution.* That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to appropriate money for the construction of post roads, military and other roads, and of canals, and for the improvement of water courses." [Upon this resolution, the vote stood—ayes 31, noes 85, General Harrison voting in the affirmative.]

"2*d resolution.* That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to construct post roads and military roads, provided that private property be not taken for public uses, without just compensation." [Upon this resolution the vote stood—ayes 82, noes 84, General Harrison voting in the affirmative.]

"3*d resolution.* That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to construct roads and canals necessary for commerce between the States, provided that private property be not taken for public uses, without just compensation." [Upon this resolution the vote stood—ayes 71, noes 85, General Harrison voting in the affirmative.]

"4th resolution. That Congress has power, under the Constitution, to construct canals for military purposes, provided that no private property be taken for any such purpose, without just compensation being made therefor." [Upon this resolution the vote stood—ayes 31, noes 83, General Harrison still voting in the affirmative.]

Mr. Tyler, on the 15th of May, 1830, when the subscription of stock in the Maysville turnpike road was under consideration in the Senate, said:

"I was in that Congress which was the first to enter gravely into the discussion of the constitutional power of this Government to make roads and canals. I then attentively weighed all that was urged by the advocates of the system—if system that may be called which is now—and my decision was against them. Every subsequent reflection has confirmed the opinion then expressed, and the experience of the last six years has satisfied me that, in its exercise, all that is dear, and should be considered sacred in our institutions, is put to hazard. Experience is the parent of true wisdom; and the lights which she has furnished upon this subject, ought to be bright enough to conduct our footsteps back to the path from which we have strayed. Can any man say in what this system is to end? Formerly, it was held to be national. I have no such words in my political vocabulary. It is in vain that gentlemen represent to me the benefits of the system. It is in vain I am told of its being a harmless policy. Show me the grant in the Constitution in plain terms, not extorted by a forced interpretation; and not until then will I listen to you."

General Harrison supported the administrations of the elder and younger Adams. Governor Tyler opposed both.

These, then, are the principles of the nominees of the Harrisburg Convention, the candidates of the Whig party, constituted to be alike acceptable to tariff and anti-tariff, internal improvement and anti-internal improvement, Bank and and anti Bank, slavery and anti-slavery men, framed with candidates who will be acceptable to the blue light Federalist or the renegade Republican, ready and willing to adopt any expedient at the sacrifice of any principle that will conduct them to office, and to expel from place an Administration that exists by the will of the people, and which is founded on the acknowledgment of popular rights and Democratic freedom. After General Harrison had supported and favored a protective tariff, a system of internal improvement by the Federal Government, the Webster exposition of the proclamation, and all those high-toned Federal measures which we have been taught, in Virginia, to believe were dangerous to public liberty; after he had supported the administration of the elder and younger Adams, all and each of which Governor Tyler had opdosed, as adverse to the spirit of our free institutions and the public good, what now do we witness? Governor Tyler not only placed on the same ticket with General Harrison, but, in his letter accepting of the nomination, attempting to smuggle him into the Presidency, to cheat the people, by endorsing him as a Republican, and to impose him on his fellow-citizens as one of the followers of Jefferson.

I rejoice that it is the acknowledged privilege of the American people to pass upon the claims of these men. I congratulate my countrymen that it is their prerogative to control and determine the principles which shall distinguish and mark the destiny of our common country. If their gallant ancestry passed through the fire and smoke of battle, the want and distress of the Revolution, in resistance to a twopence tax on tea, because it was in disparagement of popular supremacy, can it be supposed that they will tamely submit to the extortions and oppressions of an irresponsible association of bankers and brokers; that they will give continuance to their power, by electing their candidates to the highest offices within the gift of a free people? No! Never. They will cling to the principles that were canonized by the blood of their fathers, that are sanctified by the divine presence of freedom.

SPEECH OF MR. ATHERTON,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

In the House of Representatives, April 23 and 24, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the bill to provide for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government.

Mr. ATHERTON said: Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the committee, it is my design to trouble them with a few suggestions which may not, I trust, be considered entirely inapplicable to the bill under consideration. Although the range of debate which has been suffered would seem to admit the introduction of almost any topic, much of what I shall have to say will so far be connected with the subject before us, as to relate to the expenditures of the Government, and the denunciations indulged in by gentlemen of the Opposition, concerning office holders and Executive patronage. It is my intention, also, to allude in this connection to some of the principles which distinguished the great contending parties of the country. In the early stage of this debate, attempts were made to compare the ordinary expenses of this and of the late Administrations, disadvantageously with those of other Administrations. These attacks were met, and most ably and triumphantly repelled by my friend, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. The gentleman from North Carolina, [General McKAY,] who has to-day addressed the committee, has also shown how much, during this and the late Administrations, the burdens on the people have been diminished. Nothing that I could pretend to urge, could add any thing to the force of the views introduced by them. When I come to speak directly on the subject of expenditures, I will, therefore, endeavor to view it in another aspect.

First, however, permit me to notice some remarks which have been made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SALTONSTALL.] That gentleman, replying to that part of the speech of his colleague which showed him to have been one of the members of the Massachusetts Legislature, which got up the Hartford Convention, and one of the committee which recommended that convention, stated that in 1823 or 1824, the Federal party was disbanded in Massachusetts. And he went on to say that then there was no further necessity for keeping the party together; that while Napoleon was proceeding on his career of conquest there was much ground of alarm; but that after the battle of Waterloo, and the triumph of British arms, the reasons for keeping up the old parties ceased. Now, sir, I beg to be understood that I have a high personal respect for the gentleman from Massachusetts. I accord to my political opponents on this floor credit for the same honesty of intention which I claim for myself; and notwithstanding the expression in the first part of the gentleman's speech of his design to disappoint his colleague, who might, perhaps, expect him to go into a defence of the Hartford Convention, by "taking a course which would defend himself and his political friends," I could not but respect the manly feeling which afterwards prompted him, disregarding all considerations of expediency, to pronounce that convention innocent in its intention, and to vindicate the associates with whom he had acted, and the principles he had long cherished. But does not the gentleman recollect that in 1823 there was one of the most violent contests which ever took place in Massachusetts, and in which the line between the Federal and Democratic parties was most clearly defined—that between Eustis and Otis? It is true the Federalists were defeated in that struggle, and it may not have been for their interest since to keep up the names of parties. For what objects, to what purpose, was that contest? Was there no principle involved? A long time had elapsed after the battle of Waterloo, which the gentleman from Massachusetts refers to as superseding the necessity of keeping together the Federal party. Was it British influence, and regard for British success, that alone could keep together that party? Does he not (involuntarily, no doubt) do injustice to his friends? They had, and still have, principles in relation to Government for which to contend. In those principles I never have agreed with them, and never shall; but I am far from believing that those principles, prepossessions, and feelings, or even the prejudices growing out of them, could be at once eradicated from the human bosom. The gentleman from Massachusetts who spoke yesterday, [Mr. REED,] has referred to a remark of a French philosopher, "that names are things." In this I cannot concur, so far as to admit that, by changing names alone, things can be changed. Mr. Jefferson's authority is sometimes referred to here, even by gentlemen of the Opposition. In a letter to Mr. Livingston, dated April 4, 1824, he says: "You will find, I suppose, on revisiting our maritime States, the names of things more changed than the things themselves; that, though our old opponents have given up their appellation, they have not, in assuming ours, abandoned their views, and that they are as strong nearly as they ever were." In Tucker's Life of Jefferson, it is said that in a letter to Mr. Giles, written in 1825, after the first message of Mr. Adams, "he suggests that, though the course of attack of the Federal party is now changed, the principles remain the same." They now look "to a single and splendid Government of an aristocracy founded on banks and other moneyed corporations, which would be to them the next best blessing to the monarchy of their first aim, and perhaps the surest stepping stone to it." To test the question whether the principles and feelings of the Federal party were, all at once, so wonderfully abandoned, let us recur to what Benjamin Russell, the veteran Editor of the Columbian Sentinel, said on the occasion of the defeat of Mr. Livingston of Louisiana, as candidate for Congress during the time, I believe, of the administration of the younger Adams. Though I have not seen the extract for some years, I think I can quote it correctly in substance. It was to the following effect: "Long Ned, as Cobbett used to call Livingston, is undoubtedly consigned to the tomb of all the Capulets. It may seem ungenerous immoderately to exult in the fall of the man, but when we reflect that he is an old sinner, and that he is receiving punishment for the backslidings of thirty years, we may safely say he falls 'unwept, unhonored.'"

And I could not but notice that the gentleman from Massachusetts advanced the idea that "a Federalist turned Democrat was the worst of all" politicians. So, sir, it does, after all, require something of a change to make a Democrat out of a Federalist. Nor did this seem very consistent with another idea, advanced both by the gentleman and his colleague, that the principal measures of General Jackson's administration were so ultra-Federal that even Hamilton and John Adams would not have dared to approve them. Thus it would appear that, when a man ceases to be a Federalist and turns Democrat, he becomes more Federal than John Adams and Hamilton themselves! This is what I cannot precisely comprehend.

Among several other distinguished members of the Federal party alluded to by him, the gentleman from Massachusetts paid a feeling tribute to the moral worth of Mr. William Sullivan, in which I certainly have no occasion to differ from him. But to show that every thing like party was done away after the period referred to by him, he went on to say that Mr. Sullivan "retired from public life, and devoted himself to the human race," in preparing for the instruction of the young such books as the Political Class Book and the Moral Class Book. Without stopping to inquire whether the tendency of these books may not be to instil into the tender mind what many of us would consider erroneous views of popular principles and public men—there is another production of Mr. Sullivan to which the gentleman forgot to advert. I refer to a work of his written as late as 1834, entitled Familiar Letters on Public Characters, from which I beg leave to read a few extracts. In this work Mr. Sullivan says that "Jefferson has by his example and opinions done more than any other man to mislead and pervert his fellow citizens." He also says, "On this day, March 20, 1834, there is not the least doubt that a large majority of the American people are disgusted and astonished by the usurpations of Andrew Jackson" He sneeringly calls Andrew Jackson the "genuine man of the people," and speaks of him as having a "head and heart not better than Thomas Jefferson had, but freed from the inconveniences of that gentleman's constitutional timidity." In endeavoring to rouse the public against this Andrew Jackson, who has a "head and heart not better than Thomas Jefferson had," he further says: "We have a formidable adversary to contend with—the President, Vice-President, the cabinet proper, and the cabinet improper." For the source of this latter epithet, which is marked as a quotation, an asterisk refers us to the bottom of the page, and then we read—"See Mr. Webster's speech, delivered at Worcester." Here are, also, two more extracts:

"One who goes over from the Opposition to the Jackson ranks, feels that he has a defence to make; while one who abandons Jacksonism holds his head up, and feels that he has done an act for which he may respect himself. Thus, in politics, as in morals, there is a sense of right and wrong which men are alive to, whether they admit its influence or not. There are few Jackson men in the United States, (who can pretend to good sense and sound principle,) who do not feel a degree of shame that they are such."

"It was common, thirty years ago, to charge Mr. Jefferson with deliberate wickedness in his office, and to consider him as intending to disregard all the obligations which honorable, moral men acknowledge. This was probably an injustice. It is more reasonable to suppose that he had either a singular obliquity of perception as to right and wrong, both as a man and as an officer, or that he had undergone some strange perversion from that rank of moral agents to which he was by nature destined."

The editor of the Boston Courier, a leading modern Whig editor, in his newspaper of May 9, 1834, in commenting on this work of Mr. Sullivan, observes:

"General Jackson is acting on the principle of Jefferson, and is carrying out the patriotic doctrine of that arch Jacobin to its fullest extent. We are not of the party who worship the dead or the living idol. The principles and the administration of Mr. Jefferson have done more to torment this nation than all the plagues described in the Apocalypse could do, if inflicted at one blow."

Such extracts as these are not very convincing arguments to support the idea that the Federal party has been disbanded, and Federal principles abandoned!

In closing this train of remark, I will merely observe that, if it be true, as has been said, "that hypocrisy is the homage which vice pays to virtue," the frequent assumptions, by those opposed to us, of the names which have distinguished the Democratic party, are an involuntary homage rendered, if not not to the superior truth, at least to the superior popularity, of our principles.

The gentleman from Massachusetts who sits on my left, [Mr. CUSHING,] in his speech on the Treasury Note bill, expressed an opinion that "parties were in the crisis of a change." In my belief, sir, the parties contending in this country have fundamental principles which distinguish them, and though men may change, principles do not. If the gentleman will refer to his very extensive acquaintance with history, he will find that in nearly all nations, perhaps in all, where there has been a sufficient degree of liberty to allow of parties at all, there have been two great parties, the prominent characteristics of which are, that one has been for placing more, and the other less, power in the hands of the people. One has been for special privileges; for orders and distinctions not founded on merit; for offices transmitted by hereditary succession, or for life; the other for extending more equal rights to all individuals, and for granting to merit, in whatever station found, a free and untramelled course. With a greater degree of liberty than that enjoyed by other States, this country could not prove an exception to this rule; thus, before the time of Jefferson and Hamilton, and especially since, the same elements have here been in operation, producing their distinct and well marked developments.

One party is the party of prescription and precedent; the other recognises the truth of the maxim, that "power is always stealing from the many to the few," and considers a frequent "recurrence to fundamental principles" essential to the preservation of popular rights. One clings to accustomed abuses which constantly increase with increasing age; the other is the party of advance, of progress, and reform. One party strives to place power in the hands of those irresponsible to the people, and holds that the representative ought not to be "palsied by the will of his constituents;" the other finds in the people the only true and legitimate source of all political power. The principles of one are founded on distrust of the virtue and intelligence of the people. Their doctrine is "that the people are changeful and turbulent and seldom act or determine right"—that when the laboring "class becomes numerous, it becomes clamorous and looks on property as its lawful prey and plunder,"* and they hold that "it is the part of wisdom to found Government on property." The other has confidence in the virtue and intelligence of the people and dreads "the anti-Republican tendencies of associated wealth." They cannot shut their eyes to the fact that, to a certain extent, wealth itself is power; and they believe that, without the aid of special privilege, it will, unless counteracted by constant vigilance on the part of the mass of the community, secure an undue and corrupting influence. The maxim of one is to legislate for property—of the other to take care of the people, or, rather, to let the people take care of themselves, by their free and unrestrained suffrages, by choosing their own rulers—by placing power in the hands of persons by them elected and to them responsible.

I have said that the creed of one is founded in distrust, of the other, in confidence in the people. The former constantly lose sight of the fact that the people contend for principles. They find themselves vanquished again and again in their struggles for power; they imagine some magical secret has been operating against them; that the people are carried away by loud huzzas, by shouts in favor of a military chieftain, or by some cant phrase, and that they are like "mere machines," blindly led or blindly driven. And it often happens that the leaders of this party seek, as they suppose, in the most artful manner, to gain the favor, while they secretly attempt to thwart the wishes of the people. But in all these attempts their fundamental error reigns—their contempt for the intelligence of that people. When defeated, they lament over the superior popularity of their opponents, and advise each other to "descend into the forum and take the voters by the hand." I could imagine that they might even become so presumptuous as to endeavor to recommend a person as fit to be elected to the Presidential chair, by the suffrages of a free, virtuous, and discerning people, because, as they might truly or falsely allege, he lived in a log cabin, drank large quantities of hard cider, and smoked a short pipe.

Sir, in my belief, there cannot be an assembly of the intelligent and industrious working classes collected in any part of the nation, but would consider, and properly consider, the recommendation of a person to their suffrages for the first office in their gift in this great Republic, by such arguments as these, an insult to their understandings. They would inquire,

"What are these things to us? Inform us as to the principles of your candidate. What is it to us if in times past he either performed or neglected his duty in any military trust he may have undertaken, or whether he resigned that trust before the war was finished? We wish to know the principles by which he would be guided in administering the office for which he is proposed as a candidate, which office is instituted not for his benefit but for ours. Did he support the Administration of the elder and younger Mr. Adams? Is he in favor of a corrupting and splendid scheme of internal improvement by the General Government—a scheme to be supported by a tax on the consumer, and which thus benefits the capitalist and speculator, and grinds down the poor? Is he for raising a large revenue by taxation, and insulting those who are obliged to pay it, by calling it protection? Is he in favor of a vast controlling moneyed corporation, which shall rule at will all the prices and business of the country, and press down the people with the crushing tyranny of irresponsible power?

*Mr. Webster in the Massachusetts Convention.

We have been contending for years with such a power; and think you, by these clamors, to delude us into the support of one whose success would lose us all the fruits of our toilsome struggle, and place the iron heel of such a despotism forever on our necks?"

These are some of the questions sir, which they would ask, and he who should undertake to reply by senseless cant or shallow jests, or empty huzzas, would only excite their scorn and indignation.

In entering on some remarks concerning the charge which has been so often heretofore repeated against this Administration of extravagant expenditures, suffer me to advert for a moment to certain observations which fell from the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. COSHING] on that subject. It was a source of satisfaction to perceive, that instead of conceiving the advantage in those attacks to be altogether on the side of the Opposition, the gentleman from Massachusetts apparently felt himself called upon to enter into a defence of his own friends from the charge of having more uniformly voted for large appropriations than their opponents. And it certainly did appear to me that the course of the gentleman's argument went entirely to relieve the Executive and his friends, to say the least, from all responsibility on that subject which did not equally rest on the Opposition. He remarked that of forty appropriation bills the yeas and nays in the House were only called on six; that this was a proof of general assent, and that the Administration party were thus equally responsible with the Opposition. The reverse of the proposition must be also true. He went on to say, that on the bill making appropriation for Indian hostilities there were only two negatives; on that for Indian treaties and arrearages, there was a majority of both parties in favor of it; and that as to the bills for the Cumberland road, and harbors, and lighthouses, the friends of the Administration, if they had constituted a quorum, would have defeated them, and the Opposition, if they had constituted a quorum, would have passed them. And he observed, that on these latter "there was more responsibility resting with the Opposition than the Adminirtration party," and he was willing to take his share of that superior responsibility. To say nothing of the sources from which the various propositions for appropriations have come, which were not adopted, is not here a full admission that the Administration and its friends cannot justly be charged by the Opposition with larger and wasteful appropriations? The gentleman from Massachusetts also suggested that the great measure of the Opposition was the passage of the deposite or distribution bill, and that it might perhaps have been the policy of some of the leading minds of the Administration party opposed to that bill, to increase the appropriations, in order to reduce the balance for distribution. With my views of the utter inexpediency, and corrupting, and dangerous tendency of such a measure, if any thing could afford an excuse for extravagant appropriations, it would be a desire to prevent its adoption. But is it not pertinent to inquire whether the party who favor what is miscalled the "American system" have not struggled to increase expenditures, for the purpose of rendering inevitable their darling object, a high tariff, by which money may be drawn from the pockets of the many to subserve the selfish ends, and increase the gains of a few?

It is however, sir, in relation to the principles of the contending parties that I desire mainly to discuss this topic. I say, and it will be my object to prove, that the principles of the Whig party must necessarily lead to extravagance, while those of the Democratic party lead to a rigid economy. They certainly are not like those of their opponents, incompatible with it. A strict construction of the Constitution, which is a fundamental article of the Democratic creed, must, of necessity, by limiting the powers, also limit the expenses of the General Government. To all the other expenses of Government the Whigs desire to add a distribution of the proceeds of the public lands, which must increase, in that ratio, the burdens of the people. And to what effect? That the money taken from the people may be distributed among corporations and capitalists. The principle of Democracy is that no more should be raised in revenue than is essential to defray the indispensable expenses of the Government, and that money is safest left in the pockets of the people. The great and leading measure recommended by the Administration, the Independent Treasury, is a measure of economy. It is obvious to all, that if banks are to be made depositories, it is for the interest of all connected with them to have as much money raised by taxation as possible, in order to swell the amount of deposites. By restraining the tendency to excessive importations, its effect will also be to repress that extravagance which grows out of sudden expansions. These, however, are subjects on which time does not permit me to enlarge. I will read a few extracts from official documents when the Opposition were in power, to show their huge admiration of economy. First, here is an extract from the inaugural address as President, of the venerable gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS,] who is so distinguished and able a champion in the ranks of the Whig party:

"It is that (internal improvement) from which I am convinced that the unborn millions of our posterity, who are, in future ages, to people this continent, will derive their most fervent gratitude to the founders of the Union; that in which the beneficial action of its Government will be most deeply felt and acknowledged. The magnificence and splendor of their public works are among the imperishable glories of the ancient Republics. The roads and aqueducts of Rome have been the admiration of all after ages, and have survived thousands of years after all her conquests have been swallowed up in despotism, or become the spoil of barbarians."

Now, sir, it is one of the doctrines of the Democratic party that the General Government has not the power, and if it had, that it would not be expedient to exercise the power of erecting these monuments of "splendor and magnificence." A rich and magnificent Government is necessarily connected with an oppressed and suffering people from whom, at last, have to be wrung the means of these imperishable glories, which are to survive after the people are overwhelmed in despotism, and spoiled by barbarians. What was it in the ancient Republics to the populace, that after ages were to marvel over the ruins of a magnificence growing out of their wrongs? It could have afforded them little consolation even to have been fully aware that their present suffering was to serve the high purpose of gratifying the curiosity of posterity.

Permit me also to offer to the notice of the committee a few extracts from the first annual message of Mr. Adams:

"Upon this first occasion of addressing the Legislature of the Union, with which I have been honored, in presenting to their view the execution, so far as it has been effected, of the measures sanctioned by them, for promoting the internal improvement of our country, I cannot close the communication without recommending to their calm and persevering consideration, the general principle in a more enlarged extent."

This recommendation of the general principle in a more enlarged extent was after the mention, in the same message, of the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury had subscribed, "in the name and for the use of the United States, for one thousand five hundred shares of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company," and that the work was "in successful progress"—that the surveys were completed for ascertaining the practicability of a canal from Chesapeake bay to Ohio river, and also for "two other objects of national importance," viz: "the accomplishment of a national road from this city to New Orleans, and ascertaining the practicability of uniting the waters of Lake Memphremagog with Connecticut river."

The message also contains the following passage:

"Connected with the establishment of an university, or separate from it, might be undertaken the erection of an Astronomical Observatory, with provision for an astronomer, to be in constant attendance of observation upon the phenomena of the Heavens, and for the periodical publication of his observations. It is with no feeling of pride as an American, that the remark may be made, that on the comparatively small territorial surface of Europe, there are existing upwards of one hundred and thirty of these light-houses of the skies, while throughout the whole American hemisphere, there is not one. If we reflect a moment upon the discoveries which, in the last four centuries, have been made in the physical constitution of the universe by the means of these buildings, and of observers stationed in them, shall we doubt of their usefulness to every nation? And while scarcely a year passes over our head without bringing some new astronomical discovery to light, which we must fain receive at second hand from Europe, are we not cutting ourselves off from the means of returning light for light, while we have neither observatory nor observer upon one half of the globe, and the earth revolves in perpetual darkness to our unsearching eyes."

In speaking of the powers of the General Government, the message advances these sentiments:

"But if the power to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever, over the District of Columbia; if the power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States; if the power to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes; to fix the standard of weights and measures; to establish post offices and post roads; to declare war; to raise and support armies; to provide and maintain a navy; to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory and other property belonging to the United States; and to make all laws which shall seem necessary and proper for carrying these powers into execution: if these powers, and others enumerated in the Constitution, may be effectually brought into action by laws promoting the improvement of agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, the cultivation and encouragement of the mechanic and elegant arts, the advancement of literature and the progress of the sciences, ornamental and profound; to refrain from exercising them for the benefit of the people themselves, would be to hide in the earth the talent committed to our charge—would be treachery to the most sacred of trusts.

"The spirit of improvement is abroad on the earth. It stimulates the heart, and sharpens the faculties, not of our fellow-citizens alone, but of the nations of Europe and of their rulers. While dwelling with pleasing satisfaction upon the superior excellence of our political institutions, let us not be unmindful that liberty is power; that the nation blessed with the largest portion of liberty must, in proportion to its numbers, be the most powerful nation upon earth; and that the tenure of power by man is, in the moral purposes of his Creater, upon condition that it shall be exercised to ends of beneficence, to improve the condition of himself and his fellow men. While foreign nations, less blessed with that freedom, which is power, than ourselves, are advancing with gigantic strides in the career of public improvement, were we to slumber in indolence, or fold up our arms, and proclaim to the world that we are palsied by the will of our constituents, would it not be to cast away the bounties of Providence, and doom ourselves to perpetual inferiority?"

It is somewhat remarkable that gentlemen who supported such a latitudinarian construction of the Constitution, and such visionary and extravagant projects, and gentlemen who favor a candidate for the Presidency, who gave his assent and support to such doctrines and such schemes, have the boldness to say any thing about economy. Why, sir, of all plans of the most unlimited, lavish, and wasteful extravagance, was there ever any thing conceived of more alarming than these by which the money of the people was to be squandered abroad by a great central and tyrannical power, which had usurped and swallowed up the rights of the States and the people? It is to defeat such schemes, and to prevent the accession of one to the Presidency who supported that Administration and its doctrines, and who has never abandoned those doctrines, that the Democratic party contend. But, it may be asked, why were not the expenditures of that Administration greater, if their doctrines were such as would necessarily lead to extravagance? The reply is obvious. The Democratic party who opposed that Administration, prevented those doctrines from being carried into execution. In the first two years of that Administration, the Opposition was strong enough to prevent these projects from being adopted, and, in its last two years, the Administration was confessedly in a minority in Congress. The best proof possible of this, is the fact that the projects were not executed. A national university was not built, a national observatory was not erected, nor a national astronomer appointed, to be "in constant attendance of observation on the phenomena of the heavens;" the waters of the Chesapeake and Ohio, and of the Lake Memphremagog, and the Connecticut, were not united; nor was a great national road built from Washington to New Orleans, to vie in "magnificence and splendor" with the public works of Roman grandeur. I repeat, sir, the prevention of these undertakings is to be attributed to the principles of the Democratic party, which principles that party still entertain, and are striving to maintain and carry out. Suppose Mr. Van Buren were to introduce into one of his messages doctrines and recommendations like those which have been alluded to, would it be considered a proof of his love for economy?. What are we to think of professions of economy, and of a regard to the rights of the States, coming from the lips of those who bring forward for the office of President an individual who gave his full, unqualified, and hearty support to an Administration maintaining such doctrines, and who, it is not pretended, has altered his opinion on any of these subjects?

We have heard, on this floor, many denunciations of the late and present Administration, because of their too strict construction of the Constitution in relation to internal improvements by the General Government. Nor do these come from Northern gentlemen alone. A leading member of the Opposition, one of the Representatives from Maryland, in a speech delivered by him in February, 1839, referred to the "overthrow of internal improvements," as one of the chief evils of Gen. Jackson's administration. My friend from North Carolina, [Gen. McKAY,] has exhibited this matter in its proper light, and referred to the vetoes of President Jackson on the bills subscribing for stock in the Washington Turnpike Road Company, and in the Louisville and Portland Canal Company, and for erecting light-houses, and improving harbors, and especially to the veto on the Maysville Road bill, by which projects of extravagance were stopped which were already on foot, involving an expenditure of over one hundred millions of dollars. The gentleman from Maine, [Mr. EVANS,] perceiving the force of this view, and endeavoring to avoid it, asked how it was known that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] would not have made a similar exercise of the veto power on the Maysville road bill. When my friend from North Carolina rose, and said the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] was present, and could answer for himself; the gentleman from Maine avoided that issue. The gentleman from Maine further remarked, that he hardly thought, on account of the many similar projects, General Jackson could have done any thing else than veto it. These remarks certainly struck me with some surprise. The gentleman from Maine, and his political friends generally, voted for the bill, even after the veto of the President. Not only so; but let any one read the debates on that occasion, and the most unsparing denunciations will be found showered by the Opposition on the President, for his refusal to sign that bill. Nor were these denunciations confined to this House, but they were echoed and re-echoed by the Opposition presses through the land. Besides, we have just heard the most unsparing attacks on the late President for his tyrannical exercise of the veto power. It certainly seems to me that the gentleman from Maine, in his eagerness to escape from the force of the remarks of my friend from North Carolina, has fully overthrown the arguments adduced by his friends from Massachusetts, [Messrs. REED and SALTONSTALL,] in relation to the abuse of that power by the late President. No, sir: no sophistry can evade the fact that to the Democratic party and to General Jackson is due the credit of arresting the projects which received the countenance and support of the Opposition, involving the most monstrous extravagance. Let the principles of the administration of Mr. Adams be adopted and carried out, and there can be no limit even imagined, where expenditures would cease. Yet unfavorable contrasts have been attempted to be drawn between the expenditures of this Administration and those of Mr. Adams's, and the comparison has even been carried back to the administration of Mr. Adams the elder. I remember a toast formerly given by Josiah Quincy, a most distinguished member of the Opposition, "that those who fell with the first would rise with the second Adams." As these periods of our history seem to present to gentlemen of the Opposition their beau ideal of administrations, perhaps we may soon hear it announced that "those who fell with the first and second Adams shall rise with the hero of Tippecanoe."

Having thus contrasted the principles of the great contending parties in this country in relation to the expenditures of the General Government, I now ask the attention of the committee to some observations tending to show which of these parties is most favorable to popular liberty and popular rights. What is the distinction between an Aristocracy and a Democracy? It is that between irresponsible and responsible power. In an Aristocracy (and by that I mean not the government of the best, as the word in its derivation implies, but, more properly, oligarchy, or a government of a few) power is in the hands of those who are not responsible to the mass of the community; while in a Democratic Government power is placed by the people in the hands of those elected by and responsible to them. And just so far as a party strives to place power in the hands of those not selected by the people, and contends against responsibity to the people, just so far the designs of that party tend towards an Aristocracy. Now, sir, I maintain that the distinguishing characteristics of the parties are these: that the Democratic party are in favor of responsible and the Opposition party of irresponsible power. Before proceeding to more direct illustrations of this idea, I will advert for a moment to the manner in which those holding office under the people are spoken of by the Opposition. They are spoken of as a body of men separate from the people, and Government is treated as something distinct from the people. This appears to be a leading and cherished notion of the Opposition, and it seems to me to furnish a key to their ideas of Government. Who are the officeholders under Government? They are persons either selected by the people or appointed by those selected by the people for that purpose.

For as was well observed by my friend from Missouri, the other day, the theory of our Government is, that the people are the source of all power. Not only have we heard denunciations against those holding office, but we have seen attempts to disfranchise them and prevent them from exercising the commonest rights of citizens.

The gentleman from Tennesseee, [Mr. BELL,] March 7, 1838, from a select committe, reported a bill entitled an "Act to secure the freedom of elections," in which is the following clause:

"Be it enacted, etc. That from and after the first day of July next, no officer, agent, or contractor, or any other person holding any office or employment of trust or profit under the Constitution and laws of the United States, shall, by the contribution of money or other valuable thing, or by the use of the franking privilege, or the abuse of any other official privilege or function, or by threats and menaces, or IN ANY OTHER MANNER, INTERMEDDLE with the election of any member or members of either house of Congress, or of the President or Vice President of the United States, or of the Governor or other officer of any State, or of any member or members of the Legislature of any State; and every such officer or other person offending therein, shall be held to be guilty of a high misdemeanor; and upon conviction in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, shall pay a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars; and any officer other than the President, Vice President, and judges of the courts of the United States, so convicted, shall be thereupon removed from office, and shall be ever after incapable of holding any office or place of trust under the authority of the United States."

The gentleman from Tennessee, this session, in his speech on introducing a bill of a similar nature, spoke of Mr. CRITTENDEN's celebrated bill, which was so effectually exposed in the Senate, and which has so decidedly received the condemnation of the people, as one, the principle of which he approved, but which was unfortunately worded. It is difficult for me to conceive of words of more comprehensive and tyrannical import than those in the foregoing extract. "OR IN ANY OTHER MANNER INTERMEDDLE!" If a man be appointed to an office by one selected by the people for that purpose, he is an officer of the people, holding his appointment if not directly, still indirectly, from them. Because a man is trusted by those whom the people trust, is he, therefore, to have the brand of disgrace burnt deep into his forehead? Is he to be deprived of the right of speaking and writing his sentiments like his other fellow-citizens? The gentleman from Tennessee remarked that, by his bill, in the common and ordinary walks of life, the persons therein mentioned might express their own opinions, but it was "going out of their way" that was to be punished. How alarming the singular ambiguity of this explanation. If a person holding office abuses his official power, and neglects the duties of that office, no one would more earnestly desire his removal than myself. But does a person cease to be a freeman because he accepts an office in a free Government? If he has the ability and inclination, he has the same right to address his fellow-citizens; he has the same privilege to write and publish his ideas as other men. But by the principles of the bill referred to, if a person is so unfortunate as to have established a reputation which has drawn towards him the confidence of the people and their agents, though he might discourse with the eloquence of a Cicero on the subject of popular rights, his lips are to be shut in perpetual silence, and though he might write with a pen of light on those eternal truths dear to the hearts of freemen, the pen is to be stricken from his hand.

The collector of the port of Boston was denounced with great severity by the gentleman from Tennessee, and also by the gentlemen from Massachusetts, [Messrs. REED and SALTONSTALL.] And why? Because he had the audacity, on request, to deliver an address at Hartford! Are the freemen of this land to be denied the privilege of speaking and writing? What can be more insulting to the people than to proclaim that, because a person is deemed worthy of their confidence, he is therefore to be deprived of this privilege. Is it possible that, because persons are in office in a Government of the people, they are to be prohibited from expressing their sentiments? Or is it the popular sentiments themselves that are to be proscribed. Sir, the gentleman who has been thus denounced has done much to exalt and adorn the literature of the country; and his History of the United States, should he live to complete it, will form a monument to his fame as durable as the language in which it is written. And never can I consent to the doctrine, that because he holds an office, he is to be branded with disgrace, if he is willing to devote the enthusiastic energies of his philosophical and highly cultivated mind to the advancement of popular rights, and the illustration of those political principles which concern so nearly the good of his fellow-citizens. Let me refer to one or two passages from the address at Hartford, and see whether the sentiments are such that the people should be debarred from hearing or reading them. In speaking of the propriety of giving political power to the whole of the community instead of any fraction thereof, the author thus speaks of the fraction of the wealthy:

"Now, to every rich man there are two things: first, he is a man: as such, Democracy respects him and gives him equal rights. Next is his wealth; but wealth is blind. It cannot reason and it cannot feel. The money-bag has neither heart nor mind. The love of riches is a base passion. If Government is surrendered to it, then the question will be, what will be said of this measure by the speculators in real estate? What will be thought of it by the bears and bulls in the stock market. Therefore Democracy rejects the Government of wealth. She insists on putting the question not to note-shavers and money-makers, not to those who are rich and are struggling to grow richer, but to conscience and to mind."

In speaking of "tendency to improvement" as one of the characteristics of Democracy, the following language is used:

"This constant hope of progress is denounced by our opponents as destructive of present institutions—a war against the past. But, in truth, Democracy is not destructive; she makes no war on the past; she plans no overthrow of the present. On the contrary, she garners up, and bears along with her all the truths that past generations have discovered; she will not let go one single idea, not one principle, not one truth. She has an honest lineage; she is, under God's providence, the lawful offspring of advancing humanity, and she claims as her rightful inheritance, the glorious inventions, the rich discoveries of the past. But Democracy does not, like the Egyptians, embalm the dead; she does not bear along with her decayed institutions, errors that have inflicted on themselves their own death blow. She leaves the self-styled conservative to stagger along under the accumulated superstitions and wasting structures of past centuries, to totter under the piles of charters that have expired, of contracts that have been broken; and she herself keeps on in her course, having for her companions all the noble institutions which rest, self sustained, in their own integrity; and for the guarantee of her success, the natural immortality of truth, and the ever active providence of God."

Though gentlemen might not agree in these sentiments, is there any thing in them so objectionable that it should be considered a crime to send them forth to the community? Suppose there were a contest going on between a vast moneyed corporation or a combination of banks and the people, have not the bank presidents, bank directors and stockholders, cashiers and clerks, the same privileges as other citizens? Do they not exercise the right of speaking and writing on political subjects, and "in any other manner intermeddling" in elections? There is no sin in this! But if an officer in the Government of the people dares to exercise the rights of a freeman, he is to be proscribed! When such a contest as that referred to is raging, such a bill, passed into a law, would deserve no better name than that of a sedition law of the banks. I have said that the aim of the Opposition seems to be to denounce those trusted with office by the people, as a body of men distinct from the people. How different is the manner in which these favorite and cherished institutions, the banks, are regarded. In the last Congress a gentleman from Virginia exclaimed: "What are banks but institutions of the people?" A leading member of the Opposition, then a Representative from Maryland, said, "banks are combinations of the people," and characterized the war of the banks against the Government as "the war of the lamb against the wolf." The able champion of the Opposition, then representing in part the State of Mississippi, contended, with his usual boldness, that "the banks were the people." Lest this may seem almost incredible, let me refer to chapter and verse. My friend from South Carolina, [Mr. RHETT,] in a speech, delivered June 25, 1838, commented on the position of the gentleman from Mississippi, that the banks were the people, with his usual stringency and force, and "Mr. Prentiss rose and said that when he maintained that the banks were the people, he did not mean that they were so on account of the number immediately interested in them as stockholders, or the amount of capital invested in their stock, but because their currency was in the hands of the people, and thus their interests became the interests of the people."

In pursuing the inquiry which party contends for irresponsible power, and consequently is most averse to popular rights, I now ask leave to present a few extracts from a speech of the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] delivered December 26, 1838, commenting on the message of Mr. Van Buren of that session.

"Among the most prominent dangers to which our form of Government is exposed, the President here enumerates 'the anti-Republican tendencies of associated wealth.' I suppose [said Mr. B.] it will be said that he refers to the association of capital accumulated in the State banks; but in the opinion of the community generally, this language will warrant a more extensive application; an application far more operative, and demanding more serious reflection."

Again, in relation to the same subject, the gentleman from Tennessee proceeds:

"But, Mr. Chairman, if I correctly understand the import of the passage now under consideration, it manifests a laxity of principle, a recklessness of consequences; such a spirit of desperation in the choice of means to sustain power as ought to receive the severest reprehension from every well wisher to our free institutions. This covert denunciation of wealth and of the rich is, without doubt, intended to be understood by those whom it pleases, as a proof that the author of it is a friend and a champion of the poor as distinguished from the rich. Viewing it in this light, it is a sort of argument; an electioneering cant, which, however shameful and indefensible, may be allowed in the public speeches of ordinary candidates for a seat in the Legislature, or for some office or station in a State, or even for a seat in this Hall of the Representatives of the nation; but in a Chief Magistrate it is wholly unworthy and detestable."

Now, sir, where is the great harm in the passage thus severely denounced. Let any say whether the tendencies of associated wealth are not anti-Republican. If the passage be true, is it criminal for a Chief Magistrate to be its author? Is it not a most alarming fact for the people of this country, and demanding their most "serious reflection," that the passage in the message of their President, which calls forth the most severe reprehension and denunciation of the leaders of the Opposition party on this floor, is that where the President ventures to speak of the "anti-Republican tendencies of associated wealth!"

In commenting on that part of the Message in which the President speaks of each successive change in our institutions having contributed to extend the right of suffrage, and increased the direct influence of the mass of the community," the gentleman from Tennessee used the following language:

"I content myself, for the present, by repeating that the mass of the people have, for years, been DEGRADED TO THE RANK OF MERE MACHINES in the hands of a few men who have had the talent and address to use them for their own purposes."

The gentleman from Tennessee also selected for his strictures the following sentiments of the message:

"This review of the results of our institutions for half a century, without exciting a spirit of vain exultation, should serve to impress upon us the great principles from which they spring—constant and direct supervision by the people over every public measure."

"Now, sir, (said Mr. BELL) I should be pleased to be informed what is meant by 'constant and direct supervision of the people,' which is here enumerated as one of the great principles to which we are indebted to the glorious results of our system? Will some gentleman, who is better acquainted with the sentiments of the President on this subject, enlighten me? Will he tell me what is the true import of the language, "constant and direct supervision by the people?" Is it intended by this passage in the message, and the other doctrines which are more or less openly inculcated, to give the high official sanction of the Chief Magistrate of the Union to the new impulse which has recently been given, or sought to be given to what are called the Democratic tendencies of our system?"

Time only permits me to read one more extract from the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee:

"In another part of the message we are assured by the President that 'To this practical operation of our institutions (which he had described) so evident and successful, we owe that increased attachment to them, which is among the most cheering exhibitions of popular sentiment.'

"I deny [said Mr. B.] most confidently and emphatically that we are authorized to boast of this 'increased attachment' to our institutions. On the contrary, I affirm that, for years, the attachment of the people to our institutions, and their confidence in their efficacy and durability have been weakening and diminishing, just in proportion as the principles and practices of the party in power have been more and more developed and brought to light. I affirm that instead of increased attachment, there is manifestly increased distrust; and thousands of honest and intelligent citizens throughout the land, look with apprehension and dread to the future—that future which may come sooner upon us than you or I now dream of."

Without stopping to inquire how consistent the charge of a design to give new impulse to the Democratic tendencies of our system may be with the allegation that the people are "mere machines," is there not furnished, by these extracts, matter of apprehension and alarm to a people jealous of their rights? What are the passages of the message selected, emphasised, and italicised, for condemnation and denunciation by the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee? Those in which the President dares to speak of the "anti-Republican tendencies of associated wealth;" of "an increase of the direct influence of the mass of the community;" of "the constant and direct supervision by the people over every public measure;" and "of the increased attachment" to our free institutions. I ask again, whether the fact alone that these passages have been selected for severe and unmitigated reprehension, is not full of significance; and whether it does not furnish ground of alarm to the community?

The assumption was also mentioned by the gentleman from Maryland, to whom I have alluded as among the chief enormities of the administration of General Jackson, that "the President was the representative of the American people, coequal with the legislative power, accountable to the people, and not to Congress, for his acts." And his indignation is equally aroused because a corollary was deduced from this that the elections being appeals to the people were to be interpreted as expositions of the public judgment in favor of the great representative chief." In the present debate, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] has severely condemned the principle that the President should "consider himself the representative of the popular will." Ought not the President elected by the people to be the representative of the popular will? Is he not accountable to the people? Are not the elections "appeals to the people?" To deny these things, it seems to me, is to strike at the very foundation of free institutions and popular rights. Why should the people elect the President unless he is to be the representative of their will? No, sir, the right of electing a President is not a barren mockery; nor is the President to exercise irresponsible power but that derived from the people.

The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JAMESON] referred to the present and ancient division of parties, and alluded to the fact that Hamilton supported, and Jefferson opposed, a Bank of the United States, and remarked that all the objections of Jefferson were now found to apply, and were confirmed by the test of experience. But the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. REED] objects to this as one of the dividing distinctions of parties, because certain members of the Democratic party, in times past, supported such an institution. Nothing can more strongly prove the truth of the assertion, that though men may change, principles do not, than the striking fact that now this great dividing line is drawn precisely as it was in the times of Jefferson and Hamilton. There is not, to my knowledge, one single friend of the Administration on this floor who supports an United States Bank. Can one individual he pointed out? No, sir, not one. By the Opposition, generally, a Bank of the United States is held out as their favorite remedy; their panacea, which is to cure the evils which they say afflict the country. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] very recently proclaimed that to a Bank of the United States we must come, and should come, at last. It has even been asserted here that such a Bank is "the best protector of our liberties against the encroachments of Executive power." An irresponsible moneyed corporation the safest protector against a President chosen by the people, and the representative of their will! I can only say that such a theory does not accord with my ideas of the protection of popular rights.

The endeavor to retain the exercise of the secret ballot by representatives who ought to be responsible to their constituents, presents another instance of fondness for irresponsible power. By examining the journal of the last session, the yeas and nays will show an almost exact party vote on the subject. The Whig party, as a party, voted against the open, responsible, viva voce vote. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. REED] has said that the vote by ballot is considered important to the people in giving their suffrages, to secure them from undue influence, and "that he is not for setting the representative above the people." Sir, would that the right of the people to exercise their right of suffrage by ballot, uninfluenced and unawed, were every where still further protected! The elector is accountable to no person for the manner in which he exercises his right: he is only accountable to his own conscience. But the representative is accountable, also, to his constituents. It is for the very reason that "the representative should not be placed above the people," that the people have a right to know how he votes. If any improper influence is exercised on him—if he is induced to betray the will of his constituents—let them know it, and apply the remedy. To permit him to give a secret, and, as it has been appropriately termed, a clandestine vote, is to destroy his responsibility to the people.

An extract from an English paper was read here a few days since, to show that, in the opinion of the English, Mr. Van Buren was getting to be quite anti-Republican. Whether praise from such a source should be a subject of gratulation, admits of doubt; and so, likewise, whether censure should be a reason of regret. But the Opposition, though they have assumed to themselves the title of Whigs, sometimes, with an inconsistency which betrays more of sincerity than of prudence, also assume the merit of being the Conservative party. This is the title in which the party in England most opposed to popular rights rejoices. And if a tendency towards many of the same doctrines as those held by English Conservatives can entitle the Opposition to the same appellation, I am willing to concede the propriety of its appropriation. Blackwood's Magazine is well known to be one of the principal organs of the English Conservative party—a journal distinguished for its fierce scorn and bitter denunciation of popular power and popular rights. But that the character of this journal may be fully appreciated, I will present a few illustrations, taken from its pages.

Of Lafayette, that journal uses the following language:

"If George III had been King of France, the whole tribe of the philosophers, the atheist politicians, the club orators, the heroes of the tocsin, would have been peopling the antipodes; he would have met the smiles of Lafayette with the halter—La ayette, of all the perpetrators of national mischief the most odious, as the hypocrite is more abhorred than the ruffian."

'Lafayette, whose name will be transmitted to posterity, stamped with that bitterest badge of scorn—the praise of all rebels, traitors and infidels throughout the world"

Of the Reform bill, this language is used:

"That fatal bill of misnamed and delusive reform, which, throwing the representation from the hands of the responsible classes into those of the irresponsible—giving to ignorance the rights that belong to knowledge—to poverty the rights which can be safely exerted by property alone, has already shaken the State to its foundations."

In relation to hereditary dignities and popular power, the following ideas are advanced:

"But the true source of this abhorrence of hereditary dignities was neither the vice nor the uselessness of the French nobility; it was the mere rancor of the low against the high, the mere vulgar jealousy of the obscure against the conspicuous, the mere overflowing of that bitter and mean spirited and contemptible desire to sink all things to the level of the contemptible, which belongs to the very nature of the Democrat. This spirit reigns at this moment in the heart of every leveller. This is the spirit which bellows in the clamor of America against a peerage."

"All the speciousness which disguised the true nature of popular power to the eye of fools, for to none other was it ever disguised; or lent a pretext to the tongue of knaves—for in none others did it ever find its panegyric."

These are sufficient to afford an illustration of the character of the journal from which I am still further to quote.

The severity of the commercial crisis of 1837 all remember, and it is within the recollection of those who were in the last Congress, that at the extra session the causes of this crisis were very frequently descanted on. Commercial difficulties pervaded nearly the whole world, and when Opposition orators ascribed all the evils afflicting our community to the removal of the deposites, the specie circular, and sundry other acts of the President, it was replied that these disorders were not confined to this country, but pervaded other commercial states. Attempts were then made to ascribe not only the commercial disasters of this country, but those of England and the whole world, to the enormities of President Jackson. The similarity of the views advanced by certain gentlemen of the Opposition on this floor, with those contained in an article in Blackwood's Magazine, must arrest our attention and strike us with some surprise. In that Magazine, for August, 1837, there is an article headed—"The late commercial crisis—the work of the tyrant majority."

After giving a description of ruin and distress pervading Great Britain, equalling the most glowing panic speech ever made, the writer proceeds:

"But if these have been the effects of the storm in the British islands, how incomparably more disastrous have been its effects on the other side of the Atlantic! In America a convulsion has been experienced, unprecedented, perhaps, in the civilized world. It may truly be said that an universal bankruptcy has there taken place."

Further:

"We shall find the cause in the insanity of the American Democracy, in the violent struggle between the conservative and levelling principle, of which, for four years, that country has been the theatre; in the monstrous absurdity of the masses, who, by long continued clamor and violence, in opposition to the united opinion of all the wealth, respectability, and intelligence of the country, engaged the Executive in a struggle for life and death with the commercial and intellectual aristocracy, and at length carried their Democratic jealousy so far, as, during a period of unexampled commercial enterprise, to attempt to force upon the country an exclusively metallic currency." "This is what the American masses have done; it is in this result that the grand experiments of Democratic institutions—self-government and universal education—have terminated."

"Are you suffering, then, you operatives in Manchester, Salford, Glasgow, and Paisley? Blame neither the House of Lords nor Commons—neither the Crown nor the Bishops—neither the land owners nor the clergy. Your own order, the madness of your own compeers, have occasioned all the distress; it is the tyrant majority in America, the deluded impassioned masses, who were maddened by an untaxed press, and empowered by universal suffrage and vote by ballot, which has occasioned all your suffering. If the opinion of the respectable and educated classes in that country had prevailed, you would still have enjoyed your former prosperity."

"The intelligent far-seeing masses, strong in the support of the multitude, strong in the powers of universal suffrage, vote by ballot, and the exaction of pledges, have returned representatives, and placed a President at the helm, who has carried through, amid the unanimous shouts of the whole Republican party in America, the following decisive measures against the United States Bank, intended as a prelude to the war against all banks whatever."

The writer then enumerates the removal of the deposites—the veto on the Bank charter, and the specie circular, as the measures producing the deplorable results described.

"It was the great act of Democratic despotism by the American masses which has thrown the whole world into convulsion, and induced an extent of ruin and suffering for a parallel to which we shall search the annals of regal or aristocratic oppression in vain."

The writer also gives it as his opinion—

"That the banker with his notes has done as much for the cause of freedom, as either the printer with his printing press, or the schoolmaster with his grammar."

He also says:

"This extraordinary and otherwise inexplicable jealousy of the Bank, which by combining solidity with prudence in its measures has done so much to remove the inherent danger of a paper currency, when issuing from a multitude of independent sources, is in truth nothing but the form which Democratic ambition takes in that country—all other distinctions are abolished; there is no aristocracy, no landed interest, no church, no national debt, no nobility, no sovereign; the majority, according to universal suffrage and giving its votes by ballot, decide every thing. But the banks remain, and in them the masses see the germ of a future commercial aristocracy, in the power of giving or withholding discounts—a source of influence which may sometimes counteract and interfere with their despotic propensities."

And again:

"Previous to the election of Gen. Jackson, the Federalists had always exercised a certain influence over all the Presidents, who were always scholars, and who had all, whatever their party might be, connections of family, friendship, or early habits with the conservative ranks. Up to his accession to power, that party had always a sort of control over both chambers. Now, however, this is entirely at an end; the Executive is wholly at the disposal of the Democratic party. The Federalists have no influence whatever, except in one of the chambers, and that is the Senate, where their preponderance is still maintained from the superiority in its ranks of intelligence, education and fortune. The Democrats, in consequence, have not failed to designate the Senate with the title of aristocratic body, and to call it the House of Lords. The mass which in Europe is accustomed to bear the burden and receive the law, has succeeded in imposing it on the shoulders of the elevated and polished classes, which in Europe constitute the superior stratum of society and form the laws. The farmer and the mechanic are the rulers of the new world; public opinion is their opinion; public will is their will; the President is the man of their choice, their mandatory, their servant."

The writer also quotes in support of his positions the following extract from the work of a French traveller:

"Under the moderate and beneficent rule of former Presidents, the public functionaries were not changed on the change of Government, and they were not allowed to take any part in the public elections. Since the election of General Jackson, however, a systematic system of exclusion has been adopted, public employment of all kind has become the spoil of victory. President Jackson has overspread with his creatures every portion of the Union; all the custom-house officers, all holding office under the Government, have become his creatures. This system has gained cities and counties; the magistrates, secretaries, printers, judges, inspectors of markets, police, watchmen, in a word, public functionaries of every description, are aware that the bread of themselves and their families depends on upholding the ruling dominant powers. The President has now under his command an army of SIXTY THOUSAND civil servants, they are his ames damnees."

Let it not be understood that I am so illiberal as to impute to all my political opponents all the sentiments entertained by the English Conservatives. I am speaking of the tendency of the principles, and the course of the two great parties of this country. That there are in the country a considerable number of persons who are opposed not only to Democratic, but even Republican institutions, can hardly be doubted. Within the fold of which party they are to be found, the tendency of the doctrines entertained by the respective parties, may serve to indicate. Were not these indications sufficient, reference might be had to the productions, which have at several times appeared in the public prints, and among the rest those of a writer who signed himself Sidney, published in 1837. He says:

"That the immediate cause of the present derangement of the currency, and of the embarrassments of commerce and manufactures, is the ignorance, perversity, or wrongheadedness of a few men in the Administration, is true; but that the primary causes are to be sought in the Constitution, is a fact too obvious to admit dispute.

"There are two prominent reasons to be assigned for these defects in the Constitution. One is the want of experience in the patriotic men who framed the Constitution. The other is the credulous reliance of these men on the virtue and intelligence of the people, and of the men who should be elected to enact laws and administer the Government.

"These opinions are not the visions of theory; they are sustained truths, absolute facts; and such facts have induced nations to abandon the practice of electing their Chief Magistrates, preferring to receive that office by hereditary succession. Men have found that the chances of having a good magistrate by birth, are about equal to the chances of obtaining one by popular election. And boast as we will, that the superior intelligence of our citizens may render this Government an exception, time will show that this is a mistake. No nation can be an exception, till the Almighty can change the whole character of man."

May I not say that there is a striking similarity between some of the sentiments put forth in the conservative English journal, from which I have quoted, and those we have heard, and still hear, on this floor? That the banker, with his notes, has done so much for freedom, is not entirely at war with some assertions made here. What the writer's ideas of freedom are, may be sufficiently inferred from the tenor of his article. The army of sixty thousand office holders—the veto on the Bank—the removal of the deposites—the specie circular—the putting forth of these as the efficient causes of all the embarrassments which pervaded the world—the complaint that the President is responsible to the people, "is the man of their choice, their mandatory, their servant," and other suggestions which I will not enumerate—are they not all familiar to our ears?

In enumerating other and further proofs of a tendency to irresponsible power, there is the Bank convention, which met a year or two since, to regulate the business of the nation, and which held its sessions with closed doors. With their enormous power, what was this but a secret and irresponsible Legislature? When any thing has been suggested against the Bank of the United States, it has been replied that the directors were respectable men, and they would exercise properly their power. The opposition to the Independent Treasury is nothing less than an attempt to give the keeping and control of the revenues of the country to irresponsible corporations instead of entrusting them to the safekeeping of responsible agents of the people. Notwithstanding it is impossible to deny the abuses of the banking system, and no one does deny them, yet when an effort is made to prevent those abuses, it is immediately denounced as an attack on the existing institutions of the country, and the doctrine is proclaimed that the "banks are the people." Who defended the gross attempt in Pennsylvania to clothe with power persons not elected by the people? And sir, the majority of this House has been denounced again and again as disfranchising a State! And why? Because, exercising the power given to us by the Constitution, we refused to admit into this hall, as members, those not chosen by the people. Those coming here and claiming the exercise of undelegated and irresponsible power, did not pretend that they had a majority at the ballot boxes. They came here confessing that they had not. And yet, because we have admitted to their seats those who had a majority at the polls, and because we did not admit those whom the people did not elect, to exercise power here which the people never gave, we have been denounced! If the popular will could have been thus defeated, there might have been some reason for a distrust in the permanence of our institutions. I have already alluded to the remark of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the people have been for years "mere machines," and his assertion that confidence has diminished and is daily diminishing in our institutions. It is true that in the preceding portion of his speech, the gentleman from Tennessee professed himself not to be in favor of any further limitation of the right of suffrage. But could there be a stronger argument in favor of such limitation? If the mass of the community have been for years "mere machines," can they exercise the right of suffrage as freemen ought? Such a doctrine strikes a deadly blow at the right of suffrage. I utterly deny the fact, that, for years, the people have been degraded to the rank of "mere machines," and that they are so devoid of intelligence by which to know, or spirit by which to maintain their rights, that they can be hoodwinked and led hither and thither. And any party that undertakes to act on such an assumption, will find themselves covered with defeat and disgrace.

But, let me ask, does it become us to be too ready to proclaim that confidence is daily diminishing in our institutions? Who does not know that the hopes of the true friends of freedom throughout the world are fixed on us? Hither do those who cower under the oppressions of the old world turn their aching eyes, gazing from afar, to the land of promise. Who does not know that the foes of freedom watch with eager earnestness for the slightest symptoms of doubt and distrust? Every such symptom is magnified and repeated again and again by every journal of legitimacy across the waters. If it is to be published that the great experiment has failed, and that the problem of self-government is never to be solved, how glad will be the tidings to the foes of popular power! If it be true that already there is room for distrust in our institutions, those who, in all climes, have been struggling to maintain the rights of their fellows, may well cease their efforts, and fold their hands in despair.

In alluding to the partiality of the Opposition to the irresponsible vote by ballot of representatives of the people, the remark is due to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING,] that in opposition to his course in this respect in the last Congress, he at this session both spoke and voted against it. Nor do I go too far in asserting that from the admissions made by him on this floor, an inference can be drawn as to which party is most in favor of popular rights. It is a pregnant fact that he has heretofore felt himself obliged to rebuke his friends for their avowals here that there was any reason for increased distrust in our popular institutions. On one occasion, I understood him to admit that perhaps there was a leaning to ultra Conservatism among his political associates, and at the same time to contend there was on the other side a tendency to ultra Democracy. In his speech on the Treasury note bill, he also observed it was "his fortune or misfortune to differ with many of his political associates in regard to the social organization of the people of the United States, and the consequent inherent rights and predestined power of Democracy."

Mr. Chairman, if the maintenance of popular rights be a failing, it is a failing which leans to virtue's side. If it be an error, it is a noble error. It is an error which, of all others, tyrants and bigots have most carefully avoided. For this error Fox and Henry spoke, and Milton wrote, and Hampden fought and bled, and Sidney and Russell suffered martyrdom. It is an error which has prompted the greatest actions that adorn the page of history, and which has inspired the burning eloquence, and nerved the arms of the best and bravest in the records of the past. If it be an error, I could almost say that "I would rather err" with such as these, than be wise with those who blame them.

The most deadly foe to the spirit of liberty is that of aristocracy. No populace ever surrendered their liberties to the arm of one great conqueror, and invoked his protection, until, by the unprincipled despotism of a patrician few, they had been reduced to a situation so abject and deplorable, that it could scarce be changed for the worse. No mighty leader has ever been able to subvert the forms of liberty until its essence had already departed. No one has ever concentrated in himself supreme power until the people have been deprived of their rights, and trampled in the dust by the grinding sway of a tyrannical and insolent oligarchy. It has been well said that "the history of oligarchy has been the same in every age. It is a history of plunder and rapine and extortion and treachery and fraud and falsehood. Their leaders have always 'first inflicted the injury, and then railed against the indignation which the injury evoked." They have ever oppressed and trodden upon the people, until attempts to resist their aggressions were inevitable, and then they have cried out against mobs and popular license, and made these a pretence for still further enormities. They have striven to bend to the earth the hardy and elastic tree of popular freedom, and because it would rebound, they have desired to apply the destroying axe to its root.

They have ever assumed to themselves the title of the lovers of order, supporters of constitutions of law and of religion. They have ever abused, with malignant rancor, every one who had the hardihood to oppose their designs, and characterized them as demagogues, as infidels, as foes to peace and order, and as destitute of talent and of virtue. And it is a melancholy fact that history has been too much in the power of the foes of freedom, and that the characters of many of those who were actuated by the noble design of benefiting their fellow men have come down to us blackened by the slanders of patrician malignity. How, let me ask, would Jefferson have gone down to posterity, unless the people had sustained him, and the revilers of that great and good man had been obliged, in a great measure, to succumb before the popular voice, and to pretend an acquiescence in his principles, for the sake, it is feared, of more effectually preventing their influence? And, though the eventful period of the administration of that "just and firm old man," who has now retired to the Hermitage, is so recent that we still hear his principles and actions bitterly attacked by the Opposition, yet no one can have failed to remark that, already, attempts have been made to contrast the sentiments of his successor unfavorably with his, though it is well known that that illustrious patriot and hero is, as he ever has been, with his whole heart and soul, on the side of the Democracy of the land.

Although I have trespassed too long already on the kindness of the committee, there is another subject to which I will briefly allude, as illustrating the distinction which I have endeavored to draw between the great contending parties. The extracts already quoted have shown with what fierce denunciation "the exaction of pledges" is condemned by the English Conservative. Can it be considered other than a most alarming and astonishing fact to the American people, that, on the great topics which agitate the community, the Presidential candidate of the Opposition shrouds his opinions in mysterious silence? The letter of inquiry sent by the Oswego association, and the reply, not by Gen. Harrison, but by three persons, who call themselves "his confidential committee," have already been read in this hall. Sir, when this correspondence was first published, even gentlemen of the Opposition saw it was so repugnant to the principles of American liberty, and to the feelings of the American people, that faint attempts were made to deny its genuineness. These attempts have ceased. No one, now, is hardy enough to rise in his place and declare he does not believe it genuine. The startling and astounding fact stands forth uncontroverted and incontrovertible. What are the reasons given in the correspondence for this extraordinary course? One is that General Harrison receives so many letters it is impossible for him to answer them. Does not every one know that one letter, stating his sentiments on the prominent topics dividing the country, published to the world, is all that could be asked? All must see, at a glance, the insincerity of this pretence. Besides, if it be so laborious to be a candidate for the Presidency, what must it be to act as President? Is this confidential committee—a committee not elected by the people—to act for and in behalf of the President of the United States? In case of the election of General Harrison, is an irresponsible committee to govern the destinies of the nation? What is the true reason of the course which has been taken? The friends of General Harrison will not contend that it is his incompetency, and that they dare not trust him to write a letter. Is it, then, an unwillingness to have his sentiments known, because it is impolitic so to do? In a free country, does any one dare avow this? Yet, sir, the committee have intimated this. Here are the words:

"As from his confidential committee you will look upon this response; and if the policy observed by the committee should not meet with your approbation, you will attribute the error rather to ourselves and his immediate advisers than General Harrison. THAT POLICY IS, that the General MAKE NO FURTHER DECLARATION OF HIS PRINCIPLES FOR THE PUBLIC EYE whilst occupying his present position."

As if doubting whether the reasons given by this confidential committee would be entirely satisfactory, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. CORWIN] has undertaken to add others. One assigned by him was that he could not see of what use it was to extract opinions on a particular subject, when there might be a thousand other subjects to act upon. Another reason was, that a person's present opinions were wished for—not those of yesterday or to-day even, but of the present moment; and that men are so liable to change, that it might be superfluous to express their opinions at any given time. And still another, that the history of Gen. Harrison for years had been uniformly one way, and that he may be supposed to remain the same.

Sir, no one knows better than the able gentleman from Ohio, that there are a few prominent topics which agitate the public mind, and on which an intelligent people must desire to know the opinions of a candidate for their suffrages. Nor is it very easy to conceive how, if persons are so liable to change as he represents, it can, with so much certainty, be inferred that General Harrison had not changed; though I confess, from all that can be inferred from his history, of his political sentiments, if I believed him likely to become the President of this Republic, I should very much hope he had. Here then are the reasons put forward to excuse this course to the American people. One, that General Harrison has so many letters that he cannot answer them all—another, that it is considered impolitic—another, "that the National Convention deemed it impolitic, at the then crisis, to publish any general declaration of the views of the great Opposition party"—another, that there are so many subjects he might be called to act upon, there is no use in the expression of opinion on any—another, that opinions are so liable to change—and still another, that Gen. Harrison is exempt from this liability. Truly, sir, too many reasons are rather worse than none at all.

The intimation that if the policy is not approved, the error is to be attributed "rather to themselves and his immediate advisers than to Gen. Harrison"—what is it but an introduction of the maxim of the British Government that the king can do no wrong? If you approve this course, give the credit of it to General Harrison; if not, do not blame him, but us, his confidential advisers! Has this individual, recommended as fit to fill the Presidential chair, no will of his own—no power to exercise his own judgment? Do this committee deprive him of the privilege of seeing the letters addressed to him? If not, will they not permit an answer, though he may desire to return one? Are the freemen of this country to be imposed upon by such jugglery? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] contended that, "as to its intention, the Hartford Convention was as innocent as the Harrisburg Convention." If this latter convention can introduce among the American people such principles and such practices, I should fully agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts, even admitting the Hartford Convention to be all its worst enemies ever contended, and all which a large portion of the American people have believed. The members of the Harrisburg Convention say to the people of this country, "here is our candidate; we deem it impolitic to expose our principles, or that our candidate should expose his. You are to vote for him, but you must not know why. He is to be your ruler, but we will not inform you on what account. You are to give him your suffrages, but we will give you no reason to offer why you should, nor will we enable you to know why you do it yourselves." This is to carry out the doctrine that the people are "mere machines," with a vengeance. Is this the manner in which the intelligent and virtuous yeomanry of the land are to exercise their highest privilege, that of choosing their own rulers? Are they to be led hoodwinked to the ballot box? Why not just as well have a hereditary ruler? Of what use is it that the people have the right to choose their own rulers, if they are not to know the political principles of those for whom they are called on to vote? How can a person be responsible to the people, if he is not to act for himself, and if the people are not to know his opinions? Sir, to use the allusion so aptly introduced by my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. BROWN,] the people of this country will follow no veiled prophet, lest, when the veil should be removed, they might find, to their dismay and astonishment, that they had been worshipping a monster.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. CUSHING] alluding the other day to the political prospects of his friends, remarked that "he saw the aurora of a brighter day;" and we have heard from several other gentlemen of the Opposition similar exulting and vaunting anticipations. I have heard such loud and boastful prophecies too often for them to strike me with any alarm whatever. During the extra session of the last Congress, the gentleman from Massachusetts used this language:

"We tell you that North Carolina, Tennessee, Kentucky, Indiana, Rhode Island, and Maine, have pronounced judgment upon the Administration. I congratulate Maine especially on her emancipation from the thraldom of degrading assentation to every caprice of the Executive, to which her own peculiar interests have so long been sacrificed. We hail the auspicious omen of the bright star in the East Maine has rung the knel lof Radicalism. Well may she hold up to her sister States the dirigo in her escutcheon. The people have spoken out, and in a voice of thunder, which should be re echoed by their representatives in this hall, until it penetrate into the innermost recesses of the White House."

Allusions were then continually made in a most triumphant manner to this star in the East. It was perpetually above the horizon—to the Opposition their star of morning, and of evening too. Without saying any thing in regard to the result in the other States alluded to, I may be permitted to remind the gentleman from Massachusetts that I then remarked that I knew a little of the spirit of the Democracy of the North, and that, let the true issue be presented to them, and the principles of the President's message be well weighed and understood, they would rise, and, to a man, they would gird on their armor and bare their blades, and, shoulder to shoulder, they would again fight the battle of liberty; and that ere another year, the "star in the East" would have proved, to those who gazed upon it, but an ignis fatuus, which had deceived them with a false and delusive hope.

Though on many subjects I should differ from him with great diffidence in my own opinions, the gentleman from Massachusetts will himself now acknowledge that in this respect I was right and he was wrong. One would suppose that repeated experience might have taught our opponents some caution—lest it might be said of them as Napoleon said of the Bourbons, "that through years of disaster and defeat they had learned nothing and forgotten nothing." But it seems the boisterous and empty boasts of bygone times are again to be repeated—again to prove as hollow and deceitful as before. While the noisy and many-tongued builders of the Opposition are striving to raise their Babel structure, on the summit of which they fondly imagine they shall reach the Heaven of their hopes—the people are silently looking on, awaiting, with calm confidence, the hour of trial. When that shall arrive, they will gloriously vindicate their intelligence, which has been insulted, and their rights, which have been spurned—and write anew, in capitals of fire, the noble truth that man is capable of self-government. They will rise in their might and scatter to the winds the disjointed and crumbling citadel of a grasping and insidious foe.

SPEECH OF MR. MONTGOMERY, OF NORTH CAROLINA,

In the House of Representatives, March 25, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, upon the bill to authorize the issue of five millions of dollars of Treasury notes.

Mr. MONTGOMERY said: Mr. Chairman, I have for some time been endeavoring to obtain the floor, not for the purpose of inflicting upon you and the committee a long and elaborate speech, such as some of those we have had to suffer under since this bill has been before us, but a short and plain statement of such facts as have suggested themselves to my mind, with such recorded facts as I have been able to collect from the journals of this House, and other public records.

I had not intended, Mr. Chairman, when this bill was reported to the House from the Committee of Ways and Means, to have said one word in relation to it, for the facts contained in the information before us, appeared to me to be too plain to be misunderstood by any one, and the necessity of prompt and speedy action by this and the other branch of Congress to relieve the wants of the Government creditors, was too urgent to admit of much delay. Heretofore, Mr. Chairman, it was supposed to be the pride and the pleasure of the Representatives of the people of the United States to seek out and avail themselves of the best means to sustain the credit, the character, and honor of the country, and save the Government from the disgrace that must attend a nonperformance of its engagements. But, sir, it seems that the time has arrived when the whole power and ingenuity of a certain party in this country are exerted, not to aid, foster, and protect their country and its Government—not to aid in sustaining, unimpaired, its faith and credit, but to search out, and, with joy and gladness, embrace all and every opportunity that presents itself to revile and to reduce to bankruptcy, dishonor, and disgrace, the Government of their own country. Sir, I have neither the right nor wish to impugn the motives of others; but I have the right, and duty requires me to speak of public men, and public records, which are the acts of public men; and public men are the servants of the sovereign people, who have a right to see and know what sort of public records we their representatives keep. They at home know us by our acts and declarations; here they only know us by our public records. We meet here not merely for the purpose of passing bills to pay ourselves eight dollars per day; (if we met for that purpose only, we could legislate rapidly, for even Whigs never give us any trouble upon the passage of their own pay;) but we meet to perform those duties which the condition of the country requires, and the wants and interests of the people demand at our hands as national legislators, acting within the provisions of the Constitution.

Mr. Chairman, having said thus much as to what we should do, I propose to go into an examination, not only of what we have done, but what a certain party have refused to do, as proved by the journals, and their votes recorded in them.

I came into this body at the first session of the Twenty-fourth Congress, which met on the first Monday of December, 1835, and have been here ever since. The country had been much excited by a warm party Bank contest, which grew out of the war between the then Bank of the United States and the people of the United States, which should rule the country; in which the national liberty had been made to tremble. That Bank was about to expire as a national institution; the public money had long been received and disbursed by it; the people, when appealed to, had, on two occasions, decided, by large majorities, that its charter should not be renewed; and in obedience to the spirit of that decision, the President had ordered the public money to be placed in the State banks on deposite, to be by them disbursed as the fiscal agents of the Government. These banks performed that service well from October, 1833, until May, 1837; and I will here remark, that the Federal Opposition National Bank party, in strong and unmeasured terms, denounced General Jackson and the State banks, and continued to do so just as long as they acted honestly and faithfully towards the Government and to the people. While the country and business was prosperous, quiet, and happy, under their agency, which they proved themselves able and capable of performing, by doing so from October, 1833, to May, 1837, they received and paid over immense sums for the Government; they not only faithfully paid all the ordinary demands of the Government upon them, but they paid over twenty-eight millions of dollars to the different States, under the deposite act of June, 1836. But in May, 1837, when these banks had about thirty-two millions of the public money in their vaults, (and just before the Presidential election in November,) they shut their doors against the Government, and the people, not only producing universal distress and suffering among the community at large, but greatly embarrassing the Government in its means of providing for the army, the navy, the pension list, the civil and diplomatic officers, and all the poor and honest laborers upon the public buildings, and public works of every description; most of the latter depending entirely upon the products of their daily labor for food and raiment for their wives and children. Thus, in this free and powerful country, Mr. Chairman, we had suddenly, unexpectedly, and without any fault, either on the part of the people or of Congress, in not having provided the necessary means to meet promptly all the demands of the public creditors when due, been reduced to that deplorable situation in which all classes of the community were involved in the deepest distress and suffering, and our Government was compelled to stop payment to its honest creditors, while it was subjected almost to the disgraceful condition of total bankruptcy. This state of things, too, was produced after the Government had provided ample means to meet all its engagements, having collected the money from the people, and placed it in what was supposed to be faithful hands, as a sacred trust, to be ready at all moments for those to whom it was indebted. I will not say this was done for political effect only; but there are many, as well as myself, who are far from being satisfied that there was not, by the master spirits that produced the suspension, political effect intended, and now it is proved.

Under these circumstances it became the indispensable duty of the Executive of these United States to issue his proclamation, calling the representatives of the people to convene for the special purpose of providing such relief as they in their wisdom might deem right and proper. In this all parties most cordially concurred. Accordingly, in pursuance of this call, Congress met in this Capitol on the first Monday of September, 1837; and on the second day of the session we received the message of the President, giving us a history of what was the existing state of things, and recommending such measures for the action of the Representatives of the suffering country and people, as he believed proper, and as they in their wisdom might see fit to bring forward and pass into legal and salutary enactments to guard against a recurrence of similar evils. Was this done on that occasion, Mr. Chairman, or was it not done? Let us, for one moment, examine into that subject. I do not, on this occasion, propose to offer to the committee and to the country the mere declaration of a member upon this floor, or elsewhere, which is so often the subject of misapprehension and mistake, nor do I intend to offer extracts from newspaper paragraphs of the day; not because I have not noticed them, and could not have gleaned from them, as my friend from Virginia over the way [Mr. GOGGIN] did yesterday, abundant materials to prove what I might have desired, but because I prefer to bring forward matter which, being of official record, no man can dispute or deny. I do not propose to imitate some gentlemen on this floor and elsewhere, who, when they desire to deal in severe denunciations against the Administration and the political party opposed to them, draw their supplies from the filthy and turbid streams that daily flow from the poisoned and corrupt political fountains (the Federal presses) that gain their salubrity, not from the purity of their waters, but from the degree of poison they contain. No, sir, I shall pass them over, and apply at the pure fountain of truth, your public records, your journals, and other public documents deposited among the archives in your library, where I shall find an abundant supply to answer all my purposes. Here, Mr. Chairman, [holding up the journals of the three sessions of the last Congress,] are the materials I rely upon to prove not only the necessity of the speedy passage of the bill on your table, but to prove also who it is that have by their recorded votes created this urgent necessity, and this demand upon the Treasury; and here are the documents which will enable me to compare their recorded votes with their declarations made here in this hall, and before the the sovereign people at home. I have stated that the country was suffering under the deepest distress, and that to relieve that distress was the whole and the sole cause for which Congress was convened at the extra session. The people's money was not honestly kept, and paid out by those who had been entrusted with it; for had that been done no call would have been made for an extra session at a cost of two or three hundred thousand dollars. I will now show you what they did do. This journal shows that we met on the 4th day of September, 1837, and organized, and that on the fifth day of the same month, the President sent in his message which contained a plain and full statement of the condition of the country at that time, and pointed out the legislation he deemed proper and which, in his opinion, was required by the wants of the people and the Government. I need not recite them, as they are familiar to all. On the the 13th of September the Committee of Ways Means reported to the House, bill No. 2, to authorize the issue of ten millions of Treasury notes to pay the creditors of the Government who had just claims upon it under the appropriations made by Congress, (and which appropriations, too, had been voted for by nearly all of the Whig party, see journals 2d session 24th Congress.) It must be borne in mind that these Treasury notes were to supply the place of the money actually collected by law from the people, and deposited in pursuance of the law of 1836, for which the Whig party, with few exceptions, voted, in the State banks, where it was either used by them for their own purposes in speculation or otherwise, or actually locked up and detained from the honest creditors of the Government, I care not which, by which means the people severely suffered, and the Government was nearly made bankrupt. This bill passed this House on the 9th of October (page 179) by a vote of 127 yeas, of which 11 were Whigs, and 98 nays, of which 94 were Whigs and 4 were Democrats. It subsequently passed the Senate, was approved by the President on the 12th of October, and became a law. Thus the means for meeting our engagements were a second time provided by Congress, but not by Whig votes, and that it was at the people's expense I have shown heretofore. This supply was only for one year, and was a palliative measure only, and not what the people wished—a permanent relief, or remedy for the evil. On the 15th day of September, just eleven days after the meeting of Congress, Mr. CAMBRELENG, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported to the House bill No. 6, the great and principal measure we were called to act upon, providing for the imposition of proper and suitable punishment by fine and imprisonment upon the dishonest keepers of the people's money in future. In order to prevent a repetition of the same abuses that had so severely scourged and afflicted this nation, this bill contained the most salutary provisions with regard to the safety of the public money, such as prescribing the manner and the places in which it should be kept, and imposing severe and suitable punishment by fine and imprisonment upon all those who should again dare to use it for their private purposes in speculation or otherwise, or refuse to pay it over on demand made by the Secretary of the Treasury to meet the appropriations of Congress in favor of the honest creditors of the Government, [see its provisions.] In section 4, all deposites were made special, not to be used for private speculations, bank discounts or loans, nor for any other purposes except those for which the money was collected—that is to make payment to the people who held just, legal, and bona fide claims upon the Government for services rendered or supplies furnished. Section 9 made the application of the people's money, by those with whom it was entrusted, to any other than the proper objects recognised by law, "stealing," and subjected the persons, thus guilty, to punishment by imprisonment of not less than two nor more than five years, together with a fine equal to the amount embezzled. There then existed, and now exist, no such salutary provisions in our laws against public defaulters; and had this wholesome law been in existence before the suspension of the banks in May 1837, and 1839, would not all the evils it brought upon the country have been prevented? Would all these bank officers have subjected themselves to the walls of a public prison for five year? Never, no never. Much as they might be, and as they have proved themselves to be, disposed to disregard the sacred trust reposed in them, with this provision upon the statute book, they would have preferred a prompt and faithful discharge of duty, to a shameful and insolent refusal of justice, and would have paid over the people's money which they had received in trust. This bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, as was a bill from the Senate with the same or similar provisions, which had passed that body; and on the 4th of October the committee reported the latter to the House. After various other proceedings, the vote was taken on its final passage, or rather its final rejection, for so it turned out to be, by the combined opposition party who had at that session a clear and decided majority in this House, against adopting any substantial relief for the suffering people and country; and by their votes was rejected this favorite measure of the people. This vote stands recorded on page 195 of this journal, [holding up the journal of the extra session.] and was given on the 14th day of October, 1837. On a motion made by a gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARK] that this bill do lie on the table, for that motion there are recorded 119 yeas, and 107 nays. That the people of this country may see who it was of their representatives that were unwilling to grant relief to their suffering constituents, and to punish by fine and imprisonment the plundering public defaulters, for their frauds and peculations on the people's money, I here insert the list of yeas, as they stand on the public record:

"The question was then put on the motion that the bill do lie on the table,

"And passed in the affirmative, yeas 119, nays 107.

"The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the members present,

"Those who voted in the affirmative, are,

Here, Mr. Chairman, are 119 gentlemen, with their politics marked, recording their names against punishing those who steal the people's money, thereby holding out encouragement to plunder—their being no adeqate punishment to guard against the recurrence of the very crimes the commission of which had brought us together. If, Mr. Chairman, the members of this House refuse to obey the voice and wishes of the people, as they did on that occasion, the President is not to blame, nor is he responsible to the people for the refusal of their Representatives to relieve the sufferings of the country, by legislation, when that suffering is sufficient to justify a special call of the people's Representatives, when he has made that call, (as Mr. Van Buren did on that occasion,) made the facts known to them, and suggested such remedies as he deems proper and right to be adopted. He has then done his duty, and all that he can do. He (the President) cannot make laws to punish defaulters, that plunder the public money. We, the people's Representatives, must make the laws, and he, the Executive, execute them. In this case, Mr. Van Buren is cursed by the Opposition for not executing and enforcing laws that they absolutely stand here recorded three times on these journals against enacting, and the want of which has, no doubt, occasioned all the losses by Swartwout, Price, and others, which have since occurred; and, further, that it would most certainly have saved the country from the late suspension of specie payments, and all its present pecuniary difficulties, there cannot be a single doubt; because our monetary affairs would then have been settled; the Government would have kept its own money, and the banks would not have relied on that drawn from the people to sustain their overissues, whilst they would have been compelled to bring their business within prudent and just limits, relying on their own means, instead of those of the people to pay their own debts, which they must finally do. I, therefore, Mr. Chairman, hold the Opposition to this Administration responsible for all the sufferings of the people of this country, in consequence of the losses of public money through defaulters since that time, which amounts to over a million; as also for the stoppage of specie payments by the banks, with all the many evils inflicted upon the country in consequence of it. They had the power to have prevented it. They refused to do so. I do not thus charge them upon my own authority, or upon the authority of newspaper slips or paragraphs, but upon their own recorded votes here upon the journal. And, Mr. Chairman, these journals and records stand in politics like holy writ does in morals, as incontrovertible truths, that cannot be denied or evaded.

[Mr. WISE here rose, and asked leave to put a question to Mr. M. which was granted. Mr. W. inquired whether the gentleman from North Carolina intended to say that the Opposition had the majority in the Twenty-Fifth Congress.]

Most certainly, Mr. M. continued; and I state the fact from the very highest and best authority—the recorded votes upon this journal. Here it is on page 195—one hundred and nineteen names in opposition to the bill No. 6—the great Administration measure to relieve the country from the suffering produced by the unfaithfulness and dishonesty of the Government agents which was sufficiently great to justify a special call of Congress at an expense to the people of from $200,000 to $300,000. What was the cause? Why a failure on the part of the banks to return thirty-two or more millions of the public money that had been collected from the people to pay the honest citizens who had just claims against the Government. This unfaithfulnes on the part of the banks had brought upon the Government the disgrace of bankruptcy, though it afforded to some gentlemen great comfort and happiness. For a certain party in our day are the happiest when the people and the country suffer most. This bill contained the most salutary provisions to guard against the recurrence of similar evils, and in voting against it, did the majority of the House perform that duty to the country, and to the people which the people have so loudly demanded at their hands? No, sir, they provided by the issue of Treasury notes in another bill, limited and temporary relief for one year only, to pay the immediate demands upon the Government, and to relieve it from the state of bankruptcy brought upon it by the banks; but that was the smallest part of the duty they were called together to perform; and I will here take the occasion to say that, by a dozen or more Whigs voting with us on that occasion, we carried the bill, or it would have been lost. But not one of them was from North Carolina. But the most important and vital part of the duty which we were called upon to perform for the country, was to pass laws to secure the public money, and make its custody more safe, so that when it might be called for, it should not be found to be loaned out to speculators, stockjobbers, brokers, and others, in Wall or Chestnut street, as had been the case in the month of May preceding. The Administration party wished to see the present state of things put an end to by fine and imprisonment, and such other precautionary measures as suggested themselves. They proposed and voted for these salutary provisions, while the Opposition voted against them; the latter numbering 119 votes, while the friends of the Administration numbered only 107, [see journal page 195,] showing a clear majority of 12 votes.

[Mr. WISE here rose again, and asked leave to explain, which was granted. Mr. W. said he hoped the gentleman from North Carolina would not publish to the world that the Opposition in this House had a majority in the Twenty-fifth Congress, for it would be a ridiculous statement; for the Administration Speaker and Clerk were elected, and consequently the Opposition were in a minority.]

Mr. MONTGOMERY said that these elections were no test of parties, and the gentleman from Virginia knew it, because they were not made to turn on politics; but that the election of public printer was a party question, and taken in connection with the vote above mentioned, did most clearly prove beyond a doubt that the Administration was in a minority of from 12 to 21 votes in this House, at that time. This vote for public Printer took place on the 7th of September, 1837, and was decided on the 12th ballot, [see journal, page 42,] and stands thus: For T. Allen, 113, Whigs and Conservatives, and Blair and Rives, 101, Democrats; and Gales and Seaton, 9, Whigs; making in all 223 votes cast, of which the Administration candidates received 101 votes, and the Opposition candidates received 122 votes, and showing a clear majority against us of 21 votes. Can the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] prove that 101 votes is a majority against 122? If so, I demand his proof. If he has better proof than the recorded votes in this journal, let us have it. If not, the journal is right, and he is wrong. Nothing can prove it but the modern Bank Federal Whig Pennsylvania arithmetic, which my friend before me, [Mr. RAMSEY,] stated in his place on this floor, had numbered and returned a clear majority of one thousand votes for his Whig colleague [Mr. COOPER] in a single township, where there were but three hundred legal registered votes, and which was not denied, but admitted as true. By the above rule of calculation, and by no other, can the gentleman from Virginia make 101 votes a majority over 122. Here they stand recorded on the journal, and a new journal must be made, and this expunged, or I am right and the gentleman from Virginia wrong. I here insert a list of members by States, as they are recorded on the journal with their politics marked, and which will not, nor cannot be denied, except by those who deny any thing for party purposes.

Here stands the vote by States, marked as they voted on this great measure of security for the safe keeping of the people's money, and punishing those who improperly use it, or who plunder it, as Swartwout has since done, and who was recommended by a Whig paper, in New York, as a suitable candidate for the Vice Presidency on the Whig ticket.

Mr. Chairman, having now gone through with the affairs of the 1st session of the 25th Congress, and proved that the friends of this Administration did make an effort on their part to obey the call of the people, and to secure more safely the public money, by proposing to sever all connection between the Government and the banks who had proved false and unfaithful to their trusts, and to provide other keepers hereof, whose fidelity and punctuality was to be secured by the certainty of incurring the pains and penalties of fine and imprisonment for the opposite conduct; and having proved also that the measure they proposed for these objects failed by a majority of twelve votes—thus relieving the Republican party from the fearful responsibility of refusing to obey the just and reasonable calls of the people to provide an adequate remedy for their sufferings, as well as to guard against future defalcations and suspensions with all their baneful consequences, I will now look into the journal of the 2d session of the 25th Congress, and see what is there recorded. That session began on the 4th day of December, 1837, and ended on the 9th day of July, 1838, amounting to two hundred and eighteen days. The same members that composed the first session composed this. On the 26th day of March, 1838, Senate bill No. 157, containing all the salutary provisions and safeguards which were embodied in the bill of the House, of the extra session, relative to the safe keeping and disbursing of the public money, and punishing defaulters, was sent us, it having passed that body. On the 27th day of March, and only one day after it made its appearance in this House, on motion by Mr. PATTON of Virginia, it was laid on the table by a vote of 106 yeas to 98 nays. The journals also show [March 24, page 513] that a similar bill [No. 597] with the same salutary provisions, was reported to this House, and on page 1157, a vote stands recorded of 111 for and 125 against its passage Thus, Mr. Chairman, the journal shows [page 1157] that the Opposition to this Administration in the 25th Congress still had a clear and determined majority against us upon this great measure of finance so much desired by the people and the Administration party, for separating all connection between the Government and their unfaithful agents the banks, and against all laws providing for the safe keeping and disbursing the public money. The journals also show a settled and fixed determination on the part of the same majority against passing any laws for the punishment of public defaulters, for peculation and stealing; they having three times solemnly recorded their names against all propositions on that subject, and against any compromise as to the reception of bank paper in payment of the public dues. In order to show that they were opposed to any compromise whatever, it is only necessary to observe, that with a view to make this last mentioned bill [No. 597] more acceptable, a special provision in section 20 was made, "that after the 1st of January, 1839, one sixth part of all payments to the Government should be in coin, Treasury notes, or other legal acceptances of the Government, and one sixth to be added annually till the whole shall be thus paid." Thus, beginning with one-sixth specie, and adding one-sixth annually, thereby giving the banks five years to prepare for the state of things resulting from a collection of the revenues exclusively in the currency recognised by the Constitution. This provision was rejected by a Whig and Conservative vote of 125 to 111—a majority of 14 votes. The Senate bill, a similar one, was rejected by a vote of 106 to 98—a majority of 8 votes. The bill at the extra session was rejected by a vote of 119 to 107—a majority of 12 votes. Having failed in three repeated attempts made at the first and second sessions of the Twenty-fifth Congress to separate the keeping of the people's money from the banks; having failed in our attempts to enact any additional laws to punish public defaulters; and also having failed to effect a compromise by offering to take one-sixth part of our revenues annually for five years in specie, and the balance in good bank paper, we despaired of doing any thing, and the whole subject was referred to the sovereign people for their decision. They have given a verdict, and we will soon see what that verdict is. I believe they have returned to the Twenty-sixth Congress in this House from one hundred and twenty to one hundred and thirty professed and instructed members in favor of a separation of the keeping of the public money from the banks, thereby proving that the people wish and are now for this measure, as well as for penal laws to prevent peculation on the public funds; and if any now desert, let him, Arnold-like, have a face both ways in all future time. At the third session of the Twenty fifth Congress, the same members being present who had three times voted against these important measures, we not having the power to pass them, and they having the power to prevent their passage, no further effort was en made for that purpose, and the responsibility rested on them, and not on us, nor upon the President. We had done our duty: they had not done theirs.

I now, Mr. Chairman, propose to examine into the causes which have led to the present embarrassed condition of your public Treasury, which, if not already in a state of actual bankruptcy, is in daily and imminent danger of becoming so; and, therefore, imperatively requiring the speedy passage of the bill on your table. I do not rely on rumor, nor newspaper paragraphs, nor do I intend to charge the state of things I have adverted to, to the proper quarter on my own authority merely; but it is my purpose to rivet my charges there by the facts contained in these three volumes, and the votes of members of this House during the whole of the three sessions of the Twenty-fifth Congress, when the Opposition, as I have already shown, had a majority here, and received pay for more legislative days than at any previous Congress since our Government has existed—the first session being 43 days, the second 218, and the third 91 days, making an aggregate during that Congress of 352 days, and wanting only thirteen days of one whole calendar year, or one-half of the whole time for which they were elected.

During the whole of this time, the people of this country were suffering intensely for the want of some legislative action of Congress, and which Congress was, in September, 1837, specially called to act upon, and relieve the embarrassments occasioned solely by the unfaithfulness of the depositaries of the public money, and the remedy for which alone rested with Congress. I have proved, by the journals, that the Opposition had voted down three salutary acts of permanent relief, and that the only relief which had been granted during that period, was the passage of the Treasury Note bill now before us—a temporary measure only, limited to one year at a time, and no longer, relieving only the Government's wants, while the people in the mass had no relief. But even that poor and limited relief gives no credit to modern Federal Whigery, for on the passage of the first Treasury Note bill, which is recorded on the journal, p. 179, of the extra session, there were 127 yeas and 98 nays, and among the 127 yeas there are 11 Whigs and Bank Conservatives, whose names I insert as an act of justice, viz: Messrs. N. B. BORDEN, (Mass.) J. CALHOUN, (Mass.) J. C. CLARK, (N. Y.) J. GARLAND, (Va.) R. GARLAND, (La.) J. M. MASON, (Va.) J. P. B. MAXWELL, (N. J.) J. C. NOYES, (Conn.) J. POPE. (Ky.) J. RARIDEN, (Ia.) and F. O. J. SMITH, (Me.) These eleven votes were mostly Whigs then, and are all Whigs of the deepest dye now. Thus, Mr. Chairman, this vote is another proof that whatever may have been intended by the Opposition, (for with their motives I have nothing to do,) their acts, as a body, with the exception of the eleven who voted with us at the extra session, did subject the Government to utter bankruptcy and disgrace. There were 17 votes not given on that occasion—sick, behind the columns, or elsewhere. At the second session of he 25th Congress, on page 391 of the journal—May 16th—the act for the issue of Treasury notes was renewed for one year only, by a vote of 103 yeas to 94 nays, there not being one single Whig vote to be found in the affirmative. Thus the record does not show that at this long session of 218 days, a single Whig did vote to raise and provide the means to save the country from bankruptcy, or to provide a single dollar to pay either their own eight dollars per diem, or the $38,413,064 87 appropriated at this and the extra session, for which the Whigs, as a body, voted for every dollar, never having given more than 35 Whig votes against the passage of any one of the appropriation bills, containing the whole $38,413,064 87. See the recorded vote against bill No. 676, page 1034, journal of the 2d session, 25th Congress, being the bill for the suppression of Indian hostilities, appropriating $6,739,410 41. Here the Whigs, who voted against the Treasury note bill for supplying the wants of the Government, voted for these unusually large appropriations, much the largest ever made for any one year since the formation of this Government. With these facts before their eyes, and with these tables contained in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury No. 4, made to this House at the meeting of that session, showing the fact [page 4] that the estimated revenue expected to be derived from all sources, during that year, to meet the appropriations of the year, would not exceed the sum of $31,959,787. And what was the result of this estimate? It was this: instead of yielding the sum of $31,959,787, (see document No. 4, page 4, 3d session, 25th Congress,) as was estimated by the Secretary, only the sum of $24,152 655 34 was paid into the Treasury during that year, being less by the sum of $7,807 031 66 than the estimates. The estimates for 1839 were $28,780,000—amount received not yet ascertained: will not be over twenty-four millions.

How, then, Mr. Chairman, these modern Bank Federal Whigs could calculate on paying a debt upon the Treasury, by them created for 1838—amounting to $38,413,064 87, with the sum of $24,152,655 34, the receipts paid into the Treasury during the year 1838, (exclusive of Treasury notes, against which they voted,) I am at a loss to divine. How could they calculate on the Secretary paying these thirty-eight millions with twenty-four millions? Did they not know that bankruptcy, under these large appropriations over the income, was certain, without Treasury notes? Did they wish bankruptcy, that they might rejoice over it, and increase their party? Let them answer.

Was it not their duty to propose or vote from some plan for the purpose of paying off the large debts they created by their votes at that session? Did they do so? No, sir; they did not. They contented themselves with voting this $38,413,064 87, thereby imposing a debt upon the people of that amount, in that year with only $24,152,655 34 to pay it with, and voting down all the salutary safeguards proposed to protect and secure the twenty-four millions when collected, from peculation and plunder, and Swartwout has since withdrew over a million. But this is not all. After having taken this course they proclaim on this floor, and at home before the people, that we, the Republican Administration party here, were doing all in our power to ruin the people, and disgrace the country, by bringing it to bankruptcy, and that they were laboring here with all their power to relieve the people's distresses, take care of the public money, and preserve the faith and credit of the country unimpaired. They made these assertions when the truth was, they had not brought forward a single measure of relief, either for the people or the Government, but had actually, with their Bank Conservative allies, voted down three times all the measures we proposed of permanent relief for the people and the country, and so far as their own votes went, would have voted down the measure that provided the means for meeting their own appropriations; and instead of mourning over the sufferings of the people, and the calamities of the country, they actually appeared to be flushed with exultation and triumph, and greatly to rejoice that they had succeeded in preventing the passage of all the measures intended for the people's relief, exultingly proclaiming that the people had not yet suffered quite enough, as they say.

[Mr. RAYNER of North Carolina here asked his colleague if he did not know that the Opposition had not the power to pass measures of relief at that session of Congress.]

Mr. M. resumed. I do not know that the Opposition could not have passed any measure of relief in this House they wished; but I do know that they had a majority here, and also that that majority did vote down all the measures of permamanent relief that the Administration brought forward. Here are their recorded votes in these journals to prove the fact. Has my colleague better proof than these journals? If so, I demand it. If it is not given, he is wrong, and I am right. And further: I do know another strong fact; I do know that the Opposition in this House did not propose or bring forward a single plan or measure of relief for the country during the whole of the three sessions of the Twenty-fifth Congress, amounting in all to 352 days—the longest period of legislation that ever took place during any one Congress since the formation of the Government. I also know what the whole nation knows, and what my colleague, [Mr. RAYNER] too, well knows, that this same majority on three several occasions recorded their names against our measures of permanent relief, while they could have passed through this House any measure they chose to propose. By the same majority they voted down our plans. Does this committee and the nation not believe that had the Whigs and their allies been as willing to have relieved the people from their sufferings as they were to prevent the Administration party from doing so, they could have done it? I submit that issue to the intelligent people of this nation, with the recorded facts before me in these journals, which I intend to publish to the world, (holding up the journals of the three sessions of the Twenty-fifth Congress.)

[Mr. RAYNER of North Carolina here rose greatly excited, amidst loud cries of order from all parts of the hall, and asked leave to put a question to his colleague. No, no, was heard from all sides.]

Mr. MONTGOMERY asked of the House to allow his colleague to interrogate him. He would answer him willingly: he hoped he would be permitted to put what questions he pleased.

[Mr. CONNOR rose to a question of order. He denied the right of Mr. R. to rise so repeatedly to interrupt his colleague, who had the floor.

The Chairman (Mr. DAWSON) observed, that the gentleman who had the floor had expressed a desire to answer such questions as his colleague wished to propound to him.

Mr. RAYNER then said: does my colleague intend to insist on this floor, and publish it to the world, that the Opposition party had the power in this House during the 25th Congress to bring forward and pass their measure of relief? And does he not know that their plan of relief was and is a Bank of the United States? Does he not know that he and his party voted down that measure by a majority in this House; and does he intend after this to publish to the world that the Whigs had the power, and could have carried any measure through the House? Mr. R. was here arrested in his remarks by calls to order from all sides, which were continued till he resumed his seat, which he did with much apparent excitement, exclaiming that he was not to be put down by a parcel of members who would collect around him and call out "order, order"—he was not to be put down by such stuff as that.]

Mr. MONTGOMERY resumed. Then, Mr. Chairman, I understand my colleague to say, that a Bank of the United States is the favorite plan of him and his party for the country's relief.

[Mr. RAYNER. I do freely acknowledge that that is my plan for relief; but not just at this time. But I do not vouch for my party.]

Mr. MONTGOMERY. My colleague says he admits it to be his plan to establish a Bank of the United States, but not just at this time. But he does not vouch for his party. I ask my colleague when the time will arrive that will bring forward this favorite plan of relief. Is it to be postponed and withheld until the people and the country are utterly and irretrievably ruined? Have the sufferings of the people not yet reached a point that can affect the tender mercies of him and his party, and excite their kind feelings so as to cause them to do something for their suffering constituents? Is this the treatment the people are to receive from my colleague and the party with which he acts? If so, let the world know it. Is this what they told the people while canvassing for their seats on this floor? Did they then tell the people that they had not yet suffered enough to drive them like the serfs of Russia, into tame submission to a tyrant's mandates? My colleague asks again if I intend to assert here, and publish to the world, that the Whigs had a majority in the Twenty-fifth Congress. I again present these journals to him as the answer to his interrogatory. They prove the fact; I intend to publish it; and if I publish any thing incorrectly, it will be through mistake, and can be easily detected. I could not, were I disposed to do so, publish any thing half as strong as the facts here recorded. They are all I desire, to put this matter right before the people, who, I must say, have been greatly imposed upon in relation to this subject. They shall have the facts before them, just as they appear here upon record; and I now say to my colleague, and the party with which he acts, that the proposition relative to a Bank of the United States, their great and their only measure of relief, and which they were either afraid or ashamed to bring forward during the Twenty-Fifth Congress, was brought forward, but not by its friends in this House, for they shrunk from the responsibility of bringing up before the people of the United States so odious a measure. Yes, that old Federal monster, that had acted, and still acts, as the main wheel that controls all the secret money operations of the country, producing panics, suspensions, &c. &c. with all their train of curses, and which the honest people of the United States had, at the polls; not only once but thrice solemnly decided, by large and increased majorities, should not exist as a national institution, having sunk under its own corruptions, and having ceased to scourge this country under national authority, and revived in a new form—the same Bank, with its thirty-five millions of capital, with all its foreign allies and stockholders, some of whose names have titles of nobility attached to them as long as my arm, by purchase or otherwise, obtained a charter from the State of Pennsylvania. Having obtained this charter, it was exultingly proclaimed by the master spirit who controlled it, [Mr. BIDDLE,] that it was more powerful than when connected with the General Government; it was loudly proclaimed as the great regulator of the exchanges and commerce of the country; as the sole and only guardian and protector of the great State of Pennsylvania, and the sure preserver of her magnificent and splendid public works. But mark the result of all this boasting. In May, 1837, about fifteen months afterwards, it had, by its folly, or something worse, regulated and wound itself up into a state of complete bankruptcy, acknowledging itself unable to pay a poor man for one of her five or ten dollar bills, and is now a miserable spectacle of ruin and corruption. And this is the sort of regulator my colleague and his party thinks is the only power that can relieve the people's sufferings; and when they shall have suffered a quantum sufficit to compel them to swallow it, then the time will arrive when he and his friends will be ready to cram it down their throats. This is their only remedy, a bankrupt bank, thrice rejected by the people. They do not regard the fairly and fully expressed will of the people, but in violation of that will, say to them, you shall suffer until your sufferings compel you to swallow the filth you have thrice rejected. Will the people submit to this attempt at despotism? Never; no never. Look at once happy Pennsylvania! See her condition since she adopted the rejected monster as her guardian! Disgraced by permanent suspensions, borrowing money to pay interest, cursed with shinplasters—all by the Great Regulator.

Mr. Chairman, having most clearly proved by these journals, that the Whigs and their allies—the Conservatives, every man of whom, with one honorable exception, [Colonel HOPKINS of Virginia,] is now completely and thoroughly in the Federal Whig ranks—not only had a decided majority in the House during the Twenty-fifth Congress, but actually recorded that majority on three different occasions before cited, in successfully voting down the great and leading measures of this Administration, I will now proceed to show by their recorded votes, how far their declarations, here and before the people, correspond with them. Would you, sir, and would the people believe, after hearing the loud and angry denunciations of the Whig party against the extravagance and corruption of this Administration reverberated at every cross road, grog shop, and muster ground, as well as elsewhere, from Maine to Texas, and from the Atlantic to the Rocky mountains, that any Democrat ever voted against a single appropriation proposed from any quarter? Surely not, sir. And, on the other hand, would you, sir, for one moment allow yourself to believe that a single Whig ever supported or recorded his name in favor of a single dollar of these unjustifiable and outrageously extravagant appropriations of the people's money, as they say? Surely not, sir. You could not suppose so. I have charged that, as a body, these Whigs are not recorded against a single bill in the Twenty-fifth Congress which contained these large appropriations that they so loudly complained of, and that the highest Whig vote recorded against any one of them is only thirty-five. I have charged that of the seventy-five millions appropriated during the Twenty-fifth Congress, at its three sessions, when I have proved that the Whigs and their allies had a clear majority in this House, and could have controled all the appropriations, the sum of $66,085,459 54, or near this sum, is recorded upon the journals as having passed this House unanimously, with the exception of six votes against ten millions, contingent, at the third session of the Twenty-fifth Congress, and two against one million at the second session of the Twenty fifth Congress. The statement of the votes against these appropriations, for which both parties voted, I here publish; and I will here observe, that where the journals report a unanimous vote, all are recorded for the measure, and the absence of members from the House, or behind the columns, or their refusal to vote, is not noted, and is to be settled between them and their constituents. I have taken the final vote on the passage of these bills as recorded on the journals; and if there are any whose names are recorded for them who have voted against them previously, I can only say that they have recorded their names on both sides of the question, and of course have voted right once on the subject. It will be, therefore, a matter with them and their constituents to settle which vote was the right one. With that I have nothing to do.

I have charged that notwithstanding the Opposition had a majority in the Twenty-fifth Congress, and notwithstanding the loud and zealous preachings of the Whig party before the people about their economy and our extravagance, we have more votes recorded upon the journals against these appropriations in that Congress than the Whigs have. I have examined and ascertained that fact, and made out a list of all that voted against each bill, with the number of bill and page on the journal when they passed, which I will publish in my speech, to prove this charge to be true. Here they stand as they were given and are recorded; and should any be misstated, I will willingly correct the error, when pointed out:

The above votes are all that are recorded against any of the appropriation bills that passed the 25th Congress, on their final passage, at its three sessions, which amounted in all to 352 days, during which time the Whigs and their allies had the power in this House to control its legislation, as I have proved by the journals. What does this proof amount to? Let us examine it for one moment. The aggregate amount appropriated during that Congress stands, as above stated, at $75,269,028 02; and of that sum $66,085,459 54 (with the exception of six votes against ten, and two against one, million) is recorded as having passed unanimously, both parties voting for it. There was also, of this aggregate, about the sum of $9,168,832 90, which was voted against by some of both parties, but mostly by the Administration members, they having given an aggregate vote of 148 against the bills embracing this sum, and the Whigs having given an aggregate vote, including the above mentioned, of 114 only. See the above recorded votes published from the journals with the number of the bills, their amounts, and the page upon the journal when they passed. How, then, stands all the Whig preaching about economy on their part, and extravagance on ours, so loudly and so boldly proclaimed before the people, and on this floor? Which is the best and strongest proof, their votes here recorded on the journals, or their loud declarations before the people? They cannot both be true, because they are precisely the opposites of each other. Gentlemen may take either horn of the dilemma, and settle the matter with their constituents, who sent them here, I presume, to practise economy, and who have a right to decide which is true and which is false.

As a further illustration, and in proof of what I have charged upon these modern Federal bank Whigs, who adhere so closely to their unfaithful banks, and who preach economy to the people, and practise extravagance; who knowingly vote, as I have shown, many millions more than the estimated and actual revenue, and refuse Treasury notes to meet the debts they have thereby created. I have made out an account current for a few of the leading and most rigid economists of that party, and who will be admitted as a fair sample of the whole. I have, also, made out an account current for all the members from my own State, of whom there were eight Whigs and five Republicans, in the Twenty-fifth Congress; and in making out this account, I have charged them with the seventy-five millions appropriated during that Congress, while I have given them credit for all that they stand recorded on the journals as voting against; and having struck the balance against them, I have then given their votes on the Treasury Note bills, which shows the amount of debt they created, and the amount of means they provided to pay it. The accounts current at the end of this speech.

Mr. Chairman, I do not complain of those who voted for these appropriations, for I voted for most of them myself; but I do complain of those who voted for them, and then denied their votes before the people, casting all the odium on the Republican party, of those large amounts voted out of the people's money. There were good causes for most of them, which I could satisfactorily demonstrate to any and all true friends to their country. Gen Jackson made from sixty to one hundred treaties with Indian tribes, by which upwards of one hundred and twenty five millions of acres of land were acquired, for which ninety-three millions of dollars has been paid; (see vol. 4, Executive Documents, 3d S. 25 C. No. 164;) and thousands of Indians were removed West. All these treaties were ratified by a Federal Whig Senate, opposed to him, and by a vote of two-thirds, so that the Whigs had the power always to reject them, if disposed to do so. We were then, in the House, bound to make the appropriations to pay the cost of these treaties, and both parties in this and the other House voted for them. The Indian wars cost us much money, and both parties voted for them.

By the act of 1836 for the reorganization of the Post Office Department, the funds of that Department were put into the appropriations, which was not done previous to that time, but they form no part of the burdens imposed upon the people. It is only the revenues of that Department which are applied to keep up and extend the mail accommodations for the people. Your pension list has risen from half a million to near three and a half millions, and all parties voted for the laws which so enormously increased this list. By act of 1836, twenty-eight millions were given to the States. Now I voted for these laws because I thought them proper and just; and having done so, I never will, (like the Whigs,) after creating a debt, refuse to pay it, and abuse innocent men for what I did myself. The Whig party voted these large sums out of the Treasury, and thereby compelled Mr. Van Buren to apply them according to their own laws; and yet when he obeyed them, they denounced him for it. He has not spent all the money they voted him during the last two years by nearly fifteen million of dollars, (see unexpended balances for 1838 and '39,) and yet they heap curses on him because he does not bring down the expenses of the Government, and when he recommends a reduction of five or six millions, as he has at the present session, (for which see his message) they loud and furiously denounce him for doing just what they asked him to do. Does not this show that they are determined to oppose him in all cases and under every circumstance? Some abuse him for expenditures on the roads, some for expenditures on harbors, some for expenditures on rivers, and some for expenditures on light-houses. Some abuse him on account of post routes and post masters, (see Gov. Dudley's message to the last Assembly,) and, in short, every thing under Heaven, reasonable or unreasonable. Yes, sir; for the work of their own hands and heads. This same kind of opposition was made to the administration of Washington as well as to that of every Democratic Administration since his day. There was a factious spirit always operating against them, right or wrong. Just so now.

I have said, Mr. Chairman, that we wanted money to pay our army, our navy, our civil and diplomatic expenses, as well as our laborers, many of whom have been discharged from service in consequence of the exigency of the times; which I have clearly shown have been brought on us by the conduct of the banks and their Whig allies. In this House, as well as elsewhere, I wish to see the just and honest debts of the Government paid. We must provide the means in some way, and if these good Whigs, who voted for the creation of these just debts, that now press us, are, as they declare they are, determined that not a single dollar shall be provided in this bill to pay them, but will let bankruptcy and disgrace fall on our country, which is daily threatened, let them vote against it, and against their country; let the people see who are willing to sustain and support the Government, its honor and its credit, and who refuse to do so. I am a Treasury note man, and always have been. I have no constitutional scruples about their issue; none whatever. When we want money, and have to borrow and pay interest, I am for paying that interest to those to whom we owe the money, if they will take our paper in Treasury notes. For instance, we owe our farmers, our sailors, our soldiers, and laborers on our public works; and we owe our mechanics for whatever they supply the Government with. We must pay all these public creditors, and upon the amount necessary to pay them, we must pay interest. Now I greatly prefer paying them this interest, to paying it to your banks, your brokers in Wall or Chestnut streets, or to the rich capitalists in Europe, the Rothschilds, the Barings, the Hottinguers, and others. Yes, sir, I like our own poor honest farmers, soldiers, sailers, laborers, mechanics, &c. &c. vastly better than bankers, or those money shavers on Pennsylvania avenue, or in New York, Philadelphia, Europe, or elsewhere, who feed like vampyres, on the blood of the productive classes. When we are compelled to give our paper on interest, the constitutional principle is the same, whether you pay it on $100 to ten different men, or to one man, or whether you pay it to ten farmers or laborers on $1,000, or to a bank or one of these money shavers on the same amount. I know that this paper is the best paper that the people can hold, and I desire to furnish the honest laborers with the very best. If a loan is made by a bank, or any of their agents, and they agree (as they always do) to pay the checks of the Secretary of the Treasury in specie, when the holders present them, the banks, by some of their trickery and management, will pay out their own, or some other bank paper, and thus put into circulation bad paper, without interest, in lieu of the good United States Treasury notes, with interest. Therefore those who vote for large bills, vote to promote the interest of banks and capitalists, by throwing these good notes notes with interest into their hands, while their depreciated bank paper, without interest, is thrown into the hands of the honest and industrious laboring classes. Is this not as clear and as plain as yonder sun at noonday? I am well aware, Mr. Chairman, that upon this subject, I differ with many of my best Democratic friends, but we cannot always agree, and each must think and act for himself without quarrelling with those who differ with him. I am sorry to differ with my friends, but in this matter I have greatly the advantage of all who do not agree with me, by being right while they are wrong. My people want good paper, (if any must circulate,) that will buy lands, and pay taxes in the West, without discount, or their subscriptions in New York or elsewhere for their newspapers or other transactions, without being subjected to a shave with a magnum bonum razor by a New York or any other broker. I am aware that the Federal Bank Whigs will say: "why did you put down the Bank of the United States? I answer that the people put it down, because it was the credit of the United States, and not its ability to pay in specie, that passed the paper of that Bank, for it always was a bankrupt concern, if stripped of Government credit, which fact has been proved by the withdrawal of that credit, and the sudden and acknowledged total and permanent bankruptcy of the corporation. Do gentlemen want foreigners to speculate on our credit? I, and my people, wish the Government credit to be used through the medium of Treasury notes, (when it must be used,) and not by stock gamblers, for the speculating purposes of an association of American and European capitalists, bankers, and money shavers. I wish it to be used for the benefit of the honest and industrious laboring people of the country, and therefore hope that my amendment for the issue of $10 notes will prevail.

The following is the account current as it stands with the North Carolina delegation in the 25th Congress, upon the appropriation bills. They stood five Democrats and eight Opposition Whigs at that time. The nays, as recorded on the journal, of each, is given upon the final passage of the appropriation bills, with the number of the bill and the page in the journal where they passed; where the yeas and nays are not taken, it is a unanimous vote; and at Raleigh, the seat of Government in my district, I have deposited the bound journal, that reference may be had to prove all that I have said and published; for I regret to admit the fact that, in my own State, modern Whigery not only denies recorded facts, but proclaims and vouches for that which is precisely the very opposite of recorded facts and truth; for on the eve of the last Congressional election, a forgery, of the blackest dye, was issued from a Federal press in Raleigh, sent all over my district by expresses, with the certificate of five volunteer, or willing witnesses, as a passport, and the name of one of them is now one of the Whig Harrison electors, (Charles Manly, esq. of Raleigh, N. C.) and is canvassing the district by speeches of the lowest abuse against this Administration.

REMARKS OF MR. PETRIKIN,

OF PENNSYLVANIA.

In the House of Representatives, May 15, 1840—On the bill for the remission of duties on goods consumed by fire in the city of New York.

Mr. PETRIKIN said, that he had been so far a silent observer of the progress of this bill. He had looked with astonishment more than once, during the time he had been a member on this floor, at the flagrant want of consistency between the professions and votes of members. He, however, never had witnessed a greater degree of inconsistency in any case than in the votes just given. The gentlemen who compose the party opposed to the Administration, are continually denouncing it both on this floor and before the people, as extravagant and wasteful. Nevertheless, those gentlemen are always found the foremost in concocting and advocating means to take the money out of the Treasury. In the present case they are, with a very few exceptions, recording their names for a bill which must take millions of dollars from the Treasury, to go into pockets of merchants in New York, who are, no doubt, principally foreigners, or their agents. Yes; very probable there are some of them of that "gang of Yorkshire merchants," of whom we have heard so much said on a late occasion on this floor. But be they who they may, the question is, what claim have they in law or equity for the money this bill proposes to give them. Every disinterested man must say, none. If they insured their goods at offices that were unable to pay for the loss, that was their own fault, not the fault of the Government.

Let gentlemen look at the votes on this bill, and see who they are, and to what party eight tenths of those belong, who are not only willing to vote away this large amount of money, but are anxious to bring it through without inquiry, debate, or discussion. It will be found that they are those who wish to make the people believe that economy is a part of their creed, and that they detest extravagance, when, in reality, their facts here, on all occasions, contradict their professions before the people.

Mr. P. said the time was come when the people should be informed on this subject. When they get that information they will speak aloud; they will examine how the acts of gentlemen on this floor accord with their professions elsewhere.

We have heard a great cry about the Treasury being bankrupt; and yet gentlemen engaged in this cry are willing to pass this bill to pay away money without restriction or limits, and where none is due. Those same men were unwilling to vote the money necessary for the support of Government, but have no difficulty, when asked to vote millions to foreign merchants. We have been daily annoyed, on all occasions, by their denunciations of the Administration and the Democratic party, as being corrupt and extravagant; and there can be no doubt, if we pass this bill, that in the course of a year we shall have this very measure held up as one of the corrupt and extravagant acts of the Administration, by the very men who are now voting for it.

Have they any conscience? Or do they suppose the people are fools, that they will not comprehend such a total disregard of common honesty, such a contradiction of professions by actions? If gentlemen think so, I can assure them they are mistaken. The people are watching their movements, and will show them that although slow to act, that action will be sure. Mr. P. called upon the few Democrats who voted with the Whigs on this occasion, not to abandon their principles. One of the maxims of Democracy is "equal and exact justice to all men." Is it just or right to take from the Treasury the money of the people, and give it to those who have no just claim to it? If millions are thus to be taken from the Treasury, we will soon be compelled to resort to a direct tax. The laborers of the country will have to pay away their earnings to support the aristocracy of the cities in splendor and dissipation. This will not be tolerated by the people. Are those of the Democratic party who honestly adhere to their principles of economy and justice, to suffer by the denunciations heaped upon them by the Federalists, merely because a few of those that are sent here as Democrats, so far forget their principles and their duty as to vote with the Federalists to take millions of the money raised off the people, to give to their political friends? And do they not know that the very men who are to receive this money, join in the cry of extravagance and waste against the Democrats and their Administration? We can protect ourselves against our enemies; but God save us from such friends. Mr. P. said he, for one, would oppose the passage of all such bills. He would hold these men up before the country who profess to be Democrats, but are here willing to vote, whether right or wrong, with the Opposition, for all such bills as take money from the Treasury—men who are willing to sacrifice both party and principle to vote a few dollars into the pockets of their personal friends or constituents Such men are not Democrats—they do not belong to that party whose principles the present Administration are anxious to carry out by practice. If they do, they are strangely forgetful. They forget that the Democratic party are held accountable for every dollar voted by this Congress to be taken from the Treasury. They forget that they are daily told on this floor by the Whigs that the Democrats have a majority; and that although they (the Whigs) vote to take money out of the Treasury, yet the Democrats, being a majority, are in fault, if it is taken out improperly. If any Democrat has voted without proper reflection, now is the time to correct his error, and to show the people that he is not recreant to his principles.

Mr. P. argued that gentlemen whose constituents were interested in the passage of a bill by which, if passed, they were to receive so large an amount of money, had no right to vote on the passage of the present bill.

SPEECH OF MR. JOHNSON, OF VIRGINIA.

In the House of Representatives, April 14, 1840—On the motion to recommit to the Committee on Accounts the reports in relation to contracts existing between Langtree and O'Sullivan and the Clerk of the House, for stationery, &c.

Mr. J. JOHNSON of Virginia asked leave to submit a report from the Committee on Accounts, in relation to the accounts of Langtree and O'Sullivan. He said that all its members, with the exception of one, had concurred in the report; and that a minority report would be presented to the House.

Mr. WISE objected.

Mr. JOHNSON moved a suspension of the rules, and the question was taken by count; and there being ayes 79, noes 40, and no quorum voting,

Mr. BELL said he presumed the object of the chairman was to get the report printed, and that it would not give rise to debate.

Mr. JOHNSON replied that the report was a voluminous one, and that debate would not take place until its contents were known to the House. The object was merely to let both reports be received, and have them printed. He presumed there could be no debate on a motion to print.

Mr. WISE gave notice that he would debate it the moment it touched the Clerk's table.

Mr. PETRIKIN also gave notice that he would debate it.

Mr. JOHNSON again moved a suspension of the rules, and called for the yeas and nays on that motion; which were ordered, and were—ayes 128, nays 28.

So the rules were suspended; and

Mr. JOHNSON sent the report to the CHAIR, and asked that it be printed.

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York said the House would see, by the minority report, that the Committee of Accounts was required, by the resolution of — March, to inquire into the qualification of, and the prices paid for, the stationery furnished to the House by Langtree and O'Sullivan, and contrast them with those of the stationery furnished to the Senate, and to send for persons and papers. Mr. J. said, by referring to the minority report, it would be seen that the committee had refused to do so.

Mr. PETRIKIN moved that the report be recommitted to the Committee of Accounts, with additional instructions to inquire and report to this House,

1. Whether the prices paid by the CLERK of this House for stationery, is a reasonable price, when compared with what stationery can be purchased for from other persons, of like quality.

2. Whether the stationery is not of an inferior kind, when compared with the stationery purchased for this House at the last two sessions of Congress.

3. Whether any allowance was asked by the CLERK, either in writing or verbally, for the difference in exchange between Philadelphia and New York; and, if any, how much?

4. Whether any payment has been made by the CLERK to the contractor, in advance, on his contract, or the auditing of his account by the committee?

Mr. EVERETT called for the reading of the reports.

Mr. WISE wanted to know how much of the report was the work of the committee, and how much was the work of the officer whose accounts were to be investigated, and hoped it would be read.

The reports having been partially read through, and the morning hour, to which the suspension of the rules applied, having expired,

Mr. JONES of Virginia called for the orders of the day.

On the following morning,

The CHAIR announced that the first business in order was the reports of the Committee on Accounts, in relation to the contracts existing between Langtree and O'Sullivan with the Clerk of the House, for furnishing stationery, &c, and the immediate question before the House was the motion to recommit the reports to the Committee on Accounts, with the above instructions, as moved by Mr. PETRIKIN.

After a few words from Messrs. JOHNSTON of New York, and GARLAND of Virginia,

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York obtained the floor, and moved the following as a substitute for the above instructions, viz:

Strike out all after the word "moved," in the first line, and insert the following:

That the resolution which passed this House on the 4th day of March last, upon the subject of stationery, and the reports thereon, and the other matters therein contained, be committed to a select committee, with additional instructions to inquire and report to the House:

1. Whether the prices paid by the Clerk of this House for stationery are reasonable, when compared with prices for which stationery of the same quality could have been purchased of other persons than those of whom he purchased.

2. Whether the stationery is not of an inferior quality, when compared with the stationery furnished this House at the last two sessions of Congress.

3. In what mode or manner the Clerk has advanced or paid money to said Langtree, in relation to said stationery, the amounts paid, and the different times when paid; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York said he was willing that both reports should be printed, and take their ordinary course in the House. Gentlemen would see the inconsistency, the impropriety, and the illiberality, of recommitting the report to the same committee, who had had the matter under consideration for seven weeks, and had presented to the House the only result at which they were able to arrive. The power to send for persons and papers was given to the committee, so that all doubt might be dispelled in relation to the subject, and to prove the facts required by the resolution under which the committee had acted. Mr. J. did not conceive that the duties of the committee had been properly discharged, as they had refused to receive evidence in subversion of the resolution. The design of the mover of it had fallen to the ground. Mr. J. did not propose to go into a discussion as to the merits of the two reports which had been submitted. When it should become necessary, he would do so. He hoped if there was to be a reference of the subject, that the good sense of the House would see the propriety of sending it to a select committee, and not to the committee who had had it under consideration, there to remain seven weeks longer.

Mr. JOSEPH JOHNSON said he regretted that any thing should have occurred to make it necessary for him to impose himself on the patience of the House, even for a single moment. But standing in the relation he did, he considered it as due to himself, and the majority of the committee, that he should make a very few remarks on the subject. Mr. J. then adverted to the circumstances under which the resolution of the 3d of March had been adopted, instructing the committee to make their report. It would be evident to all that the report was based on the instructions given by that resolution, and had been prepared after a patient and diligent investigation by the majority of the committee. He believed the report contained all the facts contemplated by the resolution, and he would ask those gentlemen who were in favor of a reference, to furnish the committee with something on which they could base their action. If any individual or individuals were to have charges preferred against them, let the committee have those charges laid before them, and he would pledge his word that the majority of the committee would not shrink from a full and rigid investigation. And he would embrace the opportunity to say, that if gentlemen contemplated making any charges against the Clerk of the House, in relation to the manner in which he had contracted for stationery, etc. he Mr. J. was authorized by that officer to say that he was very anxious for an investigation into the manner in which he had performed his duties.

If the gentlemen from New York and Pennsylvania should succeed in their effort to refer this subject back again to the committee, without any new matter whereon to base their report, they might be assured that the committee would arrive at no other result.

But with reference to the Clerk of the House, the facts would appear that he had, in all his contracts, taken the utmost precaution to guard the interests of Government. With a view of showing this, he would send to the Clerk's table the two resolutions of 1815 and 1827, under which the Clerk had acted, and by which he had been governed in making the contracts.

The resolutions were then read in the following words:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives be directed immediately after the adjournment of the present, and each succeeding Congress, to advertise three weeks successively, in two newspapers printed in the District of Columbia, for proposals for supplying the Senate and House of Representatives, during the succeeding Congress, with the necessary stationery and printing; which advertisement shall describe the kind of stationery and printing required; and that the proposals to be made be accompanied with sufficient security for their performance. And it shall be the duty of the Secretary and Clerk aforesaid, in the month of April, thereafter, to notify the lowest bidder or bidders (whose securities are deemed sufficient) of the acceptance of his or their proposals: Provided, That this resolution shall not be so construed, as to prevent the Secretary and Clerk aforesaid for contracting for separate parts of the supplies of stationery and printing required to be furnished.

Approved, March 3, 1815.

In the House of Representatives, March 3, 1827:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, be directed to furnish, for the next session of Congress, such stationery for their respective Houses, as they shall think suitable and proper, the joint resolution of the 3rd of March, 1815, to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. JOHNSON then resumed, and said it would be apparent to all, that, under those resolutions, the Clerk was invested with full power to make all the contracts he had entered into. Under the former resolution, power was given to that officer to make contracts for any portion of stationery that he might deem necessary; and under the latter, he was directed to furnish such stationery as he might think proper for the House of Representatives.

Now he, [Mr. J.] was no lawyer, nor would he undertake to enter into a legal debate before a hundred and fifty lawyers; but he was guided by common sense, and he would appeal to every member of the House, whether the Clerk had not acted in accordance with the plain common sense meaning of the resolutions in question. In the resolution of 1827, the Clerk was directed to "furnish" stationery, etc. Now, what was the meaning of the word "furnish?" Would gentlemen pretend to say that the word "furnish" implied that the Clerk should, with his own hands, and without the assistance of any other person, perform all the duties appertaining to his office? For instance; one of the duties was to compile a book. But would gentlemen require that the Clerk should actually go into the printing office, and perform the work of a practical printer? Again; he was required to furnish fuel for the House; but would gentlemen insist that the Clerk should shoulder his axe, enter the forest, and become a wood-chopper?

He would advise the gentleman from New York to be a little careful before he made accusations against the Clerk, and to pause while he was seeking ground of censure with an avidity equal to the bloodhounds of Florida. He would tell the gentleman, however, that even the backwoodsmen were not to be despised, for he had known instaces where backwoodsmen had become Senators, and many a wood-chopper had been appointed to places of trust and honor. He would also tell him that he had known men inhabiting log cabins being aspirants for the first office in the gift of the people.

After some debate on a point of order,

Mr. JOHNSON alluded to the practice of the former Clerk in the purchase of stationery. He reminded gentlemen that for some eight or ten years previous to the last Congress, the Clerk had been in the habit of purchasing directly the stationery for the House. And what was the result? Why, said Mr. J. you fared infinitely worse. The Committee on Accounts have discovered the startling fact, that now, in one of the committee rooms, is unavailable and useless stationery piled up to the amount of some twenty-five or twenty-six thousand dollars! This excess of stationery, under a resolution of the last Congress, had been sent to New York for the purpose of being sold; but when put up at auction, it was found that it would not fech one-fourth the price it had cost; and most of it remains on hand to this day.

Now, with a knowledge of these facts, was it not the duty of the Clerk to adopt some other mode of furnishing the stationery so as to avoid this loss? Yes, it would be remembered that at the last session of Congress the Clerk was admonished to adopt some other means. He accordingly entered into a contract for the furnishing of stationery of the best quality, at a moderate price, with a proviso that all which should not come up to the strict terms of the contract, should be returned. But another objection was, that the Clerk had made a written contract.

To which allow me to reply, that, by the resolution of March 3d, 1827, (the authority which has been referred to, to impeach the validity of the contract in question,) the Clerk was empowered in general and unrestricted terms, to procure the stationery required for the consumption of this House, provided that he did so in a manner, and on terms deemed by him, in his honest judgment, just, and withal favorable to the interest of the United States.

There is nothing, at least that I can see, in the resolution, that limits or restricts the exercise of his (the Clerk's) sound discretion in the discharge of this, a part of his clerical duty.

Now, he would ask, was the Clerk to be blamed for having taken the precaution of producing a written agreement? Was he to be blamed for doing that which was done by every prudent man in the management of his private affairs? It appeared, however, that the act which was esteemed a virtue in private life, was a startling offence when practised by an officer of the Government.

It is certainly of but little consequence whether he proceed in person and in detail, or by proxy, to the original sources of production or importation for the various articles required, as it cannot be supposed that he must of course, as the Clerk of this House, be a nice and discriminating judge of the texture, quality, and fabric of such merchandise. This knowledge, I think, is alone confined to the manufacturer, and appropriate dealer. The importance of this matter is not in the manner, or from whom purchased, whether a general trader, stationer, manufacturer, or importer, whether by the Clerk in person or under his immediate direction, provided he is perfectly convinced of the ampleness of the contract in its stipulations and security.

If honorable gentlemen contend that the resolution of 1827 was limited in its strict letter to the ensuing Congress, leaving the original resolution of 1815 in full revived force at the expiration of that period, the reply is, that, from the nature of the case, there could be nothing peculiar in that single Congress, which should dictate a change of method in procuring supplies of stationery, for that particular brief space alone.

The change introduced by that resolution should be understood in a more general sense, as virtually repealing the resolution of 1815, especially when it is borne in mind that the old method was never subsequently reverted to, and that the intent of the resolution of 1827, here contended for, has therefore received the uninterrupted practical construction of twelve consecutive years, under different officers, whose course has been sanctioned by as many successive Committees on Accounts.

Mr. J. said he had had the honor of serving on the Committee on Accounts during the last two or three Congresses. He had associated there with gentlemen of all political parties. He had had the honor of associating there with his namesake from Maryland, and with the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HAWES] who, as political partisans, disputed every inch of ground. But never, till the commencement of this Congress, had that hydra headed monster, "party," been permitted to enter the committee room of the Committee on Accounts. Until this Congress he and his associates on that committee had looked above all party considerations, and, like good servants of the people, they had put shoulder to shoulder, and labored for the public interests, under no other feelings than those dictated by friendship. He would that he could say the same now; but he could not. He had been told that soon after the meeting of the House at the present session, certain gentlemen, not members of the committee, had attempted to raise a select committee to inquire into this very matter; and that, too, at a time when the standing committees had had no opportunity of making a report. He asked whether such conduct was not an implied censure on the gentlemen composing the standing committees. He repeated, that soon after the commencement of the present session, certain gentlemen had resolutions in their drawers, the object of which was to take the matter out of the hands of the standing committee, and refer it to a select committee.

Now, he would ask, whence arose all this feverish anxiety? Was he to believe that it was for the purpose of manufacturing political capital for the benefit of the Hero of Tippecanoe? or was it because one of the parties to the contract was the Editor of the Democratic Review, a talented young man, who, with firmness and distinguished ability, had advocated the just principles on which our liberties are founded? or was it because that gentleman [Mr. GARLAND] there, sitting at the table, had, at the commencement of the session, displayed a Roman firmness, in refusing to qualify five gentlemen from New Jersey, claiming seats under the sanction of the broad seal of the Governor, and with certificates given in defiance of the expressed will of the people? "When to have done so, (using the language of his own countrymen, recently and kindly expressed,) would have been in derogation of the Constitution of the United States, destructive of the rights of the people, and of the rights of suffrage, and an alarming attempt to wrest the right of election from the people, and vest in their unfaithful, fraudulent, and negligent agents."

The morning hour having expired, the remarks of Mr J. were again suspended until the following day, when

The CHAIR announced that the first business in order was the reports of the Committee of Accounts, in relation to the contracts existing between Langtree and O'Sullivan, with the Clerk of the House, for furnishing stationery, &c. and the immediate question before the House was the motion to recommit the reports to the Committee on Accounts, with the following instructions:

1. Whether the prices paid by the Clerk of this House for stationery, is a reasonable price, when compared with what stationery can be purchased for from other persons, of like quality.

2. Whether the stationery is not of an inferior kind, when compared with the stationery purchased for this House at the last two sessions of Congress.

3. Whether any allowance was asked by the Clerk, either in writing or verbally, for the difference in exchange between Philadelphia and New York; and, if any, how much?

4. Whether any payment has been made by the Clerk to the contractor, in advance, on his contract, or the auditing of his account by the committee?

Mr. JOHNSTON of New York moved the following as a substitute for the above instructions, viz:

That the resolution which passed this House on the fourth day of March last, upon the subject of stationery, and the reports thereon, and the other matters therein contained, be committed to a Select Committee, with additional instructions to inquire and report to the House:

1. Whether the prices paid by the Clerk of this House for stationery are reasonable, when compared with prices for which stationery of the same quality could have been purchased of other persons than those of whom he purchased.

2. Whether the stationery is not of an inferior quality, when compared with the stationery furnished this House at the last two sessions of Congress.

3. In what mode or manner the Clerk has advanced or paid money to said Langtree, in relation to said stationery, the amounts paid, and the different times when paid; and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. JOSEPH JOHNSON said that when, on yesterday, his remarks were suspended by the expiration of the morning hour, it was his intention to have replied in detail to the speeches of the gentleman from New York. But, on reflection, he was satisfied that no good could arise from a continuance of a discussion thus prematurely. With that understanding, therefore, he would merely observe that the motion to recommit the subject to the committee under general instructions, would be only asking the committee to report what they had already done.

As regarded the document accompanying the report of the committee, marked with the letter J. and which had given the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHNSTON] and Pennsylvania [Mr. FETRIKIN] so much pain and labor, he had one word to say. He understood that upwards of eight pages of the report made by the gentleman from New York, were taken up in attempting to prove that this document had been smuggled into the committee room. Now he would call the attention of the House to the resolution read on yesterday, by which it would be seen that, with the exception of the solitary vote of the gentleman from New York, the document was received by the unanimous vote of the committee.

Mr. CHARES JOHNSTON, the member alluded to, rose for the purpose of making some explanation.

Mr. JOSEPH JOHNSON hoped the gentleman from New York would permit him to proceed without interruption, as he had but a few words to say, and would conclude in a very few minutes. He would say, then, that the document, instead of being smuggled into the committee room, had been introduced at the instance of a majority of the committee—the gentleman from New York being the only member who voted against it, and who had generally stood alone on all questions in relation to this matter.

The resolution of the committee calling on the CLERK for a report in the following words:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives furnish to the Committee of Accounts a statement of the contracts other than those dated 25th March and 23d December, 1839, which he has made with S. D. Langtree for lithographing maps, and what lithography, authorized by the last Congress, has been executed by S. D. Langtree under any contract, and at what prices; and that he furnish the committee a tabular statement, in detail, showing the manner in which stationery has been furnished the House of Representatives for the last three preceding Congresses, with the prices paid for the same; stating the sources from which he derives his knowledge of the different matters contained in said statement: Provided, That the committee is not bound to receive the statements as conclusive evidence of the facts set forth therein.

The document called for by this resolution was furnished by a sworn officer of the House, and if there was a single error in any of the statements made therein, he asked the gentleman from New York to lay his finger upon it, and point it out. That document was compiled from papers on file in the Treasury Department, and the country would thank the CLERK for furnishing the valuable information it contained. For his part he would say that, so far as his knowledge extended, he would certify that the CLERK had been governed, in all his transactions, by honorable motives. He would also undertake to say that the stationery furnished by the present officer had been furnished on terms at least equal to those on which stationery had been supplied before.

If the House should deem it proper to recommit the subject, and order an investigation into the conduct of the Clerk, the latter, he was authorized to say, would be very glad to have an opportunity of meeting those charges.

Yes, said Mr. J. the House may, if it chooses, appoint another select committee of investigation, with power to send for persons and papers. The members of the committee might, if they pleased, follow the example of the Swartwout Committee, and proceed to New York, at an expense of nineteen dollars and thirty-three cents per day for each individual, as will be seen by the account of that committee herewith presented:

House of Representatives, Dr.
To Select Committee on Defalcations:

Cash paid Astor House for sixteen and a half days' board of six members, viz. Messrs. Harlan, Wise, Smith, Curtis, Hopkins, Dawson, and Mr. Fendall, their clerk, (wines and liquors not included) - - - - - -	$400 10
Extra charge for fuel, rooms, lights, etc.	110 00
Paid messenger - - - -	6 44
Messrs. Owens, Foster, and Wagener's bill at American Hotel - -	210 00
Mileage, 500 miles, for nine members	1,800 00
Same for clerk - - - -	200 00
	$2,736 54

But this was not the only expense: the printing alone growing out of this investigation amounted to some eighteen thousand dollars, so far as he had ascertained.

They might, if they thought proper, lay another tax upon Government of $50,000 which had been paid for another committee of investigation, (that of 1837, of which Messrs Wise and Peyton were members.)

But, (said Mr. J.) let us not be decoyed further into error by the illegal, unauthorized, and dangerous example set us by our economical Whig friends in relation to what is erroneously called "Investigating Committees," obviously got up to influence elections, and to subserve party purposes in President making, at the expense of the hard earnings of the people. Sir, if precedent is to govern in future; if the example set by the committee to which I have referred, is to influence the future action of Congress, then have we established the principle that the per diem compensation to investigating committees, who may chance to travel out of the District of Columbia, shall be at the rate of nineteen dollars and thirty-three cents—liquors not included.

Where, I ask, was the never-tiring, the sleepless vigilance, then, of those sentinels on the watch tower, now so clamorous in favor of economy and reform? Sir, they were voting into their own pockets nineteen dollars and thirty-three cents per day, while many of their honest and more patriotic constituents were toiling from the early breaking forth of the dawn till long after the sun had hid his face in the far West, for the mere pittance of fifty cents.

Mr. Speaker, the object, then, was to create distrust in the public mind, and to destroy the confidence of the people. It failed to produce the desired effect: the arrow missed its mark. The whole contrivance ended in smoke, as will also the investigation now proposed. The Swartwout investigation cost the Government eighteen thousand nine hundred ninety-seven dollars and eighty cents, and gentlemen may, if they chose, impose a similar tax on the people for this occasion, but rest assured a day of reckoning will come.

Mr. J. concluded by opposing a recommitment of the report, unless additional and specific charges were made.

REMARKS OF MR. CONNOR, OF NORTH CAROLINA.

In the House of Representatives, April 21, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on Mr. STANLY's motion to strike from the appropriation bill a part of the sum proposed for the branch mint at Charlotte, North Carolina.

Mr. CONNOR said: Mr. Chairman, I regret that the branch mint of North Carolina should be attacked, before it is even properly tested as an experiment. Its location is in the gold region of North Carolina, where, not only the people there, and immediately around it, are benefited, and feel a deep interest in it, but the people of South Carolina at large, and perhaps those of Virginia also. A gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] attacked it the last session, and distinguished himself perhaps more for the violence of the attack than any thing else; and then, if I mistake not, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] had voted for, and sustained the mint. Then, Mr. Chairman, an attack from the Pennsylvania gentleman would not have been surprising; it was to be expected. The principal mint is located in Philadelphia, his own State. His principles in favor of a monopoly, independent of his local or State feeling upon the subject, might be a good reason why he should desire to abolish other similar institutions, in order that the Mint at Philadelphia might monopolize the whole coinage of the country; and that we, the people of North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia, should be compelled to send the gold gathered from and in our own country, to Philadelphia, to be coined. But, sir, the attack this year does not come from him; but from another quarter, least expected. Yes, sir, strange as it may appear, it comes this year from one of North Carolina's own sons, [Mr. STANLY] who seems desirous of abolishing this institution of his own State, and to deprive the people of North Carolina, as well as those of South Carolina and Virginia, who are interested in the gold finding, of a home market for the product of their labor, and thereby compel them to carry their gold to the monopoly in Philadelphia, there to have it coined, or to be shaved, by selling it in the rough or crude state. Sir, I regret this; and why should it be so? The people of my district, where this branch of the mint is located, as well as the people of the whole State have contributed, largely, and freely their money to the Treasury of the nation, for the support of their Government and their country. With the exception of the amount used in the eastern portion of the State or the seacoast—and that amount small—this is all the money that the nation has expended in North Carolina. This is, in fact, the first money expended in that part of the State, where the mint is located, though it comprises nearly two-thirds of the population of the State. And this sum is small indeed when compared with the disbursements made in other States; yet the gentleman from North Carolina would deprive his own State of the benefits arising from it. Sir, it is true, the expenditures in constructing, and purchasing the necessary machinery, &c. is large. It was also to be expected that the products of this mint would be small—$262,000 having been coined in the two years that it has been in operation. When we look to the mother Mint at Philadelphia, we find that, in the first three years of its existence, there was coined only about $500,000—that Mint coining for the whole country, too. The disproportion of the product, compared with the expenditures there, I imagine would be as great as that at Charlotte; and would the gentleman, had he been in Congress at that day, have thought of abolishing it? I think not. The branch mints are young—in fact, in their infancy. They are, as yet, an experiment. Congress deemed it proper to make that experiment in 1834, when they ordered their construction. They then met their general approbation—the benefit of the people and the good of the country were the objects. Gentlemen may have been disappointed in their calculations as to the amount that should have been coined. Circumstances unforeseen and uncontrollable may have prevented such an amount as some might have expected. The high price of cotton contributed to prevent a full development of the operations of the Southern branch mints. It operated, during the short existence of these mints, as it had heretofore done, to withdraw the labor from the mines. When the price of that staple is low, the quantity of gold increases, because the gold finding and mining being the most profitable employments, labor is brought back to these objects. This probably always will be the case. The people in my district, and the surrounding country, experience benefits from that branch mint, that they are unwilling to give up; and I feel confident that this House will not deprive them of this interest, by prematurely abolishing the mint. They are all interested in it—many, very many, of them, are the owners of the land on which the gold is found, and are employed in digging and hunting for it. When gathered they take it to the mint, and there dispose of it for its value; and, as log cabins are the go with the Opposition here, I will tell those gentlemen that very many of my good constituents in the gold region live in log cabins; but they are sound Democrats, and not in the slightest degree tainted or tinctured with Abolitionism. Now, Mr. Chairman, suppose the gentlemen were to succeed in abolishing the mint at Charlotte, and of course the branches in Georgia and New Orleans—(but of those I shall say nothing, because the Representatives from those States are fully competent to defend them—perhaps more so than I am to defend our North Carolina establishment—) what would be the consequence? Why, sir, almost a total loss of the amount of money expended in their construction and for the machinery, to say nothing of the amount paid the officers, laborers, &c.—and that, in two years after they have gone into operation. Sir, I cannot for a moment suppose that Congress would thus disregard the rights and interest of those portions of the country. This would not be all, sir. By abolishing those branch mints, you would at once establish a monopoly at Philadelphia. You require all the gold that may be obtained to be sent there; and might not the Government as well say to the people of the South, that they shall carry their cotton to Philadelphia as to carry their gold? Both are products of our country and the result of our labor. Those establishments were intended for the convenience and benefit of the people.

Very many have realized benefits, and very many more will derive benefits, from them.

The gentleman from North Carolina has made many charges against the superintendent of the mint at Charlotte, Colonel Wheeler—that he is a stockholder and director in a bank; that he engaged in electioneering, attending public meetings, and nominating candidates for Governors. Sir, I am acquainted with Mr. Wheeler; but his private and pecuniary affairs I know nothing of myself. He may be a stockholder and a bank director. I do not know how or in what way the gentleman derives his information; but I should think the gentleman is misinformed. I never heard of it before; nor have I ever heard that Mr. Wheeler was conspicuous at public meetings. There would seem not to be a necessity for it in Mecklenburg, where he resides. The Republicans are largely in the majority there. I heard, though I do not remember to have seen it in print, that Mr. Wheeler did attend a meeting in Charlotte, the village in which he resides; and if that was the one to which the gentleman alludes, where he was and nominating a candidate for Governor, I doubt not but that he is correct, though I do not know the fact myself. Yet I feel very confident, knowing Mr. Wheeler's political principles, that he would have supported General Saunders, the Republican candidate for Governor. In this Mr. Wheeler has only exercised the rights and privileges that as yet belongs to every freeman, and I congratulate my constituents, and thank my God that the sedition law that is to put a gag on freemen, has not passed Congress. Sir, I shall say no more, and will take my seat with confidence that the proposed amendment will be rejected.

On Mr. COST JOHNSON's motion to strike out the appropriation for the branch mints in Georgia and New Orleans.

WEDNESDAY, April 22.

Mr. CONNOR would trouble the committee with but few remarks. He had hoped, after the remarks made yesterday, it would not have been necessary for him to say any thing now in relation to the branch mint at Charlotte; but the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. STANLY] had brought forward a variety of charges against the Superintendent. The charges were unknown to him until this moment; and although he could say but little about them, he would unite with the gentleman in expressing his unqualified disapprobation of the application of any portion of the money to the purpose of flowers and shrubs, and other things merely ornamental. He was glad, however, to find the amount so small; he had feared, when the gentleman commenced his remarks, and the reading of the list, that it was much greater; and although the amount was small, if it should appear that this superintendent abused his power, or used the money extravagantly, or that any of those with whom he acted, had committed abuses, he would be ready and willing to express his disapprobation of it. There were, however, other considerations in relation to the matter. Blame must rest somewhere; and he thought the gentleman from North Carolina could not say that he was altogether free from it, more than himself, and Congress, by whom the appropriation was made.

Mr. C. then asked Mr. STANLY if he had not himself voted for this very appropriation?

[Mr. S. said that he would answer the gentleman when he came to reply to him.]

Mr. C. said that the gentleman had acknowledged yesterday that he had voted for the mints last year. This appropriation was made the year before. He had not examined the journal; but, as usual on appropriation bills, the vote was a silent one; and that gentleman, as well as himself, must be considered as voting for it, inasmuch as either of us did not oppose it; and, therefore, the one was as deep in the mud as the other was in the mire. Mr. C. regretted that it was now too late to correct it; the expenditure had been made, and the account adjusted; were it otherwise, and to be now settled, for one, he would decide against it. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman appears to be more out of temper with the officer (Col. Wheeler) and his politics, than with the mint and the extravagance. So far as he knew, the superintendent of the mint was a very clever man, and he was aware that his political principles were directly the opposite of the principles of the gentleman from North Carolina. Mr. Wheeler was a Republican and supporter of the Administration, and if he attended the meeting which nominated General Saunders, he felt confident that he supported him as the candidate of the Republican party for Governor. The gentleman seems to think it censurable in Mr. Wheeler for having charged for the services of his own servant. Sir, said Mr. C. Congress had appropriated a certain amount of money for the employment of laborers in and about the mint; that being the case, there could certainly be no crime, and he thought no impropriety, in Mr. Wheeler receiving pay for the hire of one of his own servants, provided he charged no more for his than the Government would have had to pay for some other; and it seems he did not. Ten dollars per month has been about the usual price in that part of the country for a good servant. Some may bring more. So far as the Government was concerned, it could certainly make no difference. The gentleman also alleges that the superintendent is a stockholder and director in a bank. Mr. C. could only repeat what he had said yesterday in relation to that charge, that he knows nothing of it himself, and had never heard of it until yesterday; but he would say that he was surprised to hear that objection made to Col. Wheeler by the gentleman from North Carolina, he being a Bank man himself: it ought to have been, with him, he supposed, a recommendation. But supposing that to be case, and he would not say it was not so, was it a crime for a Democrat to have and to hold bank stock? Does the gentleman not know some Democrats in North Carolina that own bank stock? Although the Democrats generally had but little surplus, yet sometimes one might be found who had so managed to save a little, and invested it in bank. In some instances they were profited by it, but in most they got their fingers burnt. But, said Mr. C. strong as my aversion is to banks, and they are strong, I confess, I would not consider the fact of a man holding a little stock in a bank aught to disqualify him for office. He was glad to say his constituents were free from banking influence, or any other gag. They were yet free, and, as freemen, would exercise all the privileges belonging to them; and, so far as it was in his power, he would protect and support them in their rights.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] had introduced the coinage of Mr. Bechler; that is a case in point; and will show clearly the propriety of continuing the branch mint in North Carolina. He is located, I believe, in the county of Rutherford, and said to have coined about two millions. This amount was gathered principally in Rutherford and Burke counties; some may have gone to him from Mecklenburg—I do not know so. There was another in Georgia, a Mr. Reed, who coined, how much I know not. The amount coined at those two places, entered into the circulation, and the country had the benefit of it. Bechler's coin, I understand, is pure, without alloy, and that is the difference between it and the coin of the Government. This establishment was found convenient, serviceable, and indeed very valuable to the people, saving to them much. The gentlemen from Pennsylvania and Maryland [Mr. OGLE and Mr. JOHNSON] would abolish those branch mints on account of the large sums necessary to erect and keep them in operation, and the small profits derived as yet from them. They have been, sir, but two years in operation, and have coined over $746,000. How was it with the mint at Philadelphia? The first three years of its existence, the whole amount coined was only $453,541 80. Did any one, or could any one, have thought of abolishing that institution at that time? Sir, as a gentleman before me has remarked, who ever heard of the coining of money being a profitable and money making business? It is, and must always be, expensive to nations having and employing them. To what will the argument and reasoning of gentlemen lead, on the same principle as a basis? It would not be difficult to show that nine-tenths of the public works and buildings should be abolished in the United States; for many of your public buildings and works have cost from half a million to a million of dollars. There are none here, however economical, that would abandon and abolish those, because less valuable and inferior ones might be put up; and, too, sir, on the same principle, the gold found in our own country, and the bullion bought, might be sent to London, and coined at the British mint, and returned, at a cheaper rate than our expenditure in doing it. But would any man for a moment consent to such a course for any reason whatever? Suppose gentlemen were to succeed in destroying the branch mints? What would be the effect on North Carolina and the regions around, where gold was found? How was it before the establishment of these? And where did the gold—amounting annually for some years to between one and two millions—go? It left North Carolina, except what went to Beckler's, but never returned. One portion of it was bought up on the spot by foreigners, and went direct to Europe. Another portion of it—gathered mostly by the poor man, who had to submit to the operation of being shaved by the merchant and speculator. These carried it to Philadelphia, where it was coined, not for the purposes of circulation, but in those times it was turned over to that monster, the Bank of the United States, who sent it to Europe, where they received a premium of some six or seven per cent. that went, not into the pockets of the people or the Government, but into the pockets of the Bank. In those days, our mint coined substantially for the British. Neither the gold or the per cent. ever got back to the poor gold-digger and finder.

Now, sir, our mints coin for the benefit of our own people. In my part of the country, until within the last few years, gold coin was rarely to be seen; and many there, who had lived to a good age who had never seen on eagle or half eagle, the coin of their own country. Since 1834, the case was different: it was frequently to be met with, and all had a chance of getting hold of a piece. Mr. C. remembered years ago that, as a matter of favor, at the close of each session, the Bank of the United States allowed each member to have about forty dollars worth of gold. It was received most thankfully, and was to most of us an interesting sight. He had, at this day, one or two of those precious coins that he kept as a matter of curiosity.

In conclusion, he would ask why should those branch mints be attacked. He would not doubt but that the gentlemen had been influenced by proper and correct motives. They, in his opinion, had failed in assigning reasons satisfactory for abolishing them. It must be apparent to all, if they could succeed in abolishing those institutions, that the large amount expended in their construction, machinery, &c. would measurably be lost to the Government. Such buildings and fixtures in a country town, in the interior of the country, would not bring perhaps the one-twentieth part of the amount expended in putting them there. He was as much disposed to economize and check extravagance, he hoped, as any gentleman. Give those mints a fair trial: they have been only two years in operation. It was not reasonable in that time to suppose they would do a great deal. If, after a fair trial of the experiment is had, it should turn out that they do not answer the purpose, and that the expenditure will not justify their continuance, let them be then discontinued. He could not, in justice to his constituents, give his vote to abolish them now, and felt confident that the House would reject the proposition.

THE DADE INSTITUTE.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 29, 1840.

The bill granting one township of land to the Territory of Florida, for the establishment of the Dade Institute, being taken up,

Mr. FULTON rose to explain the object of the bill, which was, to erect a monument to the brave dead, who had fallen in the wilds of Florida, fighting the battles of their country. In erecting this monument to the memory of the illustrious deceased, it combined the advantage of a literary institution, in which the rising generation, while it was taught what would render the youth of the country valuable members of society, would be inspired with a love of glory, and emulation of those who had offered up their lives as a sacrifice on the very spot where it was contemplated to found this institution. He thought the interest that must be felt throughout the whole Union for the fate of those gallant and chivalrous men who had met death far from their homes, must commend this measure to the favorable consideration of the American people. Where could there be a more magnificent undertaking, or one more worthy of the American character, than to erect over the ashes of fallen herces a national monument, at once to perpetuate the glory of the fallen sons of the Republic, and to instruct the rising ones in their duty to their country? He hoped the bill before them might not meet with any serious objection. The desire of the American people to mark this spot, to hold it up, like Thermopylæ of old, as a memento of the noble sacrifice of life to patriotic considerations, he thought, should induce every Senator present to lend it his aid.

It is not perceived that any constitutional objection can be made to making the grant in question, as it is proposed to be made of the lands in the Territory of Florida, which is now under the jurisdiction of the United States, and where the lands were purchased by the Government, and where the ownership is not, in any way, restricted. We have clearly the right to dispose of these lands for national objects. The establishment of the contemplated institution would enhance the value of the public domain in Florida, afford the means of instruction to the rising generation, and of inspiring them with a proper veneration and a noble emulation of those heroes who have offered up their lives for their country, and become a lasting memorial of those patriotic deeds which are so peculiarly entitled to the nation's gratitude.

It is true that Florida has already had two townships of land granted to her for a seminary of learning, and that only two townships have been granted to the other new States for the same purpose, with the exception of the State of Ohio, to which State three townships have been granted by Congress—an additional township having been granted to her for the erection of a college, which, it is thought, cannot have any thing like the claims upon the nation which the institution, now contemplated to be established, must be admitted to possess. It is, therefore, hoped that the granting of another township to Florida for the purpose of establishing the Dade Institute, will not be objected to. It is known to every Senator that Florida has so small a portion of fertile lands, that it is impossible to select even a few sections of good land in that Territory; and that the two townships already selected cannot be of any great value, and that it would, therefore, in her case, require more than three townships to place her on a footing, in this respect, with the other new States.

When we recollect the number of gallant officers and soldiers who have offered up their lives in Florida, and now lie buried in her wilds, without any thing to mark the spot where they fell, every American heart must respond to the wish to erect to their memory a national monument, by which their names may be handed down to posterity. This monument is to be erected near where the noble Dade and his associates so heroically fell, and where his whole command offered up their lives for their country; and it is, therefore, hoped that the bill on the table will receive the sanction of the Senate.

It is not considered necessary to say more at this time, but if objections are made, an attempt will be made to answer them.

Mr. SOUTHARD professed to have as much respect for the memory of the patriotic individual alluded to as any one, and the name was as much cherished by his family; but he must confess that the project before them did not strike him in the most favorable light. To his mind, there was something out of the ordinary mode of proceeding in calling for a township of land to build a monumental college for the purpose of perpetuating a military achievement. What the fighting of military men had to do with the erection of seminaries of learning, he was entirely at a loss to conceive; and gallant and noble as was the conduct of Dade and his confederates, still it did not appear to him to warrant the selection of that isolated case, when there were so many thousands of the Revolution and of the late war whose deeds were equally chivalrous and glorious, without a grave-stone to tell the spot where their relics repose. What connection, what appropriateness was there in erecting a monumental college as a tribute to military prowess? Again: apart from all those considerations, where was this seminary to be erected? Did not the massacre take place far from the abodes of civilization, and would they place it there? Where were the children to be educated at this college? Was it right or proper to build a college not so much with regard to fit its inmates for the duties of civil life as to serve as a monument of military glory? He would go so as far as any man to disseminate the blessings of education among the people of our common country, and had done as much, devoted as many hours, and labored as hard, for the benefit of Florida, as any other person, and would be glad to do more where he could give vote consistently; but he could not lend his sanction to reach an object which, when attained, would not be likely to be attended with any beneficial results.

Mr. FULTON would, only observe, in reply to the remarks of the Senator from New Jersey, that although the population of the Territory might not at the present time afford sholars, yet the day was not distant when Florida must become both populous and prosperous. It must be recollected that it would take some years to build this monument, even after the Indians were removed, and by that time the country would, in all probability, be closely settled. The Legislature of Floriba had asked this measure at the hands of Congress; the sympathy of officers of the army was actively excited in its behalf, and indeed he did think there was a general feeling throughout the country in its favor. With regard to the association of literature with monuments of military glory, he could see no great objection. Monuments of all kinds served to perpetuate the glory of individuals. Look to the grave-yard of Congress—were there no monuments there? Look to the monument at the base of the Capitol, where the deeds of the illustrious dead were recorded in imperishable marble—and did not these things seem to inspire the living with a generous emulation of fame? He thought the object laudable and praiseworthy, and that it ought to receive the sanction of the Senate.

Mr. BUCHANAN held the memory of Major Dade in high estimation, and would be willing to accord every just tribute of respect; but he could not consent to vote for the bill before them without some further information. While he was ready to admit that the public lands could not be more usefully applied than to seminaries of learning, yet he must know, when given, that they are to be successfully applied. What security had been afforded in this case, that, if the land were granted, the college would be erected by the Territory? Again: the bill provided that the college should be built on the spot where Major Dade and his comrades had fallen. Was that a proper site? was it in the centre of population? Had all these necessary investigations been made? and if not, would it be proper to pass the bill before these matters were fully considered? He would, therefore, suggest to his friend from Arkansas, to let the bill lie over; his remarks had called public attention to the subject, and at a future time it could be introduced with a better chance of success. He would, therefore, move to lay the bill on the table, expressing his willingness to withdraw that motion, if any Senator desired to debate it.

The bill was laid on the table.

SPEECH OF MR. PARRIS,

OF MAINE.

In the House of Representatives, February 11, 1840—On the Cumberland Road, and constitutional power to make internal improvements.

Mr. PARRIS said: Mr. Speaker: If I were to judge from the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MASON,] who has just resumed his seat, I should infer that all his batteries were directed towards the members from the South, for interposing their objections to the constitutionality of appropriations for the Cumberland road. Now I, said Mr. P. as a Representative from the North, would interpose my objections on constitutional grounds, as well as against the injustice and inexpediency of this measure. The gentleman from Ohio, in a long and able speech, at last succeeded in proving, what all are willing to admit, and what no one has ever denied, that the States of Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, and Missouri, were entitled, under the compact made with them by the General Government at the time they were admitted into the Union, to five per cent. or one-twentieth part of the nett proceeds of the sales of the public lands within their limits, to be applied to the making of roads leading to and through them. No one, I apprehend, will attempt to deny that such obligations were imposed upon this Government, to be observed in good faith, when they become sovereign States of this Union.

But another important question is here naturally presented: Has the General Government performed its part of the compact? This is the great question to be answered; and upon the issue rests the fate of this bill. Should I succeed in demonstrating to the House by documentary evidence that millions upon millions from the Treasury have been expended for this measure, after every obligation on the part of the Government had been fulfilled, I shall have a right to expect the co-operation of every advocate for economy and reform, here or elsewhere, in arresting the progress of a system of internal improvements, which I believe to be unconstitutional, inexpedient, and unjust.

I hold in my hand an act of Congress, passed April 30, 1802, for the admission of Ohio into the Union, which I ask permission to read to this House. The 7th section of the act provides: That one-twentieth part (or five per cent.) of the nett proceeds of the lands lying within the said State, sold by Congress from and after the 30th day of June next, after deducting all expenses incident to the same, shall be applied to the laying out and making public roads leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to the Ohio, to the said State, and through the same. I find, also, by a subsequent law, passed on the 3d day of March, 1803, that Congress appropriated three per cent. of the said five per cent. to laying out and making roads within the State of Ohio, leaving two per cent. of the appropriation, contained in the first mentioned act, for the laying out and making roads to that State. The States of Indiana and Illinois were also admitted into the Union upon the same conditions as Ohio.

The gentleman from Illinois (Gov. REYNOLDS) says he asks an appropriation for the continuation of this road through the Western States in fulfilment of a contract. Can that gentleman, or any other member of this House, point me to any other contract than the one I have just read, embraced in the act of admission? No, sir, no other contract favoring this claim, to which this Government is a party, has any existence. I am now prepared to spread before this House and the country, evidence which cannot be battered down, to prove that the General Government has MORE than complied with the terms of the compact. I refer gentlemen to document No. 350, from the Secretary of the Treasury, laid before the House during the last Congress, which gives, as the result, the whole amount of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, and the amount appropriated for the construction of the Cumberland road. In that document I find the aggregate amount appropriated for the making and repairing of the Cumberland road, leading from the navigable waters emptying into the Atlantic, to and through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to be $6,318,739

Add to this the three per cent. fund, which those States have received from the Government, and expended on other roads within their limits	1,271,746
Amounting in the aggregate to -	7,590,485
The five per cent. fund on the nett proceeds of the public land sold in Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, up to the 1st of January, 1838, which they are entitled to by the compact, amounts to only - - - - -	2,119,578
Difference between the two aggregates	$5,471,907

Here, then, we have presented a fact as incontrovertible as it will be astounding to the country, that the Treasury has been robbed of more FIVE MILLIONS FOUR HUNDRED AND SEVENTY THOUSAND DOLLARS of the people's money, and squandered in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to make them roads, at an average expense of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars per mile. If the authority I have here introduced be correct, and I challenge contradiction, then it is sufficiently shown that these compacts have been more than fulfilled by the Federal Government, and that these States, now asking an annuity of about HALF A MILLION of dollars, to be expended on this road, are indebted to the Government upon every principle of equity, FIVE AND A HALF MILLIONS OF DOLLARS.

But amid this profuse expenditure of the public money, the country naturally inquires where and when it is to terminate? A document is laid upon our tables showing that engineers estimate the expense necessary in completing this work at about eight millions of dollars, additional to the amount already expended. I find, also, that one single mile of this road is estimated to cost $211,000, and another mile the enormous sum of $460,000. The expense in paving and Macadamizing this road for a distance of more than six hundred miles, through parts of country yet an unbroken wilderness, exceeds per mile the cost of any street in any city of this Union.

Will it, then, be contended by any gentlemon of this House, that the Federal Government is bound, under the compact, to enter into such a splendid system of internal improvements? Was it originally contemplated by Mr. Jefferson, whose authority the gentleman from Ohio invoked, that this road should be a magnificent structure, or that a visionary project should grow out of it, affording any portion of the people a pretence for plundering the Government? No, sir. The only object of setting apart one-twentieth part of the nett proceeds of the sale of the public lands, as originally claimed by its advocates, was to construct a road from the Ohio river to the Atlantic coast, to facilitate the transportation of their surplus products to market. They wished to overcome the Alleghany mountains, those natural barriers which intercepted all communication between the inhabitants residing upon the banks of the Ohio and those upon the Atlantic frontier. The road, so loudly called for by the early settlers of Ohio, then pioneers of the forest, has been made. The Alleghanies, that once presented insuperable obstacles to internal intercourse, have been surmounted. The reasons, which operated upon the country to construct this work, have long since ceased to exist. But has this road terminated on the banks of the Ohio? No, sir. It has crossed the Ohio river, and now pervades the whole extent of that great and powerful State. But when and where, sir, is this road to terminate? On the banks of the Mississippi? Or at the base of the Rocky mountains? No. These are barriers, say the friends of this visionary project, which the National Treasury must subdue; it can be limited only by the shores of the Pacific. The cost in passing the Alleghanies, the most difficult and expensive part of the road, was originally estimated at $6,000 per mile. You have extended it about six hundred miles into the level praries of the West, and now a single mile is computed by engineers to cost the enormous sum of $460,000. Let the work go on under the sanction of this Government, and its expense increase in the same progressive ratio, and the wealth of this continent would be exhausted in its completion.

To exhibit to the country how preposterous is the claim of these States to the further munificence of Government, and to show what a vast amount of the public domain has been squandered upon them, I have but to refer to an act of Congress, passed February 28, 1823, granting a quantity of land, equal to two miles in width on a road, (to defray the expense of its construction,) commencing at the Miami rapids, and terminating at the Western boundary of the Connecticut Western Reserve, in the State of Ohio; to an act passed March 3, 1827, appropriating public lands in Ohio to making a turnpike road from Columbus to Sandusky city; also to several acts granting large tracts of the most valuable public lands in the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, for the purposes of education.

We are told that these States have not taxed the Government lands within their limits? And why have they not done it? Beeause, sir, no such power is given them by the Constitution or the compact. Their expressed stipulations with the Government in the acts of admission, preclude for ever any such pretensions. I will read from the act passed April 30, 1802, which provides "that every and each tract of land sold by Congress from and after the thirtieth day of June next; shall be and remain EXEMPT from ANY TAX laid by order, or under the authority of the State, whether for State, county, or township, or any other purpose whatever, for the term of five years, from and after the day of sale."

If an attempt has been made by any member to leave an impression upon the House that this Government is under any obligations to these States for any acts of disinterested benevolence, in forbearing to exercise the right of taxation upon these lands, such an inference would be most erroneous and deceptive.

It now becomes important to inquire for what object these lands were ceded to the General Government, and how far they have answered the purposes of their destination. If I have understood correctly, the public lands were ceded by the States of Virginia, North Carolina, and Georgia, to the Government, not for the purposes of education or internal improvements, nor to be appropriated for any State or local object, but for the purpose of liquidating the public debt that accrued to the country in our Revolutionary struggle; and it can be clearly shown, by authenticated tables, that the lands have in no part answered the purposes of their destination. The debt of the Revolution has been liquidated with the moneys received from customs, and not from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, as stipulated by the Government in the acts of cession. How, then, stands the account between the public lands and the public Treasury?

The cost of the acquisition and management of the public lands amounts to -	$102,220,000
For the extinguishment of the Indian title - - -	85,974,000
Expense of protecting the settlers in Florida - - - -	15,000,000
For the fund reserved out of the proceeds of the sales for the use of the new States - - -	4,410,000
Amounting in all to - -	207,604,000
Receipts from land sales - -	104,000,000
Making a balance due the Treasury of	$103,604,000

The fact, then, will be admitted, that the public lands have not only failed to answer the purpose of their destination, in discharging the debt of the Revolution, but are now indebted to the Treasury for their purchase money and management, more than ONE HUNDRED AND THREE MILLIONS OF DOLLARS. Who, then, can doubt the injustice of diverting that source of the revenues of this Government, the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, to works of internal improvement? Every dollar of the vast amount of money, abstracted from the Treasury and expended on the Cumberland road, was paid in by the customs. And who have paid the customs? The people of Maine and other States, who have no interest in this work, and who have contributed most largely to complete it, and not those of the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, that are receiving its exclusive benefits.

The public documents on file show that, in the ten years ending January 1, 1837, Maine alone paid into the Treasury, by imposts and duties, - - - - $3,260,418

While Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, paid but - - - - 13,586

The people of Maine have paid into the Treasury an annual average amount of - - - - 326,000

While Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, have paid but - - - 1,300

THREE HUNDRED DOLLARS have we contributed in Maine to defray the expenses of this Government, where these three States have contributed ONE DOLLAR.

But we are told that this great disproportion is made up to Maine and other Atlantic States in appropriations for light-houses, harbors, forts, and arsenals. It is not my purpose, at this time, to be diverted from the question immediately under consideration to inquire whether appropriations for light-houses, harbors, &c. are of a national, or merely local, character. When that subject shall be properly before us, I will then be prepared to resist any appropriation called for from any section of this Union that is not clearly authorized by the Constitution. But suppose, for a moment, the appropriations made to Maine were for local objects and benefited us alone; how, then, would stand our account with those States?

In the four years ending January 1, 1838, Maine paid into the national Treasury $1,304,000, and received for light-houses, forts, &c. $240,000. We have received but one dollar where we have paid six. But how stands the case in those Western States? In thirty years they have paid, by duties, but $25,000, and have drawn from the Treasury nearly eight millions of dollars. Paid into the Treasury but one dollar where they have taken four hundred. In what part of the Constitution do gentlemen recognise the power to subject the people of the North or South to make roads for the West? Do they find in the clause "to provide for the common defence and general welfare?" Sir, the old Federal doctrine, once advocated, that this clause of the Constitution gave Congress the power to work every species of injustice and rascality, under some plausible pretext of the public good, has been long since exploded. Is it found where power is given "to establish post roads," or "to regulate commerce?" I am aware that the power to appropriate money for the Cumberland road has been claimed, at different periods, under all these clauses of the Constitution. But now all are abandoned, and its advocates rely solely on the stipulations of the compact. But whether you look to the compact or the Constitution itself for a foundation on which to rest this claim, it will be found as baseless as an inverted pyramid.

The power which the people of the several States delegated to Congress was meant to be "clear," "express," or "particular," or at least that no reasonable doubt should exist as to its nature and extent, before it could be exercised. If power had been claimed under the Constitution, by its framers, to enter into a splendid system of internal improvements, and thereby recognise the gross injustice of robbing one portion of the country to benefit another, not a State of the Confederacy would have ratified it. I contend that Congress has no power to make appropriations for improving territory over which this Government cannot exercise exclusive jurisdiction. The Constitution gives to Congress the power "to exercise exclusive legislation over this District, and to exercise like authority over all places purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be, for the erection of forts, magazines, arsenals, dock-yards, and other needful buildings." If we had power to construct roads and exercise jurisdiction over them, the strong arm of Government could then be extended over any portion of this Union, and, with its might, prostrate not only the sovereignty of the States, but the liberties of the people.

Is it not enough that the people of the West possess a country that claims many advantages over the North in the temperature of its climate and fertility of its soil, without asking us to make their roads at an expense of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars per mile? Is it not enough that those who have taken possession of our public lands, in open defiance of law, have demanded and received at our hands, pre-emption acts, graduation laws, and laws confirming their titles? Sir, if I could but take these gentlemen to my district, and there let them witness the enormous expense and toil that an industrious and enterprising population are subjected to in making their roads passable through a mountain region, I could not fail to satisfy them of the gross injustice of plundering them of their hard earnings to make roads for squatters and pillagers upon our public domain. Such an outrage upon our rights and our property is not only making infractions and innovations upon the most sacred obligations of the Constitution, but it is tearing out its very vitals. If the people of the West want roads, we are very willing they should make them at their own expense, as the people of the North have done, without asking the aid of the General Government. But if gentlemen will point out to me a constitutional power for repaying to the people of Maine what they have expended for making roads the last fifty years, I shall be better prepared to reconcile an appropriation for the Cumberland road to the principles of equity and the constitutional powers and obligations of this Government.

The result of a system of internal improvements, as pursued by Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Louisiana, which has loaded their people with a debt of about SEVENTY-FIVE MILLIONS, should warn this Government against its adoption. I opposed the introduction of a system of internal improvements in my own State, at a time when this mania was sweeping through the country with such fearful rapidity, and I can now congratulate the people in escaping the vortex.

In the year 1825, an appropriation for the Cumberland road was before Congress, and I was rejoiced to find one act during the temporizing policy of Mr. Monroe's Administration, that was worthy of commendation: that was his veto of the bill. [Here Mr. P. read some extracts from Mr. Monroe's veto message.]

At one time, we are told by the friends of this work, that it will enhance the value of the public lands. If experience has not proved this illusive, why have we been called upon so often to graduate their price? In 1802, the public lands sold, in Ohio, for two dollars per acre; but now they are sold for one dollar and a quarter. Besides, sir, I am told that there is not a foot of the Government lands within fifty miles of the Cumberland road.

At another time, we are told, it will bind this Union together by the strongest ties. Is this Union, I ask, only kept together by the money that is robbed from the pockets of the people of one section, to be expended in another? Is that the only ligament that binds the Western country to this Union? I cannot, I WILL not believe it. I hold that this Union is bound together by more sacred and stronger ties than mere dollars and cents: it is cemented with the blood of those patriots of the Revolution, which poured out like water, on the fields of Lexington and Bunker's Hill, at Saratoga and Yorktown; and it cannot be dissolved until the deeds of a Washington, a Warren, and a Montgomery, are lost to the knowledge of mankind.

Mr. Speaker, I have already detained the House longer than I intended when I first rose. In conclusion, permit me to add, that, if the principles on which alone this measure can succeed, find favor in this House and favor throughout the Union—if it is to become the settled policy of this Government, you might as well trample your Constitution at once under foot, and commit the destinies of the country to the unrestrained discretion of the central power. A splendid consolidation will tread upon the heels of a splendid system of internal improvements. This central power, with its hundred arms, and in every hand a bribe, will penetrate every State of this Union. You may, for a while, indeed, wear the mere forms and trappings of a free State; but the canker will be at the heart. A gorgeous despotism, crushing beneath its iron heel the liberties of the people, or the scattered fragments of the Union, wasting their blood and treasure in mutual strife, will tell the sad story of this last great experiment of free institutions.

SPEECH OF MR. DUNCAN, OF OHIO,

In the House of Representatives, April 10, 1840—On the bill making appropriation for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1840.

Mr. DUNCAN having the floor, said:

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I believe the bill before the committee is the general appropriation bill.

[The CHAIR answered it was.]

I will inquire if there is any particular amendment, or any particular section of the bill, now under discussion?

[The CHAIR answered, no.]

So I supposeed, from the range and character of the debate yesterday. The debate yesterday was monopolized by the Opposition; and they talked of every thing that is now, ever was, and is to come—abuses of power, panic, ruin, and desolation, of our lamented country—and the profligacy and extravagance of the Administration formed, as usual, the principal themes. Well, sir, I like such latitude in debate; it is in character with the liberal, latitudinarian, and free spirit of our political and religious institutions. I think I will take advantage of the latitude in debate now enjoyed, and talk of some things, too, not immediately connected with the subject before the committee.

It is perhaps unnecessary for me to inform the people of this country that such is the frame and character of our Government, that the Executive has no power to appropriate a dollar of the public money for any purpose, nor has he power to expend a dollar only as he is authorized by Congress. Whatever of profligacy may exist in the management of this Government must be exclusively charged to Congress; and yet the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WISE] stated on yesterday that the Executive is, and has been, responsible for the last six or seven years for every dollar which has been appropriated and expended by Congress. The gentleman holds the Executive responsible for that over which he has no control. Can the President control the expenditures of Congress? No, sir. Congress has the power of making appropriations to any amount, and for any purpose, without consulting the President—without his approbation, and contrary to his wish. The power of the President to prohibit extravagant appropriations is negative; and even that power avails him nothing, provided two-thirds of each branch of Congress vote for an appropriation; for the bill making the appropriation, in that case, is a law with or without his signature or approbation. Sir, I refer you to the President's messages, and to the reports and estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury for the truth of the fact, that one-half of all the moneys appropriated is done by the authority, and upon the responsibility of Congress alone. The Secretary of the Treasury presents to Congress estimates of the amount of appropriations necessary for Government purposes, and the President endorses these estimates and recommends them. Here his reponsibility ends; but Congress have yearly made appropriations far above the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury, and for other purposes entirely, than those recommended. Is the Executive to be held responsible for such appropriations as these, and, in consequence of them, denounced for extravagance and profligacy, far and wide as the Union? The intelligence of an honest community supersedes the necessity of reply to such denunciations.

But let me refer you to the journals of this House, for the truth of another strange fact. That is, that more than three-fourths of all the appropriations made, over and above the estimates recommended by the Secretary, and endorsed by the President, have been proposed by the Opposition, and carried by a majority of their votes. How does this fact correspond with the never-ceasing howl of extravagance with which we are annoyed, and with which the country is perpetually alarmed?

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CUSHING] followed in the wake of the gentleman from Virginia, and concurs with him in holding the Executive responsible for such appropriations. Yes, sir, he goes further: he not only holds him responsible for such appropriations, but he holds him responsible for any estimates that he may recommend, over and above what may strictly be wanted for the ordinary support of the Government. Further: he holds the Executive responsible for failing to recommend estimates and appropriations for purposes of internal improvements, when and where they are or shall be necessary. This is strict accountability on the broadest principles; and what does it all mean? It means, sir, 1st. If Congress appropriates money without the knowledge and contrary to the wish of the President, he is to be held responsible. 2d. If the President recommends one dollar over the estimates actually necessary for Government purposes, for internal improvements, or any other purpose, he is to be held responsible, and denounced for extravagance and profligacy; and lastly, if the President withholds his recommendation of appropriations for the purposes of internal improvements, security on the seaboard, &c. he is to be held responsible, and denounced for "meanly sneaking and skulking" from the responsibility and duties attached to his office.

Verily, these gentlemen remind me of a certain Procrustes I once read of—a man of horrible cruelty. It is said of him that he used to place on a bed, travellers who fell into his hands, and if they were too long for his bed, he cut off the projecting part, and if they were too short, he placed anvils under their feet, and beat them out till they equalled the length of the bed.

Mr. Chairman, I am not extravagant when I say one half of the time of this House is consumed by the Opposition in denouncing the Administration for its profligacy and extravagance. If the Opposition are sincere in the charges which they make, will the people not hold them to a fearful accountability for their gross neglect of duty when they are apprised of the fact that not the first attempt has been made by that party to reform the abuses of which they complain? If such abuses exist, the solemn oath they have taken, in presence of Heaven and man, to faithfully discharge their official duties, binds them to the throne of eternal responsibility to their conscience and to their country, to point out those abuses, and to recommend a remedy. If they will, the Democratic party here, to a man, will gladly join with them, heart and hand, in assisting them in reformation. Where are the abuses of which you complain? Are there more officers than are necessary to manage the Government? then point them out, and they will be removed. Are there officers who do not do their duty? point them out, and they will be reformed. Are the salaries of officers and clerks higher than necessary to secure men competent and qualified to discharge the duties and trusts severally connected with their offices? then point them out, and they will be reduced. Sir, I have a right to demand that the Opposition shall discharge the duties I have here proposed. The country will demand it at their hands, or they must cease their clamor of profligacy against the Administration. But they will not attempt to propose a reform, or point out an evil. They know that the Government is as well and as economically administered as it can be. They know that the business of the Government cannot be administered with a less number of officers and clerks than are now employed; and they also know that competent men cannot be obtained to discharge the official duties, for salaries reduced below their present standard.

Extravagance and profligacy is the howl of the demagogue in all Governments, and it is the howl of the demagogue in this Government.

I have said that the Opposition have pointed to no instance of extravagance. I was wrong. They have pointed out one item. I allude to the public printing. That item has been thrown up to the Democracy more than one thousand times this session; and from the fact that that single item has been harped upon in almost every speech that has been made by the Opposition, it is fair to presume they know of no other instance of extravagance; and how do they stand in relation to that. During the last Congress the Opposition had a decided majority in this House. They elected a Printer of their own party. Yes, sir, they elected a man of their own; and who was he? A miserable tool of a miserable faction—(I mean the Conservatives)—an empty, brainless coxcomb, without a name, a residence, or a foothold on the face of the earth—a pennyless loafer—one of the gaunt lounging office seekers that beset this Capitol, and ride you like the nightmare, without the means of doing the printing, and, I believe, without the first dollar to procure the means; and what was the consequence of his election? The public printing, in place of being done by the Government's confidential sworn officer, was farmed out to Gales and Seaton, not confidential and sworn officers of the Government. Yes, sir, the public printing was farmed out, and the man of straw elected (I mean the Editor of the Madisonian) received ten thousand dollars per annum for the office and trust thus reposed in him, and Gales and Seaton did the printing for the balance of the profits. What was the course of the Opposition then, think you? Was it to reduce the printing? No, sir; not a word was then said about the extravagance and profligacy of the public printing; but, on the contrary, more at jobs of printing were thrown into the hands of that corrupt and fraudulent combination than has ever been done in any Congress since the organization of the Government, or the establishment of public Printer, by which the public printing was swelled to upwards of $231,000, which is more than double as much as it ever amounted to before, and that enabled Gales and Seaton to pay the enormous rent of ten thousand dollars. But as soon as the party character of this House was changed, and the printing was about to fall into Democratic hands, the yelp of extravagance in the public printing was raised by a hundred Whig tongues, that had before been as silent on that subject as the grave. But, sir, what did the Democracy do on the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia? [Mr. BLACK.] They ordered a committee to investigate the subject of the public printing, and to report to this House what they might find to be a fair and just compensation for the public printing; and Blair and Rives were elected public printers on the condition that they were to receive such a compensation. That committee have made their report; it is now on the Clerk's table; it is in favor of retrenchment, and the Democracy will sustain it. So much for reform in the public printing the only item of pretended extravagance pointed out or attempted to be exposed by the Opposition; and that item would have remained unexposed by them if the printing had remained in the hands of their party pets.

"Office holders and spoils party." Sir, have not every feeling you possess, physical and mental, been nauseated and sickened at that incessant cry—that miserable hungry howl of lamentation, which is never permitted to die on your ear? I once before exposed the fact by tables and figures, that more than one-half of all the offices of this Government are occupied by Federalists, and I now assert it to be a fact; but one-half is not enough for them. "Being of the better sort of society," they claim them all; and nothing short of their full possession will ever satisfy a party whose principles teach them to believe they are born to rule the "common people." The Federal party claim office as a natural and political right composed, as they claim to be, of "the decency," and "better sort of people," they "are born to rule the swinish multitude." This right has been disputed by the Democracy, and it is this dispute, and the rights and principles involved, that have produced all the political struggles and turmoils that have been witnessed since the commencement of our Government. Will the Democracy now surrender? Heretofore the claims of the Federalists for all the offices have made in blustering demands; now they are made in pitiful whining, sickening, crocodile whimperings. The Democracy, in the support of stern principles, resisted the one? Will they now permit their sympathies to be so overcome as to yield to the other? Will they permit their principles, to maintain which they have so long, and so manfully contended, now to be sacrificed at the hungry yelp and pitiful whine of a host of lean, lank, lazy, lounging office seekers, which beset this Capitol, and annoy the country elsewhere? "The spoils party;" and what would the hungry Federal office seekers be, if they were to get all the offices and spoils! would they not be "the spoils party too; and how much would the community be benefited by the change? I ask what benefit the tax paying community would derive by turning out the well fed, fat, clean, sleek, Democratic office holders, and putting in a swarm of hungry, lean, starved, Federal office seekers?

Panic! panic! panic! That's the string to pull. Turn back to the history of your Presidential elections, and show me one in the political statistics of your country, if you can, that has not been swamped in the Federal cry of panic. Examine the public journals from the commencement of Presidential elections to this time, and you will find by them that every year that a President has had to be elected, is a year of panic and desolation. The cry of "panic and desolation" is one of the standing modes of electioneering. The people understand it, and are no longer to be gulled by it, and they look with contempt upon those who make it, as they do upon the slanderer and calumniator of American institutions and the American character. The yelp of panic, ruin, and distress, is now overspreading the land and doing its base and dirty work of slander upon the character of our country. Where is the panic and distress to be found? Where it always will be found: among the penniless loafers of your country—those who are too lazy and too proud to work, and have nothing to trade upon. All the panic and distress we have, consists in the inability of that class to enjoy the "glories of the credit system." Show me the man in our widespread Union (except he has been the subject of misfortune) who depends upon his own industry and his own resources, that cannot laugh at your panic and sneer at your demagogical cry of distress. And here I must qualify this general remark, by the exception of many hundreds of persons of the most useful class of society. I mean those who labor in manufactories. They are, no doubt, seriously affected by the depressed and deranged state of the currency; but all their difficulties grow out of their connection with institutions, the proprietors and owners of which have not capital of their own by which to conduct them. If such persons will study their own real interests, they will cut loose from such establishments and such proprietors, change their business, or engage in the employment of those who have not to depend upon the smiles and favors of banks, and the uncertainties of the "glorious credit system."

But, sir, what if there is distress and panic in the country? What is the cause of it but your miserable banking and credit system—a system that the united efforts of the Democracy have been directed to overthrow, so far as it is exclusive, monopolizing, and partial in its operation—a system, which, so long as it exists, will produce periodical derangement of the currency of the country, and distress with those who trade upon capital not their own.

But, I repeat, what if there is panic and distress in the country? Has Congress power to give relief? What constitutional authority have we for making this Capitol a poor-house? And by what constitutional authority can members of Congress, in their representative capacity, assume to themselves the office of overseers of the poor? Such a use of this Capitol, and such a usurpation of office, and such an exercise of power, were never contemplated by the framers of this Government; nor is it any where, except in the babbling noise of the demagogue, or in the brain of the raving political monomaniac. Sir, it is a settled principle, and a fact well known and universally understood, that all the wealth of this country is dug in sweat from her soil; and all the comforts and conveniences of life are the offspring of the united labor of the farmer and the mechanic, and upon that must we depend for all we possess, either as a nation or as individuals composing a nation. And let me assure you, whatever system of policy may be established by legislation, which will enable one part of the community to live without labor, must and will have the tendency to throw a greater portion of labor upon those not so favored. Such is the natural consequence, and such the practical effect, as all experience has shown, and will continue to show; and such is the credit and banking system, as it has existed, and now exists, in this country.

All the panic and distress that now hangs over us as a people, or any portion of us, had their origin in extravagance, idleness, or overtrading. That fact dare not be denied; nor dare it be denied that they have had their foundation in the credit and banking system, by the facilities they afford to live without labor, and temptations to speculate.

While I am unwilling to admit that any man here can go before me in commiserating the misfortunes of my fellow beings, nor can any one rejoice more at the prosperity of our country, and the happiness of every class of society, than I do, yet I hold that Congress has neither the power nor the means to give relief in cases of distress. I say that Congress has no such power. I mean by that, that Congress has no power to tax one portion of the community to relieve the distresses of another. Such a power cannot be exercised in justice, nor did ever the framers of the Constitution contemplate such an exercise of power. Congress can give no relief on any other principle than by an unjust and unconstitutional system of taxation, either directly or indirectly. To all such applications for relief, (I mean for such distress as is now said to pervade the country,) as a Representative, I must say, (however cold, heartless, and disconsolate the advice may be considered,) go home, work harder, and live more economically, and relief will be your reward. Sir, I have said that the cry of panic, as in times before, is made for political effect and party purposes. It is so, and such is the object of the demagogue. But I have the charity to believe that some of those who are attempting to spread the alarm of distress are, or think they are, sincere; but I am constrained to believe that many of that class are laboring under a species of derangement. There is a kind of derangement called monomania, which leaves the individual affected with it in full possession of his reasoning powers, on all subjects except the one on which he is deranged. For instance, the monomaniac is deranged on the subject of religion, and perfectly rational on all others. Hence it is that some persons fancy themselves to be the Saviour of mankind, or to be one of the ancient prophets, and, in some instances, to be the Almighty himself; or he may be deranged upon the subject of mechanics; hence it is you hear of persons spending a great portion of their lives in attempting to invent the perpetual motion. So it is with the alchymist, who spends his life in pursuit of the philosopher's stone. So it is with metaphysics, &c. And yet persons laboring under this species of derangement may be perfectly capable of attending to ordinary business. Professor Tital of Jena continued to perform his professional duties for some time, although laboring under the fixed hallucination of believing himself to be Emperor of Rome. Many other instances of a similar character could be cited. Alexander Pope, in a few lines, illustrates, in an interesting and forcible manner, the various effects of monomania on different individuals. He sung thus:

"Unnumbered throngs on every side are seen,
Of bodies changed by various forms of spleen,
Here living teapots stand, one arm held out,
One bent; the handle this, and that the spout;
A pipkin there, like Homer's tripod, walks;
Here sighs a jar, and there a goose-pie talks,
Men prove with child, as powerful fancy works,
And maids, turned bottles, cry aloud for corks."

Well, sir, we see that men become deranged on religion, mechanics, metaphysics, &c.; why may they not become deranged on the subject of politics? They do. Our medical records furnish many instances of the kind; so they do on subjects of finance and economy. The celebrated Doctor Eberly informs us that he knew a person who for more than twenty years was firmly persuaded that he was the President of the United States; and yet this man would converse and think rationally upon all the ordinary concerns of life. We have all heard of persons in affluent circumstances pinching themselves with hunger, and clothed in rags, lest they should come to want and die in poverty. Such is the political monomania under which some of our politicians are now raving: and if Alexander Pope lived at this day and in our country, he would sing—

"Men often turn from reason's shining way
To chase a phantom in the light of day;
Sane in all matters save the affairs of state,
And wild in them as in the rest they're great.

Now preach they panic with a sing-song tone,
When panic lives within their breasts alone;
Now hear they Furies yell in deep despair,
With deadly serpents hissing from their hair.*

Politically mad as Bedlam's King,
Around the world their doleful song they sing,
O'er fertile fields they leave their baneful track,
Blow up the world, and chuckle at the crack.

Such is the hell-born phantasy that holds
The Federal prophet's in its crimson folds;
Makes banks perfection, by a simple thought,
And strives to teach men what can ne'er be taught."

But, Mr. Chairman, I told you I intended to talk of some things not immediately connected with the bill under consideration. I desire to talk some about the Presidential election. I hope I will not be considered out of order. When the simple proposition to instruct the Committee on Finance to report an appropriation for the Cumberland road, was before the House, the Whigs used up one entire week in attempting to prove that General Harrison ought to be elected President of the United States. I hope it will now be in order, on the general appropriation bill, for me to use an hour or two in attempting to prove that he should not be elected.

So, sir, I proceed with my proofs and objections.

One of the modes now employed to secure the overthrow of the Administration, and secure the election of the Federal candidate, is to impress on the minds of the people that General Harrison is a poor man, and therefore the poor man's friend: that he is the inmate of a log cabin, drinks hard cider, and is compelled, now in the sun-down of his life, to toil in sweat and dust for his daily maintenance; and therefore, if elected to the Presidency, will be capable of appreciating the poor man's condition, and will direct the administration of the Government with reference to the interests and benefits of that class of the community. These, if true, are powerful inducements for the poor and the friends of the poor to sustain Geneneral Harrison for the Presidency, all other circumstances being favorable. But that he is, or ever was, at heart, a friend to the poor man, I am prepared to doubt; and with a view of being as brief as possible, in support of this belief, I will give one illustration of the most forcible and undeniable character—and one, too, which, at the same time that it carries truth on its face, will serve to convince every man who reads it, or hears it read, that the poor man has but little to expect, on the side of mercy and favor, from General Harrison or his administration, if elected. General Harrison is in favor of, and has voted for, a law authorizing and requiring the sale of the poor man in bondage and degrading slavery for the payment of a fine and costs in which he might be mulcted, or what is tantamount thereto. This, sir, is a startling statement; but I have the proof at hand—read for yourself:

"Extract from the journal of the State of Ohio, dated
TUESDAY, January 30, 1821.

Senate met, pursuant to adjournment.

The Senate then, according to the order of the day, resolved into a committee of the whole on the bill from the House entitled "an act for the punishment of certain offences therein named," and after some time spent therein, the Speaker (Allen Trimble) resumed the chair.

Mr. Fithian then moved to strike out the 18th section of said bill, as follows:

"Be it further enacted, That when any person shall be imprisoned, either upon execution or otherwise, for the non-payment of a fine or cost, or both, it shall be lawful for the sheriff of the county to SELL OUT SUCH PERSON as a SERVANT to any person within this State, who will pay the whole amount due, for the shortest period of service; of which sale public notice shall be given at least ten days; and upon such sale being effected, the sheriff shall give the purchaser a certificate thereof, and from which time the relation between such purchaser and prisoner shall be that of MASTER and SERVANT, until the time of service expires; and for injuries done by either, remedy shall be had in the same manner as is, or may be, provided by law in the case of master and apprentice.

"But nothing therein mentioned shall be construed to prevent persons from being discharged from imprisonment according to the provisions of the thirty-seventh section of the act to which this is supplementary, if it shall be expedient to grant such discharge. Provided that the court, in pronouncing upon any person convicted under this act, or the act to which this is supplementary, may direct such person or persons to be detained in prison until the fine be paid, or persons otherwise disposed of agreeably to the provisions of this act."

And the yeas and nays being required; those who voted in the affirmative were; Messrs. Beasly, Brown, Fithian, Gass, Heaton, Jennings, Lucas, Mathews, McLaughlin, McNilton, Newcomb, Robb, Russell, Scofield, Shelby, Spencer, Stone, Swearengen, Thompson, and Womeldorf—20.

And those who voted in the negative were—Messrs. Baldwin, Cole, Foos, Foster, WILLIAM H. HARRISON, McLean, Oswell, Pollack, Ruggles, Roberts, Wheeler and Speaker—12.

SECRETARY OF STATE'S OFFICE,
Columbus, O. Sept. 10, 1836.

"I certify that the foregoing is a true and accurate copy from the journals of the Senate of the State of Ohio, being the first session of the 19th General Assembly, held at Columbus, December, 1820.

See pages 303, 304, 305.

CARTER B. HARLAN,
Secretary of State."

Sir, this is the journal, certified to by the proper officer; and in order that no false issue may be raised as to the meaning or intent of those who voted for and against a propcsition degrading to the American character, at war with every principle of our free institutions, and constituting a black mark, and a foul stain, upon the legislative journals of a free State. I say, that there may be no false issue or mistake, I will submit the remarks of a distinguished statesman and patriot of the last war, at the time the measure was under discussion. I allude to Gen. Robert Lucas, who distinguished himself in our second war for independence; has for many years been a member of both branches of the Legislature of Ohio; her Governor for four years, and he is now Governor of the Territory of Iowa.

Hear what he said:

"General Robert Lucas, in the true spirit of patriotism, made the following remarks:

"What will be the operation of this section?" said Mr. Lucas. "We will suppose a case: suppose one of the patriots of the Revolution should be insulted by an enemy of his country, or a tory, who had fought against him in the struggle for liberty, and he should be provoked to commit an assault in defending the honor of his Government—by our laws he might be prosecuted and fined. He is poor and unable to pay the fine. What would follow, under the provisions of this section? He is publicly ADVERTISED FOR TO BE SOLD—he is dragged by the crier along the streets—the man who provoked the assault, bids the amount of the fine and the shortest term of service, say forty years—and the old patriot is knocked off to his per-bondage.

"Any unfortunate citizen, who, in an unguarded moment, might be thus subjected to the payment of a fine, would be liable to be sold under this section, and driven into slavery by a FREE NEGRO, should such a negro choose to become the purchaser.

"This would be revolting to every principle of humanity, and a disgrace to the age in which we live.

"The question was then taken on Mr. Fithian's motion, and carried in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 12. So this obnoxious provision, voted for and defended by WM. H. HARRISON, does not now disgrace the statute books of Ohio."

And this, sir, is the manifestation of General Harrison's attachments to, and sympathies for, the poor man. What will the linsey hunting shirt wool hat inmate of the log cabin, who delights occasionally in taking a knock down for the laudable purpose of improving his courage, and hardening his body, (for which he may be made the subject of fine and costs, which he may not have the means of paying) say to such a manifestation? What will the crippled war-worn soldier, and patriot of the Revolution, say to such a manifestation? Did he buckle on his armor, march to the field of battle, face the cannon's mouth, and risk fortune, limb, and life, to break the chains of British slavery, that his sons and posterity to all time, (in the misfortunes of poverty) should be the subjects of a law that would have disgraced the conscripts of the tyrant in the most arbitrary and degraded days of Rome, and make them the subjects of bargain and sale, and the slaves of the purse-proud and unfeeling Shylock; and that too, for the mere crime of poverty, or of not having the ability to pay a fine, and a few dollars and cents of cost? Sires of the Revolution! was this what you fought for; was it for this you bared your bosoms, and "bore up under the battle's hottest rage?" Had you no higher object than mere colonial emancipation to stimulate you, when you fought the enemy knee to knee, and breast to breast, on Bunker Hill, Monmouth, and Trenton, in suffocating dust and smoke; and when your brave comrades in arms were sinking in fatigue and death by your side? You are not here; I will answer for you. You had higher objects. Emancipation of your country, political liberty, religious toleration, and personal freedom, were your stimulants, your objects, and your rewards. Then, I ask, can you cast your suffrage to the support of a man for the highest office in your gift, who stands prepared in principle, and has attempted in practice, to sell your sons in slavery for the crime of poverty, or the misfortune of inability to liquidate a fine and cost, in which they may be mulcted by a little imprudence, without design or intention of crime? I am inclined to doubt Gen. Harrison's sympathies for the poor man.

But it is said that "General Harrison is a poor man, and lives in a log cabin, and that he toils in sweat and dust for his daily maintenance." These allegations are either false or they are true. If they are false, then it is an attempt to practise a base fraud upon the American people from motives of demagoguism; but I will presume, for the present, that they are true. And let me assure you that if General Harrison is of the right political faith, and is well qualified to discharge the complicated, responsible, and arduous duties which the Constitution, the interests of this country, and the policy of this Government impose on the President of the United States, the fact of his being the tenant of a log cabin shall heighten my zeal and double my exertions to secure his election. The most devoted recollections that I have are associated with scenes and pleasures, in boyhood, with the inmates of log cabins. I was raised in a log cabin. All my youthful playmates were the tenants of log cabins; and all my youthful frolics were played off in log cabins.

Sir, I delight in the very name of a log cabin. There is no name in the English vocabulary that dwells upon my lips with so much delight as log cabin. It brings fresh to my recollection scenes of youthful pleasures, which I have never since, nor ever will again enjoy. Many and oft is the time that I thought a day a month, in anxious watch for the setting sun which was the token for the rally to the frolic of the log cabin, where I met the comrades of my youth in dance, play, and song. In the times of which I am speaking, log cabins were what the term means—a house made of round logs, one story high, of dimensions suited to the size or number of the family who were to inhabit it, and sometimes with reference to an increase, a puncheon floor, a lin bark loft, and a clapboard roof. The industry of the matron and her daughters was displayed by the thick folds of linsey frocks, pantaloons, and hunting shirts, which behung its walls. Its loft was underhung with strings of dried pumpkins, and its capacity heated and lighted with a large wood fire from its capacious chimney. So much for the description. Now for the frolic. The frolic consisted in dancing, playing, and singing love and murder songs, eating johnny cake and pumpkin pies, and drinking new whiskey and brown sugar out of a gourd. Our dancing in my youthful day, and in my neighborhood, was done to the performance of an old Irishman with one leg, with the heel of which he beat time, a fiddle with three strings, to the air of

"Barney let the girls alone,
Barney let the girls alone,
Barney let the girls alone,
And let them quiet be.
Judy put the kettle on,
Judy put the kettle on,
Judy put the kettle on.
And we'll all take tea."

for, if I recollect right, I think our fiddler played but one tune.

But let me tell you, sir, our girls were not to be sneezed at. They presented a form in beauty that marked the developments of nature, when unrestrained by corsets, and the withering dissipation of fashionable and high life, and their guileless hearts looked through a countenance that demanded confidence in their innocence and unsullied virtue. But, oh! their forms! When you plied your arm to their waist in the giddy waltz, with the twenty-five yards of warm linsey in which they were comfortably enwrapped, you had an armful of health and firmness. These constituted my pleasures in the days of log cabins; and this is a description of log cabins, which, so far as it goes, will be recognised by those who have been reared in the Western country. But, sir, the days of log cabins have passed away in the older settlements of the West, and with them, most of the log cabins; and with the log cabins, many of the amusements common to such tenements. All the older pioneers of the West and their descendants, who have observed that kind of prudence, industry, and economy, which constitute the character of the good citizen, and entitle him to the confidence of honest men, have possessed themselves of comfortable and commodious brick and frame houses, large barns, and well improved farms, checkered with grain fields of every color, and mantled with horses, cattle, sheep, and hogs, and with hard cash for a rainy day, and some to lend a friend in need.

General Harrison was one of the earliest settlers of the West. Why is he not provided with the means, too, of comforting the sundown of his life? It would seem, if he had possessed the ordinary prudence, industry, economy, and stability common to the pioneers of the West, and which has raised them from indigence to comfort and ease, and some of them to affluence, he would not now necessarily be the humble tenant of a log cabin and have to toil his winter-beaten frame in the chill of old age, for his daily bread. How does this matter stand? It has become our duty and our interest to inquire; for if his poverty is the result of misfortunes and untoward circumstances, over which he could have had no control, then is it a virtue, rather than a fault, and claims commiseration. But if it is the result of imprudence, extravagance, or of ill-directed judgment, the fault is his own; and such faults and frailties clearly render him unfit to be the Executive ruler of a great and powerful nation. What have been his misfortunes and what his opportunities? I profess to be somewhat acquainted with the history of General Harrison's political, military, and private life. I am his neighbor, and live in his county. As to his private life, I know of no stain that for a moment sullies him. I believe he is strictly honest; I believe he is liberal, but not so to a fault. I have never heard of any pecuniary misfortunes the lot of that man; and I think his history (and, by the by, let me here say, that I have very little confidence in the history of a man written and published in his life time; such a history is very apt to be colored and bedizened with adulation and flattery) represents him as the descendant of "noble blood;" of highly respectable and wealthy parentage. Wealthy parentage? Then he received at his outset a patrimony. What has become of that? Why, if it was not borne away upon the wings of misfortune, perhaps it was a sacrifice to the inexperience of youth. Be it so. That is not to be charged to him as a fault now; nor does it make him the less capable of discharging important official duties, for which he may have qualifications. But his history (verbal if not writen) represents him as having received a large fortune in lands of the most valuable quality, and the most elegible location, by his marriage. What has become of that fortune? For its flight it will not be so easy to find an apology; for on its reception, he was in the vigor and wisdom of manhood; with his mind at its strength, and with a judgment at its full size. But if the log cabin and the poverty story is true, that estate is in some way disposed of. But that is not all. General Harrison has held profitable offices from his boyhood. With but little intermission to this day, his hand has been in the public Treasury. Yes, sir, almost without interregnum, through a life as long as the Divine promise—for I believe he is now on the verge of the horizon of three score and ten—and at this moment holds an office worth, I think, clear and clean of all expenses, five thousand dollars per annum. I think I may venture to say General Harrison has received from public Treasuries more than one hundred thousand dollars. He has drawn more from the public Treasury than a six-horse team can haul, in hard dollars, over the Alleghany mountains, on the national road; and yet his political partisans claim for him the Presidency because he is poor and needy. What has become of this last vast estate? Can his friends answer?

Why, sir, so far from General Harrison being unfortunate, he has been one of fortune's choicest and most cherished children. Now, sir, permit me to ask, if General Harrison's poverty gives him a claim upon the American people either for political patronage, or even more than common sympathy; certainly not, unless it can be shown clearly that he has been reduced to poverty by misfortunes and calamities beyond his control. While it is a settled principle, honorable to the American character, that the virtuous and qualified poor man is preferred to the virtuous and qualified rich man for office, let us inquire whether, when poverty is the result of extravagance, profligacy, indolence, a weak mind, a bad-directed judgment or mismanagement, it does not constitute a disqualification to hold a responsible station of an official character. Permit me to ask, if the man who has not had the capacity to secure a competency for the evening of his life out of such vast resources, can safely be trusted with the administration of this Government? I ask the question in the spirit of candor and truth, and it becomes every American to ask the same question. Is the man who has not the ability to control and manage his own small and circumscribed domestic concerns, the suitable man in whose hand to place the destinies of this nation—the management of this widespread and complicated Federal Union, whose harmony and whose duration—whose prosperity at home, and whose character abroad, depend upon its judicious laws, their best direction, and able and faithful execution? A patriotic and intelligent people will answer this question.

But, sir, I will now come to the rescue of General Harrison, and relieve him from the incapacity which his own friends have virtually and indirectly charged upon him. General Harrison is not a poor man; he does not live in a log cabin; nor does he toil in sweat and dust for his living. He is a rich man; he lives in a magnificent frame house, and is surrounded with a princely estate, of as good land as ever the Nile inundated, and as handsomely and advantageously located as any past which the majestic floods of the Ohio or Mississippi roll, from their sources to the Gulf of Mexico So, sir, all this story about the log cabin is a falsehood. It is a mean fraud, attempted to be practised upon the credulity and sympathies of the American people, for the base, demagogical purposes of political deception. General Harrison is neither to be cherished nor repudiated by the log cabin fiction: the whole is a hoax, attempted to be played off for political effect, and worthy of a party who have a contempt for the understanding and intelligence of what they call the "common people." Such attempts never fail to meet the scorn and derision of an honest and intelligent community, when and wherever made.

But indulge me while I attempt to expose another inconsistency involved in the log cabin hoax. Who were the active agents by which Gen. Harrison was presented as a candidate for the Presidency? The humble inmates of log cabins, think you, sir? No. The conventions by which Gen. Harrison's nomination was brought forth, in nine individual instances out of ten, were composed of any thing but the laboring man of the log cabin. They were composed of, and controlled by, those who have neither attachments nor feelings for the log cabin class of community, further than to subserve their own purposes, further than to make them subservient to the establishment of a system of policy by which they may be made hewers of wood and drawers of water to the Federal aristocracy of this country. I am not in possession of the names of the individuals composing the different State Federal conventions, nor of the names of the delegates composing the National Federal Convention held at Harrisburg; consequently I can say nothing of their professions and occupations, farther than relates to my own State. I hold in my hand a newspaper containing the report and proceedings of the convention held in Ohio, and containing the names of those who composed that convention. I have extracted a table from that report, which shows the number of bank officers, bank directors, and bank stockholders, office holders, lawyers, and doctors, merchants, clerks, speculators, &c. Here it is. It tells a poor story for the log cabin and laboring interests of this country. I am told by members here that this table will serve to illustrate the character of other State conventions, as well as the composition of the Harrisburg convention. But here is the table; read for yourself. Here are the names, facts, and figures. They expose the miserable attempt to palm General Harrison upon the people as "the log cabin and the poor man's candidate." Shame! where is thy blush? Truth and candor, where are thy advocates? Justice and honor, have ye been dethroned; and have moral depravity and debased political ambition, usurped your seats? But here is the table:

Just look, sir! five hundred and forty-two bank officers, directors, &c. seven hundred and thirty-three office holders, three hundred and forty-six lawyers and doctors, and one thousand and forty-eight merchants, clerks, and speculators, in one State convention, in all twenty-six hundred and sixty-nine, representing the interests of the poor man! and the laboring community, and presenting General Harrison as the log cabin candidate! Sir, if I could speak to every laborer in this land, I would say to him, "beware of wolves in sheep's clothing." These men will caress and flatter you until your suffrage is cast, and then they will order you to stand back "like a poor man at a dance." I would say look out when merchants, lawyers, doctors, bankers, speculators, and Shylocks, assume the guardianship of your interests and your liberties. All the flattering caresses that the laborer or the poor man will receive from such a party, will result from the same motive that induced the fox to praise the music of the crow, which was to obtain the flesh which she would let drop in the act of singing.

I assert that the supporters of General Harrison are not the friends of the poor and laboring classes of the community, and those who live in log cabins. On the contrary, they are those who seek the establishment and confirmation of a system of policy whose natural tendency is to make the "rich richer and the poor poorer."

From such a guardianship save the Democracy, is my prayer. Under the guardianship of such men, hard cider and log cabins would be the lot of the poor man through all time. Sir, I have more than once said that a contempt for the intelligence of the people is a fundamental principle with the Federal party. I hold in my hand two communications, which will sustain me in the assertion. I ask that the Clerk may read them.

The Clerk read:

"From the Oswego Palladium.
"GENERAL HARRISON.

"We call public attention to the following most extraordinary reply, made by General Harrison's committee at Cincinnati, to a letter addressed to him by the Union Association of this village. We are obliged to a member of the Association for a copy of the letter addressed by it to General Harrison, and a copy of the letter of the committee, in reply thereto. We assure the public the correspondence is genuine.

"OSWEGO, January 31, 1840.

"To the Hon. WILLIAM H. HARRISON:

"DEAR SIR: In accordance with a resolution of the Union Association of Oswego, I am instructed to propose three questions to you in relation to subjects that a large portion of this section of the country feel a deep interest in. The first is—

"Are you in favor of receiving and referring petitions for the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia?

"Secondly—are you in favor of a United States Bank, or some institution similar to that for the safekeeping and distributing of the public moneys, and for giving a uniform currency throughout the United States?

"And lastly—Would you favor the passage of a general bankrupt law by Congress, so that its operations might be equal in all the States of the Union.

"I have only to say, sir, that the above inquiries are made in accordance with the unanimous wishes of this association, the members of which, I am instructed to say, entertain the highest regard for your past services, and hope, should you be elected to the high office to which you are nominated, that nothing may occur to lessen you in the estimation of a great and free people.

"I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,
"MILES HOTCHKISS,
"Corresponding Secretary."

"CINCINNATI, Feb. 29, 840.

"OSWEGO UNION ASSOCIATION:

"GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 31st ult. addressed to Gen. Harrison, has been placed in our possession with a view to early attention. This is unavoidable in consequence of the very numerous letters daily received by the General, and to which his reply in person is rendered absolutely impracticable. As from his confidential committee, you will look upon this response, and if the policy observed by the committee should not meet with your approbation, you will attribute the error rather to ourselves and his immediate advisers, than General Harrison. That policy is, that the General make no further declaration of his principles for the public eye whilst occupying his present position. Such course has been adopted, not for purposes of concealment, nor to avoid all proper responsibility; but under the impression that the General's views, in regard to all the important and exciting questions of the day, have heretofore been given to the public, fully and explicitly; and that those views, whether connected with constitutional or other questions of very great interest, have undergone no change. The committee are strengthened in regard to the propriety of this policy; that no new issue be made to the public, from the consideration that the National convention deemed it impolitic at the then crisis to publish any general declaration of the views of the great Opposition party, and certainly the policy at the present remains unaltered. In the mean time, we cannot help expressing the hope that our friends every where will receive the nomination of General Harrison with something akin to generous confidence. When we reflect upon the distinguished intelligence of the nominating convention—how ably all interests were represented in that body; we certainly have a high guarantee, that, should General Harrison be the successful candidate for the Presidency, that office will be happily and constitutionally administered, and under the guidance of the same principles which directed our Washington, Jefferson, and Madison. Believing you will concur with us in the propriety of the policy adopted, we have pleasure in subscribing ourselves,

Your friends,
DAVID GWYNNE,
J. C. WRIGHT,
O. M. SPENCER.

H. E. SPENCER, Cor. Secretary.

[Mr. DUNCAN was proceeding, when Mr. MASON of Ohio interrupted him, and asked to explain. Mr. D. gave way. Mr. M. said that he had seen a communication in a Buffalo paper denying the genuineness of these communications, (just read,) and that he (Mr. M.) felt himself at liberty to pronounce the whole a forgery.]

Mr. DUNCAN resumed, and responded that he presumed his colleague [Mr. MASON] knew nothing about the matter; and that he (Mr. D.) felt himself at liberty to pronounce it no forgery, and that the whole correspondence is genuine, and precisely as represented on the paper which was just read; and this he was authorized to say, not only from the presumption contained on the face of the paper itself, but from other information upon which he could rely. Sir, it is genuine; and what are the impressions this correspondence must make on the mind of every man who may read them? They are twofold. First, they convey the idea most forcibly, that, owing to physical and mental imbecility, the party have been compelled to assign political keepers to General Harrison, and the necessity of this measure, with those unacquainted with General Harrison, will be forced upon the mind, when it is known that he is now in or near the seventieth year of his age; a period of life when the heart beats slow, the blood flows sluggishly, the limbs become palsied, the watery eye grows dim, the voice trembles, the muscles wither, the "pantaloon becomes slippery," the memory takes wing, the empire of judgment totters, and the mind sinks in human frailty.

The appointment of the committee must give rise to a supposed necessity, and that necessity will find its reason in the natural frailties of three score and ten. It is not for me to rescue or relieve General Harrison from the difficulties and imputation with which his friends embarrass him. It is for his friends to explain away these imputations. But, second: the answer of the committee will not fail to make the impression, either that General Harrison requires political conscience-keepers—because with him the Federal principles of these times would not be safe—or that he and his party have no principles—or that their principles are so obnoxious to public sentiment, that it is dangerous to disclose them. I think the latter proposition is the fact. I have looked in vain for a demonstration of modern Whig principles from their conventions. I can see none. There have been none; nor will there be any. The object of a committee is to put their principles under a bushel. Such is the secret mandate of the State Convention wire-workers—such is the secret mandate of the wire-workers of the National Harrisburg Convention; and the lips of all subordinate committees are sealed. The above committee infoms us, in so many words, that it is not the policy of General Harrison or his friends to make any exposition of political faith or principle until after the election. Like the subjects of benighted ignorance of the old world, it is enough that the priests know the will of God and the mysteries of his holy word. What a miserable cause it is that shuns the light; and how unpardonably ignorant the political leaders of a party must be of the intelligence of the nineteenth century—of the intelligence of this people—who think they can lead the freemen of this Government, blindfolded, to the subversion of their own principles, and the overthrow of their cherished institutions. And how basely corrupt must be the party who sneak and skulk from an open, candid, and manly exposition of their political principles. Sir, I say unhesitatingly that this corresponding committee has been appointed for the purposes of concealment and delusion. I unhesitatingly assert that this concealment of principle arises from the fact that the Federalists dare not publicly disclose their principles to the American people. Concealment of principle, and false glare of military tinsel, are to be the means by which the people are to be gulled into the support of Federal men for office, and the establishment of Federal measures. But, sir, the effort will be about as fruitless as the coffin handbill mode of electioneering.

In relation to the conscience-keeping committee, I must say something. Of David Gwynne, I know nothing personally; I am unacquainted with him. I presume he is a clever fellow, and a respectable citizen, as all my constituents are. I take it for granted that he is opposed to the Administration and the Democratic party and principles, but not the less respectable for that. But of J. C. Wright and O. M. Spencer, I know something. I know them to be attorneys at law of high standing. I know them, as private citizens, to be of the most respectable order, and I will take this occasion to invite all who hear me, and all who may read me, to call on J. C. Wright and O. M. Spencer, should they have any business in the way of their profession. No two men in the State in which they live, will discharge their duty with more fidelity or more ability. But I know another thing. The Democracy will find themselves vetoed if they make these gentlemen the conservatives of their political rights. The log cabin, and its wool hat inmates, will find themselves in the vocative, if their political rights are thrown upon the care and protection of these gentlemen. A Persian frog could not swim in all the hard cider they ever drank. These gentlemen may have seen a log cabin in their travels; so they may have seen a plough, but I doubt if either of them knows to which end of it a pair of horses should be hitched, or from which side of the land the furrow should be thrown.

These gentlemen are not Democrats. J. C. Wright will feel secretly flattered when he learns that I pronounce him a high-toned Federalist, from the first foundation of the world; and if his colleague is not of quite so blue a steep, it is because he has not been in the dye so long. Knowing, as I do, it was intended by the Federalists that the Democracy were to be gulled by this confidential conscience-keeping committee trick, I think it was a manifestation of diplomatic stupidity, that I have never seen excelled in political manœuvring. It was cassiowary stupidity. I think it is the cassiowary bird, that rests the security of its body in the concealment of its head. The politics of this committee are too well known. If General Jackson, in his proudest and most popular days, were to have put himself in the keeping of these men, it would have blown him sky high with the Democracy, far and wide as they are known. If the friends of General Harrison had constituted

UNCLE JAKE FELTER, OLD STEPHEN WOOD, and JIM GOODLOE,

the Committee of Conscience Keepers to General Harrison, the Democracy would have understood something of the principles and rules of action; but as it is, they will stand off. Sir, before I attempt to expose an extraordinary display of Federal inconsistency, I will ask your attention, while I expose an ordinary one. The Federal Whig national ticket is—

For President of the United States,
WM. HENRY HARRISON, of Ohio.
For Vice President,
JOHN TYLER, of Virginia.

Now, sir, I pronounce John Tyler a slaveholder, and violently opposed to modern Abolitionism, in all its orms. If I have done him injustice, I hope some one of his Virginia friends here will contradict me, and I will retract. None to contradict me? Then I am right.

How does Gen. Harrison stand on the question of Abolition? As I cannot answer you that question, and as Gen. Harrison will not answer, and as his conscience keeping committee are prevented by rule and the precedent of the convention, I will ask to read an extract from a letter, which will give us some light on the subject.

Here is the letter:

"TO THE PUBLIC.

"FELLOW-CITIZENS: Being called suddenly home to attend my sick family, I have but a moment to answer a few of the calumnies which are in circulation concerning me.

"I am accused of being friendly to slavery. From my earliest youth to the present moment, I have been the ardent friend of human liberty. At the age of eighteen I BECAME A MEMBER OF AN ABOLITION SOCIETY, established at Richmond; the object of which was to ameliorate the condition of slaves, and procure their freedom by every legal means. My venerable friend, Judge Gatch, of Clermont county, was also a member of this society, and has lately given me a certificate that I was one. The obligations which I then came under, I have faithfully performed.'

"WILLIAM HENRY HARRISON."

So much for the letter. Now for a small sentiment, which is a part of a speech delivered by Gen. Harrison on a public occasion. Here it is:

"Should I be asked if there is no way by which the General Government can aid the cause of emancipation, I answer, that it has long been an object near my heart, to see the whole of its surplus revenue appropriated to that object."

This is the sentiment. It is a small sentiment, but big with meaning; and the very attempt to carry it into practical operation would drench your streets in blood, lay waste in wreck and ruin this land, and sink this Union. Still, sir, I cannot say that Gen. Harrison is an Abolitionist. He may have qualified these sentiments so as to make them unexceptionable, but this is for him, or his political conscience-keepers, to show. But, sir, what I want to call your attention to, is the truth of an assertion I once made on this floor, which was, that all the contending Federal factions of this Union will be drummed up and drilled, ranked and sized, faced to the right, and marched to the polls, to cast their suffrage in support of the Federal Whig National Harrisburg convention ticket. General Harrison will be sustained, Abolitionist or no Abolitionist, by all the Abolitionists, as well as by the Federal North and South anti-Abolitionists. John Tyler, a slave holder and a slave owner, will receive the entire Abolition and Federal Whig vote North and South.

It will be remembered that, in 1832, Henry Clay was a candidate for the Presidency on the Federal side. I believe, and such was universally the belief, that he was a Mason of the highest order; and that he stood upon the tip-top round of the masonic ladder. This will not be denied.

Darius Lyman, who was an Antimason, was taken up and presented to the people of Ohio as a candidate for the gubernatorial chair, by an Antimasonic convention. This was at a time when that miserable and contemptible demagogical hobby, Antimasonry, was at its zenith. Antimasons then were as the Abolitionists are now—anti-Democrats; but, strange to say, the Federal Masons to a man sustained Mr. Lyman for Governor, and in turn, and by way of reciprocity, the Antimasons to a man sustained Mr. Clay for the Presidency. Such is the frailty of man when beset by political ambition and the love of power; the solemnity of an oath, peace of conscience, and the sacred ties of religion, are alike their victims of sacrifice. And I now predict, with more confidence than Daniel predicted the destruction of Babylon, that all the factions opposed to the cause of Democracy, all the princes of factions, the Governors and captains, the judges, the counsellors, the treasurers, and the sheriffs of factions, will be gathered together at Ura to worship Nebuchadnezzar's golden image, and the Jew will desert his God and the religion of Israel, and the Pagan will desert his idol, and abandon the sacred mysteries of his temple, and will fall prostrate before the image at the sound of the cornet, flute, harp, sackbut, psaltry, dulcimer, timbrel, jewsharp, banjo, and tambarine. Yes, sir, at the nod of Federalism, all other isms must fall prostrate. But it will not all do. Babylon must sink in wickedness, polution, and idolatry. In the night of feasting and debauchery, the Cyrus of Democracy will destroy it.

Yes, sir, Abolition Whigery of the North will be Whig Abolition of the South, both full blooded twins of blue light Federalism, whether in the North or in the South; and the man must be a wilful liar or a stupid fool, who will attempt to affix either to the support of this Administration, or identify either of them with the Democratic party or the Democratic principles. In support of what I say, permit me to read two small extracts from the Philanthropist of March 31st, 1840. The Philanthropist is a leading, and one of the most thoroughgoing Abolition papers of the day. But here are the extracts. I read from a long article headed "the present Administration:"

"The present Administration, it is generally conceded, is essentially Southern in its principles and policy; it is distinguished by its devotion to the foreign and domestic interests of slavery, perhaps more than by any other feature. The protection of slave labor seems to be its controlling principle. True, the freemen of the North and West number more than twice as many as those of the South, but they are supposed to have no peculiar interests, or the protection of free labor is a minor consideration. The aristocrats of the South give law to the Government, and Mr. Van Buren is their vassal Executive.

"Another view of the subject we would present. Should the Van Buren party, after having rested its hopes of success to a great extent on its anti-Abolition warfare, be defeated, it would be the best thing that could happen for them, as well as the free States. From that moment the party would find it convenient to cut loose from the South. The conviction would arise that it had been leaning on a broken reed, and that there was a power at home which it was of more consequence to conciliate than the slaveholding interest. It is the vocation of Abolitionists to emancipate parties from thraldom to this interest. This they can do by creating such a mass of anti-slavery sentiment in the free States, and so directing it that it shall at once crush the politician who may venture in a single particular to pander to the wishes of the slaveholder."

Comment on these extracts is unnecessary; but I cannot leave them without notice.

So far as the Administration and the Democracy of the free States are charged with undue Southern influence and vassalage, it is a reckless falsehood and a broad slander, worthy of a demagogue and a LIAR steeped in moral depravity and political corruption.

The Administration and the Democracy of the North are as much devoted to the cause of philanthropy, universal emancipation, and the happiness of the human family, as the modern Abolition Whig party. But the Administration and the Democracy of the free States are devoted, too, to the perpetuity of this Union, the peace and order of society, the preservation of the Constitution, and the maintenance of the sovereignty and independence of the States, and the peaceful enjoyment of their domestic institutions, which were guarantied to them at the formation of the Federal Government, and the guarantee of which security constituted a principal condition upon which the Federal Union was formed.

Sir, we have had some fine disquisitions in the President making speeches here, on the transcendent military services of the Federal candidate for the Presidency.

It is not my purpose, for one moment, to throw the slightest shade over any fame that General Harrison may have acquired in the last war; but it must astound every national and consistent man in the Union, that the Federal Whigs should select a military man as a candidate for the Presidency. Sir, indulge me a short time, while I show some of the inconsistency of this self-styled consistent and decency party.

What did the Federal party say of the last war, and of military men? Hear them. I read from the Olive Branch:

"Let no man, who wishes to continue the war by active means, by vote or lending money, have to prostrate himself at the altar on the fast day, for they are actually as much partakers in the war as the soldier who thrusts the bayonet, and the judgment of God will await them.

"Will Federalists subscribe to the loan, (Government loan;) will they lend money to our national rulers? It is impossible," &c.

"Any Federalist who lends money to the Government, must go and shake hands with James Madison, and claim fellowship with Felix Grundy. Let him no more call himself a Federalist and friend to his country. He will be called by others infamous!!!"

"It is very grateful to find that the universal sentiment is, that any man who lends his money to the Government at the present time, will forfeit all claim to common honesty and common courtesy among all true friends to the country."—Boston Gazette.

"We have only room this evening to say that we trust no true friend to his country will be found among the subscribers to the Gallatin loan."—N. Y. Evening Post.

"No peace will ever be made till the people say there shall be no war. If the rich now continue to furnish money, war will continue till the mountains are wetted with blood, till every field in America is white with the bones of the people."—Discourse by Elijah Parrish, D. D.

Sir, I could read an hour from this collection of Federal sayings and doctrines, but I will not detain the committee; but, be it remembered, that at the time of these denunciations, the clouds of war hung the heaviest, the work of plunder, burning, and death, beset our whole seaboard, and our frontier was exposed to the savage rifle, the scalping knife and tomahawk, and the torch of the Indian—the Government was oppressed and borne down with pecuniary embarrassments—every institution of the Government was sinking, and every prospect withering, from the same cause. but what do we find now, sir? The same Federal party sustaining a military man for the first office in their gift; for the Presidency of the United States; and predicating his claims upon his military services in that very war which they so violently denounced, and upon which they invoked, from the sacred altar, the vengeance of God. But that was a long time ago. Well, what did the Federalists say in 1824, when the Democracy sustained Gen. Jackson for the Presidency? Why, sir, it will be remembered by every person who hears me, that every political journal in the country teemed with the most solemn admonitions against placing the Government in the hands of a military chieftain; we were referred to the subversion and downfall of every Republic which had gone before us by military despotism. Such warnings were in the mouth of every Federalist in the land at that time, and were brought to bear against the election of General Jackson, with all the force they could be urged through every possible medium.

Hear Mr. Clay, in his address to the people of the Congressional district composed of the counties of Fayette, Woodford, and Clark, in Kentucky:

"In his [General Jackson's] election to this office, too, I thought I perceived the establishment of a fearful precedent, and I am mistaken in all the warnings of instructive history, if I erred in my judgment. Undoubtedly there are other and many dangers to public liberty, besides that which proceeds from military idolatry; but I have yet to acquire the knowledge of it, if there be one more perilous or more frequent."

[National Intelligencer, March 31, 1825.

To this, all the Federalists said, amen.

But here is more. Mr. Clay, in his letter to Judge Brooke, dated Washington, January 28, 1825, says:

"As a friend of liberty, and to the permanence of our institutions, I cannot consent, in this early stage of their existence, by contributing to the election of a military chieftain, to give the strongest guarantee that this Republic will march in the fatal road which has conducted every other Republic to ruin."

[National Intelligencer, February 12, 1825.

This was strong language, and fearful and solemn admonition. It was thought, however, by some, that this warning was urged with more outward than inward zeal, to secure him against the indignation of the Republican party and the suspicions of the Federal party, in his somerset from the former to the latter. But he continued his warnings in deep sighs of prophecy and Jeremiah lamentations. Hear what he says in 1829, at a public dinner:

"I deprecated it (Gen. Jackson's election) still more, because his elevation I believed would be the result, exclusively, of admiration and gratitude for military service, without regard to indispensable civil qualifications. I can neither retract or modify or alter any opinion which on these subjects I have at any time heretofore expressed.

"I beheld in his election an awful foreboding of the fate which at some future day (I pray God that if it ever arrive, it may be some far distant day) was to befal this infant Republic. All past history had impressed on his mind this solemn apprehension. Nor is it effaced or weakened by cotemporaneous events passing upon our own favored continent.

"It is remarkable that at this epoch, at the head of nine independent Governments, established in both Americas, military officers have been placed, or have placed themselves. Gen. Loyalla has by military force subverted the Republic of La Plata; Gen. Santa Cruz is the Chief Magistrate of Bolivia; Col. Pinto of Chili; Gen. La Mar of Peru; and Gen. Bolivar of Colombia; Central America rent in pieces and bleeding at every pore from wounds inflicted by contending military factions, is under the alternate sway of their chiefs.

"In the Government of our nearest neighbor, an election conducted according to all the requirements of their Constitution had terminated with a majority of the States in favor of Pedeza, the civil candidate. An insurrection was raised in behalf of his military rival. The cry, not exactly of bargain, but of corruption, was sounded; the election was annulled, and a reform effected, by proclaiming General Guerrero, having only a minority of the States, duly elected President.

"The thunders from the surrounding forts, and the acclamations from the assembled multitudes, on the fourth, (March,) told us what General was at the head of our affairs."

[Nat. Intelligencer, March 9, 1829.

I have one more extract to read, which is pertinent: and I hope it will be remembered by all who hear me, and all who may read me, while I am reading extracts from Mr. Clay's speeches, that I am not reading the sentiments of a single individual, but the sentiments of the whole Federal tribe, as expressed through every Federal sheet in the land, by every Federal orator, and every Federal babbling, noisy politician, from the largest to the smallest, and in some instances from the pulpit and the sacred desk.

Now for the last extract:

"In 1838, not two years since, Mr. Clay said in the United States Senate, he (Mr. C.) had also been charged as having left his country and her councils with execrations, going home with restlessness and disgust, and as returning back to annoy the country. What was the ground of this charge? Mr. C. had returned under urgent necessities--his office had been unsolicited, and he had resolved to do his duty in these struggles and these times, and he had denounced a military aspirant, and had denounced him in language which he was proud to have used, when he had exclaimed, 'send us war, pestilence, and famine, rather than curse us with military rule;' and if he could then have foreseen that this execrable measure (the Sub-Treasury bill) would have been introduced by the influence which he then deprecated, he would then have denounced it as he did now, as not at all preferable to war, pestilence and famine, and as not inferior to any one of them in its malign effects on the welfare and prosperity of the country."—Reported in the National Intelligencer, June 25th, 1838.

What a man this Mr. Clay is! From 1825 up to 1838, his solemn admonitions to man, and his sincere prayers to God, were, that our country had better be blighted and withered in famine, desolated with pestilence, and drenched in blood, than that a military man (General Jackson) should be President, and in 1838 said, virtually, that rather than this Government should collect, keep safe, and disburse its own revenue, in the management of its own fiscal operations, or rather than the banks should cease to rule the Government, the country, and the people, he preferred that the country should be desolated with war, pestilence, or famine. Is this the raving of madness, or the madness of raving?

Mr. Chairman, if you can find, in the whole history of human depravity, sentiments involving, in the abstract, more theoretical wickedness, reckless ambition, and moral debasement, than these sentiments do, you will have to read that history over once more than I have. But base as they were, benighted in wickedness as the brain must have been that conceived them, corrupt as the heart was that cherished them, and poisoned as the tongue and lips were that gave them birth, the whole Federal pack yelped Amen to them. But what do you think now, sir? In the face of all these solemn warnings and impressive admonitions, and in the face of all these appeals to heaven to visit this land with all the other combined calamities, either of the anger of God or the folly of man, rather than this people should be ruled executively by a military man, that same Federal party, with that same Henry Clay at their head, are now moving heaven and earth to place the Executive Government in the hands of a military man!! Monstrous! and that, too, on the open and professed ground of transcendent military services! for no other claims or pretensions are urged. I will leave comment on such conduct to those who may read me with these simple inquiries. At the time of which I am speaking, were you sincere when you were warning the Democracy, in long groans, deep sighs, and with tears in your eyes, of the fatal consequences that would result from placing the Executive Department of this Government in the hands of a military captain? If you were sincere, you are now practising a base fraud upon the American people, and voluntarily and wilfully endangering the civil and political institutions of your country by attempting to give a military captain the control of the Government.

But if you are now sincere in pushing the claims of General Harrison, on the ground of gratitude for his military services, and you believe the Government will be safe in the hands of a military chieftain, you were then practising a base fraud upon the American people, and your whole effort to prevent the election of General Jackson was the result of deception, fraud, and demagogism. How will you reconcile your conflicting conduct with an intelligent, honest, patriotic, and candid people? Will you attempt an explanation of your conduct, or will you rest your demagogisms, as you always have done, on what you believe to be the thoughtless stupidity and ignorance of what you call the "common people?"

But I will proceed to examine what the military claims of General Harrison are; and let me remind you that it is not my purpose to throw the slightest shade over the military reputation of General Harrison, or pluck a leaf from the wreath which his successes in the field may have secured to him. But when General Harrison's military services are presented as claims upon the suffrages of the American people, for the highest civil office in their gift, it becomes the right and the duty of every citizen to examine and inquire into the character, quality, and extent of those services now set up as a claim. It is now, in the Federal sheets, and by the party orators, proclaimed with emphasis, and published in capitals, that General Harrison's military career and military services never were assailed until after he was presented as a candidate for President. Well, sir, this is very creditable to him, and a proud boast for him and his party if true; but how frail are all human calculations and boasts! Just indulge me while I blow up this political air castle; this paper balloon, inflated with wordy gas, on which General Harrison is to ride to the Presidency.

Here, sir, is an extract from the journals of the Senate of the United States, as reported in Niles's Register:

"The Senate resumed the consideration of the joint resolution directing medals to be struck, and, together with the thanks of Congress, presented to Major General Harrison and Governor Shelby, and for other purposes. After some disuussion, Mr. Lacock moved to amend the resolution, by striking therefrom Major General Harrison. The motion was determined in the affirmative, by the following vote:

"Yeas—Messrs. Gillard, Gore, Hunter, King, Lacock, Mason, Roberts, Thompson, Jackson, Tait, Turner, and Varnum—12.

"Nays—Messrs. Barber, Barry, Condit, Horsey, Macon, Morrow, Ruggles, Talbot, Wells, and Williams—10.

Whether the Senate was right or wrong in this signal, lasting and withering rebuke of General Harrison, it does not affect the windy boast that "General Harrison's military character never was assailed until he was presented as a candidate for President. It will be seen that this vote of the Senate was had in the fore part of 1816, just at the close of the war, when the services of the brave were fresh in the grateful recollection of every friend to his country. The discription of successful battles dwelt in delight upon the lips of every patriot, and the songs in praise of those who distinguished themselves were echoed from hill to hill, and from mountain to mountain, from one end of the continent to the other. It will be remembered, too, that no individual or association of individuals could be supposed to be better acquainted with the military character and merits of those who served in the last war, than were the Senators of the United States. The Senate is the highest, most responsible, and most honorable tribunal in the American Government. Its members are composed of those who are selected for their wisdom, their integrity, and their patriotism. It is the province and the duty of the United States Senate to award honor and thanks to whom honor and thanks are due, but this was the honor and thanks which were meted to General Harrison, at a time when the sheet of the war history had hardly dried, and when the echo of the song of praise had not died on the distant hills. I believe the Senate done wrong in withholding the vote of thanks, and the medal proposed in the resolution, and so the Senate subsequently thought; for a vote of thanks and the medal were awarded. "But deny me honor, rather than praise me faintly," Such was the praise the Senate bestowed on General Harrison.

So much for the Senate journal. I will now ask the Clerk to read the public letter of Joseph Duncan, ex-Governor of Illinois; a staunch modern Whig, and a violent opposer of the present Administration. I like to convict the Whigs with evidence from their own mouths; but here is the letter.

The Clerk read:

Letter of General Duncan, Governor of Illinois.

"WASHINGTON CITY, March 25, 1836.

"DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 20th has been received, and I most cheerfully comply with your request, in giving such an account of the transactions at Sandusky, as my memory, at this period, and my time, will enable me to do.

"About the 20th of July, 1813, General Harrison, then at Lower Sandusky, hearing that the British army had crossed Lake Erie to Fort Meigs, being about five thousand strong, immediately changed his head quarters to Seneca, seven or eight miles up the Sandusky river, where he assembled his forces, then on the march from the interior, leaving Major Croghan, with about 150 men, to defend Fort Stephenson, with an understanding at the time, that the fort, then in a weak and wretched condition, was to be abandoned, should the enemy advance with artillery, but if not, to be defended to the last extremity.

"Harrison, with his force, then small, had scarcely left us, before Croghan commenced putting the fort (which was only a stockading of small round logs, and a few log store houses) in a proper state of defence, in which he evinced the most admirable judgment and the most untiring perseverance.

"During the last ten or twelve days that intervened between the time that Gen. Harrison left us and the appearance of the enemy, a ditch was dug, four feet deep and six feet wide, entirely round the fort, outside of the stockading, the ground for 200 yards round the fort was cleared of timber and brush, and many other preparations made for the enemy.

"About this time Gen. Harrison received information that the enemy had raised the siege at Fort Meigs, and had started in the direction of Sandusky and Camp Seneca. On receiving this intelligence he determined to retreat from his position, and immediately sent an express to Fort Stephenson, which arrived about sunrise, ordering Maj. Croghan to burn the fort, with all the munitions and stores, and retreat wi hout delay to headquarters, giving, also, some precautionary instructions about the route, &c.

"On receiving this order, Croghan instantly placed it in the hands of the officers, who were all present, and required them to consider it and express an opinion of the propriety of obeying or disobeying it. The board was formed, and on putting the question, beginning, as usual, with the youngest officer, it was ascertained that a majority of us were for disobeying the order. Croghan returned to the room, and being informed of our directions, said, "I am glad of it; I HAD RESOLVED TO DISOBEY AT ALL HAZARDS," and immediately despatched an express to Gen. Harrison, giving him that information. Immediately on the arrival of this express Gen. Harrison despatched Lt. Col. Ball, with his squadron of dragoons, with orders to arrest Croghan, and bring him to headquarters, (which was done,) and sent another officer to take command. By this time, in consequence of his not arriving agreeably to his expectations and orders, the General abandoned all idea of a retreat, although his munitions and stores were piled up ready to be set on fire as soon as Croghan should reach Seneca; and it is not to be doubted that if Croghan had arrived according to orders ☞ General Harrison would have retreated instantly, leaving the whole frontier, our fleet at Erie, and the store at Cleveland—the destruction of which was the object of the invasion and movements down the lake—at the mercy of the enemy!!

"After being detained one night, Croghan returned to Sandusky, and was reinstated in his command; an occasion which gave an indescribable joy to the officers and soldiers in the fort, and which only could be equalled, in intensity of feeling, by the chagrin and mortification felt at his arrest. Especially was the event pleasing to those officers who had sustained him in disobeying the order, resolved as they were, when he was arrested, to share his fate, be it good or evil.

"Soon after his return, the enemy so long expected, made his appearance, and demanded a surrender. Crogan answered, by directing Ensign Shipp to assure General Proctor that it would be blown to ——— first.

"I need hardly say, after what has been related, that their apperrance, relieving us from our long suspense, was hailed with seeming joy by the Major, and most, if not all, of his command.

"The excitement produced by what had occurred, and his return just in time to meet the enemy, inspired his command with an enthusiasm rarely, if ever, surpassed, and which alone renders man invincible.

"The fort was forthwith besieged, cannonaded, and bombarded, from the gunboats and the batteries on land, for nearly four hours, without cessation; during all which time, every officer and soldier appeared to be animated by the cool and manly bearing of the commander.

"I well remember his expression at the first sound of the bugle, given by the enemy as the signal for the charging upon the works. We were sitting together; he sprung upon his feet, saying, 'Duncan, every man to his post, for in twenty minutes they will attempt to take us by storm. Recollect, when you hear my voice crying relief, come to me with all the men that can be spared from your part of the line." He instantly passed up the line, repeating to every officer, and had scarcely got the men in place before the whole British army, divided into three columns, marched upon the fort, and made a desperate assault, continuing it for near an hour, when they were repulsed with a loss of killed and wounded, estimated at that time to be near double the number in the fort, and is stated by English writers to be about ninety.

"During the engagement, I saw Croghan often, and witnessed with delight his intrepid and gallant conduct, which, I firmly believe, never has been surpassed at any time, on any occasion.

"In the heat of the action, I frequently heard him exclaim, 'huzza, my brave fellows, we are hewing them to pieces; five minutes more, and we'll blow them to —. By H—n, every officer and soldier has immortalized himself,' &c. And through out the whole affair, he evinced the greatest solicitude for the safety of every one but himself.

"The sagacity displayed in arranging the cannon, so as to open a mask embrasure to rake the enemy in the ditch, at a point evidently selected by them for the breach—in placing the logs on pins near the top of the picket, which could be tilted off by one man, and from twenty to thirty feet long, of heavy timber, swept every thing before them—his activity in piling bags of sand against the pickets wherever the enemy attempted to make a breach with their cannon, by which means each point of attack grew stronger from the moment it was assailed, are worthy of any general at any age.

"You are right, sir, in my judgment, in saying that the Government has has not done justice to Col. Croghan for his conduct in that affair, which is without a parallel in the military annals of our country.

"As to myself, having acted a very subordinate part, I never did, nor do I now, set up any claims for distinction. To know that I did my duty to my country, though not hardened into manhood, was then, and is now, enough for me. But of him feet no hesitancy in saying injustice has been done to him in being overlooked by the Government, and the erroneous statements of historians.

"M'Affee, the historian of the late war, and Dawson, the biographer of Gen. Harrison, have studiously kept out of view that the object of the invasion was the destruction of our ships, under Com. Perry, at Presque Isle, and boats and stores at Cleveland—these were looked upon with solicitude by the British—were reconnoitered—and on one or two occasions were attempted to be destroyed by landing on board their fleet. They have also failed to account for the movement of the whole British forces down the lake, in the direction of Cleveland and Erie, before their defeat at Sandusky, which was attacked to satisfy their Indian allies, who demanded the scalps and plunder of the place. They have kept out of view the fact that Gen. Harrison had determined to retreat to the interior, after burning all the supplies which he had collected; ☞ that he ordered Major Croghan to abandon and burn Fort Stephenson; that his refusal to obey, and failure to arrive at headquarters, prevented this retreat and consequent destruction of our fleet, millions of public stores, and exposure of five hundred miles of frontier to the combined enemy!

"Both have stated that Gen Harrison never doubted that Major Croghan would be able to repulse an enemy of near two thousand, and which they say he understood to be five thousand, with one hundred and thirty men, his effective force on the day of battle, one six-pounder with ammunition for only seven shots, and about forty rounds for the small arms; when the fact was notorious, that Gen. Harrison was heard to say during the siege, when the firing could be heard in his camp, speaking of Croghan, "the blood be on his own head; I wash my hands of it!" not doubting for a moment, nor did any one with him, that the garrison would be cut off.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

JOSEPH DUNCAN.

Col. PRESTON, Military Committee, Senate.

I now submit a protestation issued from "Grand Camp Ohio Militia, August 29, 1813." I will ask the Clerk to read this protestation, and I regret its length will prevent its introduction in my printed remarks; but its object and meaning will be under stood by the resolutions with which it concludes. It is signed by a number of the officers, now beonging to both pollitical parties.

The Clerk read as follows:

* * * * * * Therefore,

"Resolved, That we place the most implicit confidence in his Excellency, Return J. Meigs, as commander-in-chief of the militia of this State, and that we view him as a wise and judicious Chief Magistrate.

"Resolved, That after the various requisitions and complicated demands from his Excellency, Major General Harrison, we highly approve of his Excellency, the Governor's, conduct on the occasion, and fully coincide with him in the propriety of leaving force sufficient to answer any emergency.

"Resolved, That we regret the backward state of the preparations was such as to exclude the troops called to the relief of Fort Meigs, as well those who returned as the proportion retained, from participating in the present campaign, for which they discovered so great an anxiety.

"Resolved, That the conduct of his Excellency, the Commander-in-Chief, WILLIAM H. HARRISON, of the Northwestern Army, on this occasion, is shrouded in mystery, and to us perfectly inexplicable.

"Resolved, That the foregoing preamble and resolutions be signed by the general and field officers and commandants of independent corps, approving the same in their own and in behalf of their respective commands; and that a copy of the proceedings be delivered by the Secretary to his Excellency the Governor, and a copy to the printer at Franklinton, and each of the printers in Chillicothe, with a request that all the printers in the State would give publicity to the same; also that the same be signed by the president and attested by the Secretary."

Judge Advocate."

When the name of William Key Bond was pronounced, Mr. D. demanded of his colleague [Mr. BOND] if he was that man.

[Mr. B. answered in the affirmative, and asked to explain.

Mr. D. gave way.

Mr. B. said, in substance, that the officers and troops at Grand Camp of Ohio Militia, were disappointed at some of General Harrison's movements. They were thought slow. They considered themselves neglected, and feared they were going to be disappointed in an opportunity to distinguish themselves in the campaign, which they had undertaken in the service of their country; and, without understanding the motives which governed the movements of the Commander-in-chief, he had drawn up the protestation and resolutions which had just been read, and submitted them to the officers of the camp, who considered and adopted them, without a dissenting voice. He (Mr. B.) had long thought the officers had done General Harrison injustice. Mr. B. said he was young (not over twenty-one) at that time. Had he had the advantage of years, he would have been more capable of appreciating the motives of General Harrison, and his course would have been different. He stated that he held a public communication over the signature of Allen Trimble, which he wished read. It was read, and consisted of an apology similar to that which Mr. B. had made as above.]

Mr. D. resumed. Mr. Chairman, my colleague says he was young and inexperienced when he drew up this protestation and resolutions, and signed them. I will ask him if any of the other officers, whose names are affixed, were older than he was.

Mr. B. answered, yes; nearly all older than himself—some thirty, some forty years of age, and perhaps some upward.

Mr. D. asked Mr. B. if he had ever before tendered to the public a recantation of his course in that matter.

Mr. B. answered in the negative.

Mr. D. What is the date of the communication signed Allen Frimble?

Mr. B. It is of the date of January, 1840.

Mr. D. said, these recantations have both been made since General Harrison was nominated for the Presidency. Had General Harrison not been nominated for the Presidency, they never would have been made. It is now upwards of twenty-seven years since this spread of infamy overclouded General Harrison; and never, in all that time, was this cloud attempted to be dispersed. Allen Trimble was the Governor of Ohio for four years, and my colleague has been a member of Congress for nearly six years. These names, of imposing influence, put afloat a public manifestation of the infamy and disgrace that has attached to General Harrison, and gave sanction to the sirocco breath of slander for twenty-seven years; and for that time has his reputation been withering under it, and, what is still more remarkable, my colleague and the ex-Governor have all this time been the political friends of Gen. Harrison, and, with him, have labored at the Federal oar through all the surges and tempests of party strife. I say that the infamy charged upon General Harrison at Grand Camp Ohio Militia, and spread to the four winds through the public newspaper sheets, has dwelt with and abided upon his reputation for twenty-seven years, and if he had not been nominated for the Presidency, this infamy, without recantation or explanation, would have followed his reputation to the grave, and rested upon his memory for all time. Gentlemen, why did you not come out sooner with your recantations. I fear you are now too late. An intelligent community will charge you with injustice and ingratitude, or they will charge you with demagoguism and an attempt to practise a trick for political deception. Which horn of the dilemma do you prefer to hang upon?

I think I have shown how miserably puerile the vain and empty Whig boast that "Gen. Harrison's military character never was assailed until he was a candidate for President," appears before the omnipotence of truth, when it is remembered that the expose I have made is from Whig evidence. It is vainly and pompously boasted that General Harrison was in more battles during the last war than any commander in the service.

This is not true. General Harrison was not in a battle during the last war; and I defy his friends to point out one in which he was present, and acted in person. What battle was he in? Tippecanoe? That was no battle; it was a surprise by night, and a defeat of the American troops. Four or five hundred Indians attacked General Harrison's army, consisting of ten or fifteen hundred of as brave men as ever marched in defence of a country, in the night, when the General and his troops were sleeping in supposed security, and killed and wounded one hundred and eighty of Kentucky and Indiana's choicest sons; and retired at break of day, with perhaps the loss of forty or fifty killed and wounded. The fact that the Indians retired at day break does not warrant the charge of defeat upon them. The attack and retreat they made was according to their mode of warfare. In the surprise of Tippecanoe, General Harrison and his men fought bravely; and, under all the circumstances, so far as the surprise was concerned, did honor to the American arms and to American chivalry. But let no man so far disgrace the memory of those who fell, and the reputation of those who survived the battles of Monmouth, Bunker Hill, Lexington, Trenton, and many others of the Revolution, by calling that a battle and a victory, which was a surprise and a defeat. It is a perversion of terms, and if spoken in any other spirrit than that of gratitude and national pride, in or out of this country, will bring ridicule and derision upon him who speaks it. I say that General Harrison and his troops fought bravely at the surprise of Tippecanoe, and I say so in pride and gratitude; so says a nation, in the same spirit.

But General Harrison has been censured for permitting the enemy to select his camp ground. He has been censured for permitting himself to be deceived by the friendly pretensions of the enemy. He has been censured for not causing a breastwork to be raised as a security against surprise.

But above all, General Harrison has been censured for encamping his troops on a narrow piece of ground, so surrounded with a deep marsh as almost to cut off retreat in case of surprise. Skill to avoid ambuscades and defiles, and in the judicious selection of camp grounds, have always been considered among the best marks of a prudent and wise General.

The incautious manner in which Sempronius permitted Hannibal to lead him and the Roman troops into an ambuscade, by which they were defeated, and almost all cut off at the battle of Trebia, has ever been considered unwise and fatally imprudent, and has fixed to the memory of Sempronius the character of fiery zeal, rather than useful bravery. Many other fatal instances could be named of like imprudence.

These are matters, so far as they relate to the battle of Tippecanoe, I know nothing about. I was a boy at the time, and six or seven hundred miles from the scene of action. I have no practical knowledge of the matter; nor have I the advantages of the military skill, experience, and learning, of the two hundred and thirty-nine members who surround me, all of whom my colleague [Mr. CORWIN] informs us are colonels and generals; for I have never been a fourth corporal. I must leave the decision of the matter to those who were actors at that time, and to such experience as that of my colleague, [Mr. C.] who informs us that he is a colonel. But with all my inexperience, I will venture one opinion, and that is, if the Indians had commenced the work of death two hours sooner; or if they had had the Joshua who commanded the armies of Israel and Gibeon against the five kings of the Amorites, to have commanded the sun to stand still two hours, and thereby given them two hours more of darkness to have performed the work of death, General Harrison, and every man of his army, would have been cut off. Not a man, in all probability, would have been left to relate the fatal and bloody story. So much for the "Battle of Tippecanoe," of which General Harrison is sung the hero!

Where do we find Gen. Harrison next? In the battle of the river Raisin? No: he was not in that battle; but there were some circumstances in relation to Gen. Harrison, associated with that unfortunate battle and massacre, that I have heard talked of, which, if they existed, are not very favorable to the General; but as I have no practical knowledge of them, I will agree, if his friends will do the same, to say nothing about them, and by such an agreement Gen. Harrison will not be the loser. But I am told Gen. Harrison was in Fort Meigs when it was attacked; be it so: he was, and conducted himself well, and behaved bravely; but that was a siege and a defence: it was no battle. Was Gen. Harrison a participator in the gallant defence of Fort Stephenson? No. Governor Duncan's letter informs us that "he ordered Maj. Croghan to burn the post, with all the munitions and stores, and retreat, without delay, to headquarters." Croghan refused to obey; on the contrary, continued his zealous and patriotic efforts to put the fort in a proper state of defence. The fort was attacked in the manner, and by the force, as described in the letter which you have heard read. The defence of Fort Stephenson was one of the most brilliant affairs recorded in American history; and earned its commander, and those who fought with him, never fading glory. That defence was the first which did true and unvarnished honor on the frontier to the American arms. It revived the hopes and lifted from despair the whole Northwest, and was the first effectual check the haughty and savage foe met. Major Croghan and his brave officers and men have met a reward in the affections and gratitude of a nation. Be it remembered that the defence of Fort Stephenson, and all the honor and glory that attended it was in direct violation of the express orders of General Harrison. If Major Croghan is entitled to the unmeasured gratitude of the American people, the song of praise to General Harrison will be weak.

What is the next battle in which we may look for General Harrison? The battle of the Thames? Yes, he was there; and of his conduct there I have no fault to find; nor would I name it, except in his praise, but for some communications now afloat, evidently started for the base, mean, and unhallowed purpose of crowning General Harrison with the laurels which Colonel Johnson reaped in blood on the plains of the Thames. Degraded indeed must that party be, when the crippled veteran must be robbed of his honors, and be permited to sink in forgetfulness to the grave, with his body covered with wounds received on the field of battle in his country's cause, for the base purposes of party. The glorious battle of the Thames occupies one of the brightest and proudest pages of American history. Its history is not better known than the fact that Col. R. M. Johnson is its hero. If ingratitude could palsy the tongue, he would be made dumb who would deny him the name of hero and the conquerer of the Thames. The indignation of a proud and grateful nation will rest upon the wretch who will attempt to rob or steal the escutcheon dedicated by a nation's gratitude to Col. R. M. Johnson for his bravery, gallantry, and patriotism, in the battle of the Thames. Sir, in that battle he gained laurels which do him the highest honor in life and will adorn his memory in death, while there is a free American on whose lips his name can dwell. Who ever before heard Gen. Harrison called the Hero of the Thames? Why, the phrase, "Col. Johnson, the Hero of the Thames," is so identified with American pronunciation, that no tongue of the present generation can be taught to pronounce the name of Gen. Harrison, as a substitute for Col. Johnson, by prefixing it to "Hero of the Thames."

Sir, this base attempt at robbery of the honors of Col. Johnson necessarily compels me to ask your attention a few moments while I attempt a short description of the battle of the Thames, and the several parts that Gen. Harrison and Col. Johnson performed in it.

As it is not my purpose to give a history of the last war, nor of the march of the Northwestern army from Fort Malden to the river Thames, I will commence my description on the battle ground; and as it is the relative claims to honor of Gen. Harrison and Col. Johnson that are at issue, my description shall be principally with reference to them.

The enemy was overtaken by the American troops, on the river Thames, about a mile and a half below the Moravian towns. The British regulars, in number six or seven hundred, were stretched across a narrow piece of ground, with the river on their left, and a long deep narrow swamp on their right. The Indians were posted on the right of the British on the other side of the swamp, commencing at the edge of the swamp and extending to the right in the form of a half moon.

Colonel Johnson, with his mounted regiment, first overtook the enemy, and were in advance of the infantry some three or four miles. As soon as the enemy was overtaken, and his position known, General Harrison, who was with the infantry, was informed thereof. As soon as Colonel Johnson discovered the enemy, and his position, he formed his troops in charging columns, except one company of spies, which was dismounted, and stretched across between the river and the swamp in open order before the charging columns, and fronting the British line. At the moment this form of attack was executed, General Harrison arrived; and, upon consultation with Colonel Johnson, permitted him to charge the enemy, and returned himself to the infantry, which was about a mile at that time in the rear. When General Harrison left Colonel Johnson, it was supposed that the swamp could not be crossed. Consequently, the attack could not be made upon the Indians and British at the same time. It was therefore agreed that Colonel Johnson should be permitted to fight the British alone, first, because there was not room for the cavalry and infantry to fight at the same time, and secondly, because infantry and cavalry cannot fight together on the same ground at the same time. After General Harrison left Colonel Johnson, the latter discovered that the swamp could be crossed. Colonel Johnson then ordered his brother, Lieutenant Colonel James Johnson, to take command of the first battalion, and attack the British at the sound of the bugle, when he at the same moment would attack the Indians. Colonel Johnson crossed the swamp with the second battalion, and, by three charging columns, made the attack on the Indians at the same moment that his brother James attacked the British, both at the sound of the bugle. In less than fifteen minutes after the charge was made on the British, they surrendered; they were ordered to stack their arms, and were conducted by James Johnson prisoners of war to Gen. Harrison, and delivered to him at the head of the infantry, a mile in the rear of the battle. By permission of General Harrison, James Johnson returned and joined his brother, Colonel Richard, who was still fighting, and engaged with his battalion in the fight with the Indians. I have stated that Col. Richard M. Johnson made the attack on the Indians by three charging columns, but that mode of attack proved unsuccessful, owing to the thicket or underbrush and other obstructions which covered the ground, which made horses useless. The men were ordered to dismount, and fight the Indians in their own way, and in that way the battle was finished, and victory obtained.

At the onset of the battle Colonel Johnson was at the head of what was called the forlorn hope, (twenty select men) and that hope in front of the charging columns. On the charge, and at the first fire, every man of that hope was cut off or unhorsed, except the Colonel himself, (and one other,) who received several wounds. After they were dismounted, Col. Johnson still continued in the front of the battle, and between his men and the Indians, until he came in contact with Tecumseh, and shot him. When the Indians saw their Chief fall, they took flight, and were pursued by Major Thompson for some distance. Colonel Johnson sunk under his wounds, and was borne from the field.

Where was General Harrison during this action? My colleague [Mr. CORWIN] says, that he was in the rear, where he ought to have been; but some of the demagogues and hired minions of the day, say "that he was in the heat of the battle, and in all parts of it." The statement of one fact will place that falsehood in its proper place.

Col. Johnson received five balls through his body and limbs. His clothes and accoutrements were perforated and cut from head to foot with balls, and the charger which he rode received fifteen wounds by rifle balls, of which he died in a few minutes after the action was over. How was it, then, if General Harrison was "in the heat of the battle, and in every part of it," that he came of without the smell of powder upon his garments. His escape must have been as miraculous as the escape of Daniel from the den of hungry lions, and of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, from the fiery furnace. The day of miracles has passed. General Harrison was not "in the heat of the battle of the Thames, and every part of it," and he had about as much to do with command in the action as John Rogers who was burnt at the stake.

Colonel R. M. Johnson commanded in the battle of the Thames.

"Colonel R. M. Johnson is the hero of the Thames."

I believe that General Harrison did his duty. But it is casting a dark reflection on General Harrison to say that he was in the heat of the battle with "Governor Shelby and his infantry." All the fighting was done on a square of not more than the fourth of a mile. If the infantry were present, why were the Indians not taken prisoners. If General Harrison could have crossed the swamps, and did not, he was highly to blame for permitting a single battalion to fight twelve or fifteen hundred Indians, near an hour. If he did cross the swamp with the infantry, and he and they were actually in the fight, that strips the battle of all its briliancy, and the American arms of honor; for all the Indians escaped, except what fell. If the dragroons were fighting the Indians for near an hour in close grapple, why were the infantry not ordered to surround the Indians, and take them prisoners? Sir, attempt to rob Colonel Johnson and his gallant regiment of the glory of that battle, and that moment you run into inexplicable difficulties, and bring disgrace upon the American arms, and dishonor upon the commander. The history of the battle of the Thames had better be permitted to stand as it is, and as the world understands it. The political cause of General Harrison will not be advanced by violating truth, justice, and honor. The American people, ever ready to mete the reward of gratitude to those who defend their country in the hour of peril, have also the capacity and discrimination to award justice and honor to whom justice and honor are due.

The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CRARY,] in his remarks, thought that, in the confusion and turmoil of the surprise of Tippecanoe, the commanding General should have been at his tent, where he might have been found by the officers who sought his orders. To this my colleague [Col. CORWIN] took exceptions, and favored us with many illustrations and examples to prove that the commanding General should be at the head of his army, and in the front of the battle; but when he was forced to admit that General Harrison was in the rear of the battle of the Thames, with the infantry, he assured us, without any explanation or qualification, that that was the proper place for the commanding General. I believe, under all the circumstances, it was the proper place for General Harrison. These circumstances I have attempted to explain, though my colleague left us without explanation. I will attempt some illustrations to prove that the rear of an army has not always been the position which commanding Generals have occupied in time of battle.

In the great battle of Thymbrea between Cyrus and Crœsus, in which the whole power of the Persians and Medes was arrayed against the Lydians and Assyrians, after Cyrus had finished the order of attack, and was prepared to make the onset, he drank a little wine, poured some upon the ground as a libation to the gods, mounted his horse in the front of his army, and called out, "Follow me." He continued to fight in front of the army until the battle was finished.

Alexander the Great commanded in person the right wing of his army against the Persians at the battle of the Granicus; he was the first to enter the river, and to meet and encounter the enemy on the other side. He continued to fight in the front ranks until victory was his.

The same Alexander was the first to mount the walls of Odyracea and plunge himself into the thickest of the enemy, when his army stormed that city.

Hannibal fought in the front ranks of the battle Cannæ.

In the celebrated battle between Cæsar and Pompey, the former was in the front ranks from the commencement of the engagement until the latter, with his troops, was routed.

Miltiades fought in person at the head and front of his army against the Persians, in the memorable battle of Marathon.

But later, (and my colleague brings it to my mind,) when Napoleon attempted to pass a bridge at Lodi, his troops were cut off as fast as they were marched up, column after column. He rushed to the head of the foremost column, in the midst of the thickest fire, seized the standard, and ordered his troops to follow him. So, sir, commanding generals have not always posted themselves in the rear at the time of battle.

I would not have presented these illustrations with a view to apply them to General Harrison's position at the battle of the Thames, only that my colleague seemed desirous of turning his position to some political advantage, by assigning the rear as the proper place for him.

My colleague seemed to lay claim to the Presidency for General Harrison, because his history covered a great part of the history of this country. That argument, of itself, has but little weight in it. Some of the basest and most perfidious wretches that ever disgraced the image of man, and the vilest scourges that ever lived to curse the human family, have occupied the largest portion of history, and their names, though known in infamy alone, stand foremost on the records of human history. It is not the historical recollections of any man that secures to him respect and confidence in his own day. The man who has rendered services, civil or military, will find those services written in the hearts of his countrymen, and their affectionate remembrance will be transmitted to their posterity. If General Harrison has rendered services to his country which have not been cancelled, there is always a spirit of gratitude identified with, and forming a part of, the very nature of he American people, to reward them whenever the demand is made, so that it be not at the expense or political principle.

Has General Harrison uncancelled claims upon his country, and what are their character? If they are pecuniary, present them. Are they upon the gratitude of the people? If so, how are they to be liquidated? By a sacrifice of all political principle on the part of the Democracy of this country, do you suppose? No, sir. The Republicans of this country hold their Democratic principles too sacred to barter them off in gratitude for any man's services, however valuable they may have been. If General Jackson, at any time in the zenith of his popularity, with all the brilliancy and glory that surrounded his name, and all his transcendent services that constituted his country's boast, with all the unmeasured and unmeasurable flow of national gratitude in his favor, had, in the course of his political career, deserted or abandoned one of the fundamental principles of Democracy, the Republican party would have abandoned him politically, though they would have retained their gratitude for his services. Nor, sir, if the Father of our Country were to rise from the tomb and walk forth amongst us, demanding of the Republican party a sacrifice of their principles at the shrine of gratitude, it would be denied him. Gratitude is one thing with the Democracy, and political principle is another—the latter never can be sacrified to the former. But more of this before I close.

I desire to inquire if the Federal party are sincere in their manifestations of gratitude to General Harrison for his military services. I have before exposed their inconsistency in relation to their support of a military chieftain for the Presidency; but I now desire to know whether all this show has any foundation in gratitude. Gratitude is one of the noblest principles that claims a residence in the human bosom, while hypocrisy is one of the vilest that corrupts the heart of man. And now, sir, I fearlessly assert, that all this parade of gratitude for the military services of General Harrison is fiction and flummery; it is the result of contemptible demagoguism and corrupt hypocrisy for the purposes of party deception. You have neither confidence in the skill and qualifications of Gen. Harrison, nor gratitude for his services.

I say you have no confidence in his skill or qualifications, and having none yourselves, (you, the Federal leaders,) you believe secretly that the American people have none; hence it is you deem it necessary, as a substitute for the want of confidence, to thatch the country with certificates, thick and numerous as leaves in autumn. Why, sir, I hold a speech in my hand—a long speech—made and published by my colleague, [Mr. GOODE,] literally made up of certificates, to prove that General Harrison has done some service to his country. So it is with every speech made here; one half of the contents of every Federal newspaper consists in certificates of General Harrison's military services. Every wind that whistles past us rattles with certificates, paper resolves, dinner-party harangues, and stump orations, all to prove that the Federal candidate for the Presidency has been a General—has done service to his country—and is now a military chieftain; all of which, with the reflecting man, only goes to prove that the manufacturers of those certificates believe that the man for whom they are certifying has little or no hold on the confidence and affections of the people. If General Harrison has rendered services of such a character as to entitle him to the first office in the gift of the American people, do you suppose they don't know it? If he has not rendered such service, do you suppose you can manufacture a pasteboard General out of shinplaster certificates, and pass him off for a military chieftain? If you do, you will find yourselves as much mistaken as you were in the political effects of John Binns's coffin handbills.

Sir, I think your array of certificates degrades General Harrison. If I were his political friend, as I am his personal, I would deprecate and denounce your certificate system as degrading and politically impolitic. As it is with me, I say General Harrison deserves better and more dignified treatment. By such a course of treatment, you fasten upon his name in life, and his memory in death, the odious cognomen of "the certificate General." If you are sincere in your demonstrations of gratitude for the services of General Harrison, why did you let them sleep, almost without notice, for more than a quarter of a century? Why did you let one entire generation pass away, and part of another, without even waking them up by the thundering artillery, in celebration of the "battle of Tippecanoe?" Who ever heard of the celebration of the "battle of Tippecanoe," until after the lapse of more than a quarter of a century? Why did you let General Harrison glide down the hill of time to its very horizon, before you once thought of gladdening his heart by demonstrations of gratitude for his perilous services in "the battle of Tippecanoe?" Now when he is treading on the broken and decayed planks of the bridge of time, when the clouds of night begin to thicken about his head—when the death bell of threescore and ten begins to ring in his ears, just when the Divine lease for the longest life of man is about to expire, and just when, according to the terms of that lease, he must take his leap from the horizon of time to eternity; just when, with all your demonstrations of gratitude, if even accompanied with artillery's loudest thundering peals, you can hardly quicken the pulsation of the relaxed, time-worn artery, as it drives the stream of life sluggishly along its quivering channel, you commence celebrating "the battle of Tippecanoe." You are not sincere, I repeat. All your outward demonstrations of gratitude are nothing but cant and hypocrisy, worthy of a demagogue and a reckless and unprincipled faction, who stand prepared to seize and possess yourselves of power, even at the sacrifice of the principles of your Government and the prostration of your free institutions. It is power and office you are hunting after, as the hungry hyena howls across the sultry desert of Sahara.

But are you sincere; and do you really want to cast your suffrage for a military man? Then I present you the name of Colonel Richard M. Johnson. He is a candidate not for the first office in your gift, but for the second. He has done service to his country. He has distinguished himself as a statesman in the Cabinet, and as a soldier in the field. His name stands foremost of all now living in the history of his country's praise. His civil life has been devoted to his country's highest interests. The free institutions of the Government have ever received a steady and powerful support from his hand while in the councils of the nation. The claims of the Revolutionary soldier have always had his strictest attention. While a member of Congress, his time, his talents, and his influence, have been devoted to that remnant, who linger in life and old age, only to link the living with the dead, and to tell with living lips, and a warm heart, the stories of the Revolution. The never ceasing praise of the soldier's widow and the soldier's orphan are his. His heart is formed of kindness, and melts at the demand of charity and need. His home is the home of the poor man. His table stands spread for the hungry, and his purse is ever open to the purposes of charity and humanity. Then Col. Johnson has some civil claims upon your suffrage. He is the friend of the human family; will you cast him your suffrage. No, he must be a military man these chivalrous times, and in this Federal day of military jubilee. But he too is a military chieftain. He fought in the same war with General Harrison. He fought the enemy two to one on the plains of the Thames; conquered and came off victorious, covered with wounds. "He is the hero of the Thames."

His deeds of daring, bravery, and patriotism, are recorded in the hearts of an affectionate people; the song of praise and a nation's gratitude are his. His claims present themselves not on monuments, or slabs of marble, nor need you turn to history's page for them—they live in the bosom of freemen—they animate the grateful hearts of freemen, and dwell in delight upon the lips of those who love to praise their country. He comes not enveloped in a cloud of shinplaster certificates to prove he has fought his country's battles. No, sir; the hacked weapons of our country's foe, the bones of the enemy that bleach on the plains of the Thames, a limping gait, and a body covered with deep wounds and scars received in deadly conflict, hardly yet cicatrized, are his certificates. The manly and noble indignation of a proud people would be the reward, and rest upon him who would attempt to establish Colonel Johnson's services in the field or the cabinet by paper certificates—such a one would be spurned from his presence, scouted from society, and held in contempt. I say the scars that cover his body are his certificates. His certificates will go down to the grave with him; but they will live in memory while an American heart beats in love for its country, and until the tongue that praises is struck dumb.

Will you (the Federalists) cast your suffrages for Colonel Johnson for the second office in your gift? No, you will not. The epitaph of "poor John Woods" will cover every ticket that Colonel Johnson will receive from the tapered fingered Federal Bank Abolition Whigs at the next Presidential election.

There have been times when the reckless ambition of party gave way to the full sway of merited gratitude, when all were prepared to award to merit her due. At the fierce and bloody battle of Ithoma, between the Massineans and the Lacademonians, two individuals who had distinguished themselves most in the battle on the side of the Massineans, after the close of the battle, were competitors for the prize of glory and honor. They were Aristomenes and Cleonis. The former had slain a great many of the enemy, and distinguished himself in a most signal manner; but came out of the fight without wounds or the loss of blood. Cleonis had distinguished himself equally with his competitor, and slain an equal number of the enemy; but was so covered with wounds, and such was his loss of blood, that he had to be carried from the field. Each argued his case before the court military in presence of the whole army. Cleonis founded his claims upon the great number of the enemy he had slain, and the number of wounds with which he was covered, were so many certificates of his bravery. Aristomenes contended that he had displayed as much courage, and slain as many of the enemy as his competitor, and had borne him on his shoulders in his helpless condition from the field, and he was sorry to find that Cleonis should want gratitude. Cleonis replied, that if Aristomenes had endangered his person as much as he had, he was very fortunate in escaping unhurt; and that his carrying him off the field only showed his strength of body, not his courage. Aristomenes rejoined, that the fact of his having the skill and power to ward off the blows of his adversaries was to his credit, rather than to his disadvantage, and ought to be so considered. If it was by cowardice (and that no one would charge upon him) he saved himself from wounds, he ought, indeed, to be on his trial for punishment and infamy.

The friends of General Harrison and the friends of Colonel Johnson have placed them before the American people, and contended on their behalf, for each, the award of glory and honor gained in the battle of the Thames. Colonel Johnson commanded, fought, slew the enemy, conquered, and was borne off the field, covered with wounds, and sinking from the loss of blood. General Harrison did not command, did not fight, and left the field without wounds, or loss of blood. To which will you award the honor, Cleonis or Aristomenes?

No, sir: Colonel Johnson will receive no Federal votes, not even for the second office in your gift, while General Harrison will receive every Federal vote in the Union for the first office.

It is not military fame nor civil services that you are trying to reward; your great object is to overthrow a Democratic Administration, and establish a Federal Administration. You are emphatically the Federal party. I care not what name you periodically assume to yourselves. You are the same party who endeavored to strip the States of all sovereignty and independence, and establish a central and consolidated Federal Government, at the commencement of our political Union. You are the same party that passed and maintained the odious and disgraceful alien and sedition laws. You are the same party who, from the commencement of the Government to this day, have been exerting yourselves to the extent of your powers and abilities to fix upon this nation and this people a great central moneyed power in the character of a National Bank, the tendency and nature of which is to establish two distinct orders of society, and make the one hewers of wood and drawers of water to the other. You are the same party, with some individual exceptions, who were opposed to the last war with Great Britain, and will be to the next. You are the same party who were arrayed against the election and administration of Thomas Jefferson, and to every other Democratic Administration from that time to this. You are the same party who have ever held in contempt the free exercise of the elective franchise, and sneer at the right of instruction, and have more than once violated both. Caricature, slander, and falsehood, were the means by which you electioneered against Thomas Jefferson; and they are the means by which you electioneer now, and have from that time to this.

Thomas Jefferson was denounced as an atheist, and many of the good and unsuspecting people were taught to believe that if he should be elected President of the United States, all the public houses dedicated to the worship of God would be turned into houses of infamy and debauchery. That the land would be overspread with French infidelity, and all the Bibles would be burnt; and so strong were these impressions enforced, that many of the pious matrons, on hearing of the election of Thomas Jefferson, hid their Bibles in hollow trees, in the woods. Caricature! Yes, sir, I hold in my hand a caricature, entitled, "Modern Philanthropy, or The Age of Reason," and "dedicated respectfully to Tom Jefferson, Tom Paine, the devil and Black Sall."

In this caricature, you see Thomas Jefferson is represented in the act of cowhiding an old lady, with a grasp by the throat so tight, that her eye balls are started from their sockets, her tongue lolled out, and she upon her knees, with her arms stretched out in an imploring attitude; her Bible is under his foot.

Tom Paine is represented as having one hand on Jeffersen's shoulder, and the other stretched out, with his Age of Reason in it. Black Sall stands on the right, and the Salt mountain is seen at a distance through the window. Yes, sir, one of the Federal modes of electioneering at that day, was by degrading caricatures, ever considered, since the dawn of civilization, the basest and meanest mode of libelling. So, too, it was the Federal mode of electioneering in 1824, and 1828. I hold in my hand one of John Binns's coffin handbills, on which, you see, is represented eighteen coffins, said on the bill to correspond with the number of innocent and unoffending persons that General Jackson murdered, either himself, or caused to be shot. Also, a short biographical sketch of the life and death of those unfortunate victims of General Jackson's barbarity, each concluding with a verse or two of solemn poetry, set to the tune of Old Hundred. Here, also, is the tomb of "Poor John Woods," with his epitaph written. This was one of the Federal modes of electioneering in 1824 and 1828; and it is one of the Federal modes now of electioneering. I hold in my hand a caricature, which represents Mr. Van Buren by the body of a reptile, with the head of a man, winding his way up a steep rock, and General Jackson by the body of a tortoise and the head of a man, descending from the top of the same rock, with the inscription underneath—

"High places in Government, like steep rocks, only accessible to eagles and reptiles."

Yes, sir, caricature is one of the modes of electioneering now.

The Federal party now are the same party called the Federalists in 1798—their principles are the same, and their base and slanderous mode of electioneering is the same. Tens of thousands and hundreds of thousands of these vile panders of falsehood and slander have been franked by Whig members, and sent from this Capitol by mail, at the public expense, and distributed all over the Union to advance the cause of the "log cabin candidate" for the Presidency. How often have the people rebuked such base conduct—such degrading attempts at insult upon their understanding! When will these Whigs learn wisdom; when will they learn to appreciate the intelligence of the people?

General Harrison has been presented as the available candidate by the Whigs. What makes him available? Is it because he is a military man? If it is intended he shall be available by the Democracy, he wants another requisite. He must be a Democrat. General Jackson was elected President, not merely because he was a military man, not merely because he had rendered transcendent military services to his country in her darkest hour and greatest peril, but because he was a Democrat, and had always been identified with the Democratic party. General Harrison refuses to inform us what his political principles are at this time, and what his views are in relation to the great questions that interest this country at this time, and his political conscience keepers refuse to answer for him. We must, therefore, be governed in this matter by circumstances. John Randolph called Gen. Harrison a Federalist to his face in Congress, and said that he (Harrison) was a friend to the Federal black cockade administration of old John Adams. General Harrison did not deny the former, and he virtually admitted the latter. To my knowlege, and to the knowledge of all who have known him as I have, General Harrison has been acting with the Federal party for twenty years, and sustaining all their measures, principles, and policy. I know him to have been in favor of the recharter of the Bank of the United States. I know him to have been opposed to the removal of the deposites of the public money from the Bank of the United States and the branches thereof. He is opposed to a separation of the Government from the rotten, tottering, and swindling banking institutions of this day; consequently, he is opposed to the establishment of an independent, constitutional, and national Treasury. Like the party to which he belongs, and whose candidate he is, he is in favor of a high protective tariff, shinplaster currency, a national debt, surplus revenue, and splended schemes of internal improvement, and consequently impost taxes. In short, he is in favor of the Hamiltonian system of policy; a system by which two hundred millions of the British debt have been saddled upon this country and this people, and under which the commercial community are now groaning; a splendid Government, an aristocratic order, and a poor people, will be the offspring of such a policy.

Are we to be told that the present State debts, which have produced the scarcity of money and the depressed price of produce which now exist, grew out of the policy of this or the last National Administration? These Administrations have had about as much to do with the State debts, and the State improvements which have created the debts, as the Government of Spain.

Are we to be told that the system of credit and the use of paper money, which are the parents of all the embarrassments, pecuniary and commercial, had their origin with this or the last Administration? Why, sir, it has been a cardinal maxim, and a fundamental principle with this and the last Administration, to establish a sound, uniform, and constitutional currency, by which that very policy, so pernicious to, and destructive of, our best interests, would be put down. I mean the banking paper and credit system, which is the source and fountain of all our difficulties and embarrassments, and a system which had its origin with the financial administration of Alexander Hamilton, and the introduction of his National Bank and credit policy. The struggle now between the two great contending parties, is whether the Hamiltonian Bank credit and paper currency system shall be revived, confirmed, and fastened upon this country, with all the train of evils which have, and will again, follow such a system, such as a national debt, heavy impost taxes, an unsound currency, bank suspensions, bank failures, and bank blow-ups, paper contractions and paper expansions, high prices to-day and low prices to-morrow, &c. or shall we establish a sound and uniform currency, the currency contemplated by the patriots of the Revolution and the framers of the Constitution, and a currency, too, that will enforce regularity in trade, foreign and domestic, and uniformity in the prices of every article of barter and barter? Shall we limit our revenue to the wants of the Government, and keep our public improvements and expenditures within our means, and within the constitutional powers of Congress? In short, is it not better that we should have a limited Government, with free institutions—a poor Government, and a rich people?

The question now is, General Harrison, a National Bank, a splendid Government, poor people, a shinplaster currency, and a privileged order, against Martin Van Buren, a sound currency, an Independent Treasury, (independent of the banks,) rigid economy, a poor Government, a rich people, and equal rights. Which side do you take, sir? and as I cannot answer that question, I will tell you which side I take; I go for Kinderhook, and the Independent Treasury; I go with the hard handed industry; I go with those who depend upon their own resources for their living; the farmer and the mechanic, all of which constitute the Democracy of this country and of every other. Yes, sir, I go with them against Gen. Harrison, a National Bank, and the modern Whig party, who are made up of

Coxcombs and dandies, and loafers and nibblers;
Shavers and blacklegs, and peddlers and scribblers:
Bankers and brokers, and cunning buffoons;
Thieves that steal millions, and thieves that steal spoons;
Rascals in ruffles, and rascals in rags;
Beggars in coaches, and beggars on nags;
Quackers and doctors, with scalpels and squills;
Pettifogers and lawyers, with green bags and bills;
Shylocks unfeeling, and dealers in stocks;
Some dashing fine ladies! in splendid silk frocks.
Such is the crew that for Harrison bellows,
Always excepting some very fine fellows.

Do you desire to know the feelings of the Western people in relation to Harrison, Jackson, Johnson, and their relative services? I can tell you. If a Western man is asked his opinion of General Harrison, his answer will be, nineteen times out of twenty, that General Harrison is a very good man, and was a tolerable General. He has done his country some service, and that perhaps he discharged his official duties in the last war, about as well as could be expected, all circumstances considered. This, sir, I repeat, will be the general answer. In some instances a higher opinion will be expressed—in some instances a lower one. My colleagues on this floor, Whigs and Democrats, will bear me out in what I say; but when you hear Jackson and Johnson named, they are named in praise and song, in affection and pride. Yes, sir, in praise and song. Were you ever at a corn shucking in the West? If you were, you never left it without hearing the wool hat and linsey hunting-shirt boys sing—

Mary Rogers are a ease,
And so are Sally Thompson,
General Jackson are a horse,
And so are Colonel Johnson.

I see, sir, in some of the Western Whig papers, the name "Harrison Democrats" This is a new name under the sun. Well, sir, as the world grows older names will increase. New names will run pari passu with the world's age and with the cunning and trickery of Federalism. "Harrison Democrats" in the West are like the Frenchman's flea: when you attempt to put you finger on them they are not there. "Harrison Democrats" may be put in the list with mermaids, sea serpents, and unicorns. They are names in fancy, fiction, and poetry. Sir, if you can catch a "Harrison Democrat," take him to Ohio and exhibit him. I would advise you also to accompany the exhibition with a Whig buffoon that can jump "Jim Crow" to the music of the psalter, tambarine, and the sackbut. You will clear more hard cash in one day than you will by playing Congressman a month.

In conclusion, let me say, the Democracy understand and appreciate their principles. They have stood by them in prosperity and adversity, through bank panics and Federal frauds, through good and through evil report. They are not now to be driven from their position by the stale cry of "panic!" "panic!" or drawn from their principles by the empty show and buffoon diplay of log cabins, hard cider, and shinplaster-certificate-military-renown. Principle is the watchword with the Democracy, and principle they will maintain. The Democracy of this country hug to their bosoms, and cherish in their hearts their principles as they revere the sacred memories of their ancestors, who secured them with their treasure, their blood, and their lives; they will as soon be guilty of the base ingratitude of forgetting the one, as to desert the other, either by threats, flattery, or bribery.

PUBLIC EXPENDITURES.

DEBATE IN THE SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 7, 1840,

On a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in reply to a resolution offered by Mr. BENTON, giving a summary of the items and aggregate expenditures of the Government from 1824, included, up to 1839.

After some remarks by Messrs. BENTON, and PRESTON,

Mr. BROWN said, that he was not aware that the printing of the important report which had been communicated to the Senate by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the public expenditure, would come up for consideration, until he had taken his seat this morning. When, however, he had heard the Administration and its friends denounced as guilty of extravagance in the expenditure of the public money, by gentlemen in opposition; when he recollected the course which had been pursued by himself and most of his political friends, in regard to appropriations; and when he remembered what had been that of the Opposition on the same subject, for years past, in the two Houses of Congress, he could not refrain from expressing the surprise, as well as deep indignation, which he felt. He had occupied a seat in that body for more than ten years, and he could say, without the fear of contradiction, that the Opposition, as a body, in the two Houses of Congress, had aided more, by their votes, to increase the public expenditures, then the friends of the Administration.

When he had first become a member of the Senate, he had found the friends of the administration of President Jackson anxious to discharge the national debt, which, at the close of the administration of Mr. Adams, amounted to about forty millions, and at the same time in favor of reducing the burdens which an oppressive tariff had imposed on the country. On the other hand he had found the opposition to the administration of President Jackson, who at that time were mostly composed of the miscalled America System party, opposed to the immediate discharge of the national debt, and in favor of the continuance of a high tariff. The positions then occupied by the two great parties which divided the country at that time on these important questions of national policy, could leave no doubt on the mind of any one, as to who were, and, who were not in favor of a system of extravagant expenditure. One of the parties desired to postpone the payment of the national debt, and to keep up their favorite system of high duties. The most easy and obvious way to do this, was to make large and wasteful appropriations of the public money. This was the aliment which alone could keep alive the tariff, and render it a permanent system.

Hence it was that every scheme to expend the public money was devised and brought forward by the American System party, at that time, who were mainly in opposition to the administration of President Jackson, in order to save their favorite system from the doom which inevitably awaited it without some such aid.

To arrest these enormous schemes of extravagance, then brought forward by the Federal party, and which disregarded alike the bounds of moderation and the limits of the Constitution, the veto power was repeatedly resorted to by the Executive. For having thus interposed the authority with which he was clothed, to save the Constitution from total overthrow, and the nation from being burdened with an oppressive tariff and a permanent system of extravagant expenditure, some of the very party who are now such lovers of economy in profession, pronounced him an arbitrary tyrant, who deserved to be brought to the block. If their system had prevailed, the large national debt remaining unpaid at the close of the administration of Mr. Adams, would probably continue to exist at this day, and an annual expenditure far larger than the present, would have been permanently fixed on the country.

The extravagant degree to which the pension system had been carried at that time, was a consequence of the same policy, and was carried mainly by the votes of the same party. The bill to pension the militia, which had drawn so many millions from the Treasury, was reported by an opposition Senator; and while candor compelled him to admit that a large portion of the friends of the Administration voted for that measure, yet it was supported still more unanimously by the American System party, whose motives, it was believed, were not exclusively those of patriotic respect and regard for the venerable men of the Revolution, but partook largely of a regard for the tariff, which could be kept up alone by large expenditure. He remembered the very great ability with which this measure had been opposed by the late General Hayne, then a member of that body, to whose great worth and eminent talents, he availed himself, with great pleasure, of that occasion to offer the humble tribute of his sincere admiration.

Besides opposing it upon the ground that it was a departure from the principles on which the system was originally established, and which was intended to apply only to that class of officers and soldiers, who, having abandoned the pursuits of private life, had made arms a profession, and not to the mere citizen soldier, who had been called into the public service for short periods, he considered the extension of the system as favoring a part of that great scheme of permanent public expenditure, which the American System party then meditated and were endeavoring to fix upon the country, as a part of our national policy.

He, Mr. B. had deemed his duty to vote against this measure, which, in addition to the pension system before in operation, had, the very first year that it went into effect, taken from the public Treasury near four millions and a half of dollars. He had opposed, together with a majority of his political friends in the two Houses of Congress, that other important branch of the American system, appropriations for harbors and internal improvements, together with the numerous other contrivances, by which that party had uniformly endeavored to increase the public expenditures. He admitted that a portion of his political friends were not free from censure in this respect, who by occasionally acting with the American System party, had, in some instances, enabled them to carry out their policy.

But what he mainly complained of was, that the very party who had forced a policy upon the country, which, for a series of years, had brought into the Treasury millions of dollars beyond its wants, and thus rendered its expenditure, in some way or other, either in the shape of appropriations or of deposites with the States, a matter of absolute necessity—for it could not remain idle in the public Treasury—that they, the very party who had forced this policy on the country, and who were, on every fair principle, to be considered as the authors of the mischiefs consequent on it, were now, in order to answer political purposes, endeavoring to hold others responsible for that which they themselves were truly answerable to the country. Again, what he complained of was the disingenuous means resorted to by those now endeavoring to break down the present Administration; and who, scrupling at nothing to effect their object, endeavored to hold others accountable for that very extravagance, which the journals of the two Houses of Congress would incontrovertibly show had been mainly brought about by their own votes, from the commencement of President Jackson's administration down to the present period.

The small number of the journals of the two Houses of Congress which were annually printed, and the consequent difficulty that the great body of the people had to encounter in arriving at the truth in regard to the votes of the respective political parties in Congress, had furnished a great facility to the Opposition, to practise the impositions on this subject, and to pass off those flagrant misrepresentations on the people, which had been so extensively resorted to in the present contest between parties. A reference, however, to the distinctive principles which had for years past so clearly marked the two parties in this country, would shed a volume of light on this subject, and would not fail to inform the people who have been, and who now are, the friends of extravagant expenditure.

The great mass of the Opposition party, with the exception of some of their Southern allies, have been, and continue to be, friends of a high tariff, and an unlimited construction of the Constitution, embracing the power to make all kinds of extravagant and unauthorized appropriations. These doctrines plainly indicate the motives operating on those who possess them, to favor a large system of expenditure, and can leave no doubt, even if other evidence were absent, as to the party whose policy, whose interests, and whose votes, have all combined to swell the public expenditures. In this way it was hoped to keep up the former tariff, and in this way it is hoped to create the necessity for a new one.

On the other hand, (said Mr. B.) the great mass of the friends of the past and present Administrations have been, and continue to be, opposed to a system of high duties, and are in favor of a limited construction of the Constitution of the United States. Here, then, are unerring tests by which to try the two political parties, in regard to the question of extravagance—tests, even if recorded evidence could not be adduced, that distinctly point out to the people of the United States the real enemies of an economical administration of the Government, and those who are friendly to such an administration of the public finances.

But, fortunately for the cause of truth and of justice, if the journals of Congress could not be circulated every where to put down these gross misrepresentations, which were persevered in with so much industry, and in a manner which utterly set at naught all moral restraints, they were to be found here, and furnished the most conclusive condemnation of those who were most clamorous in charging the friends of the Administration with extravagance.

Mr. B. distinctly charged that the Opposition, as a body, in both Houses of Congress, had not only voted for all the large appropriation bills—such as those for the support of the civil, military, and naval service of the country; but he charged further, that they had voted for many other bills proposing extravagant expenditures, some of which had been carried through the two Houses, and others of which had been checked by Democratic votes. He would instance, among those which had become laws, that for the relief of the cities of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandria, passed at the session of 1834–35, appropriating near a million of dollars, and which received a much larger proportion of Opposition than of Administration votes in that body. Among those which had been voted for by the Opposition generally in the Senate, and with but few exceptions, while on the other hand it was voted against by a large majority of the friends of the Administration, was the bill proposing to appropiate five millions of dollars for the benefit of claimants on account of French spoliations prior to 1800. This claim had for years been before Congress, and repeatedly rejected, on the ground of its alleged injustice, and yet it received the sanction of an Opposition Senate, and would have become a law if it had not been defeated by a House of Representatives friendly to the Administration.

Mr. B. said that he had adverted to these two specimens of economy, as practised by the Opposition, not because there were none others—for the journals of Congress abounded with proofs of the same kind, against them, in regard to the public expenditures—but he had referred to them as conspicuous commentaries on their conduct, and to show how far they were entitled to set up an exclusive title to guardianship over the public treasure.

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. PRESTON] had said that the Administration should be held responsible for the public expenditures, because they had been, for many years, in a majority in the two Houses of Congress. He differed very far from that Senator on that subject. He had seldom, if at all, seen the time, from the commencement of the administration of President Jackson to the present time, when its friends were in a majority in both Houses—he meant friends who were to be relied on, not professed friends. The votes of the two Houses of Congress on the veto messages against internal improvement bills, and the vote of the two Houses of Congress, several sessions afterwards, on the veto message against rechartering the Bank of the United States, showed that a majority was against the administration of President Jackson, at least on those important questions, though that majority was not large enough to carry those measures, in opposition to the Executive negative. The Senate had afterwards given practical evidence that it did not contain a majority of his political friends, by the vote of censure which it had passed against him. He would add that, during the two or three years in which the Opposition had the political power in that body, the contingent expenses were greatly increased beyond those of any former year. In the other branch of Congress, the present Administration had been in a minority on the great financial question of separating the Government from the banks, from the time that measure had been proposed until the present session.

With what justice, then, said Mr. B. could it be said that the present and past Administrations should be held responsible for the increase of the public expenditure, in the face of the fact that a majority of one or the other of the two Houses of Congress have generally been against them—in the face of the fact that, for years past, the appropriations by Congress have exceeded, by many millions, the sums asked for by the Administration—and with the other and still more important fact within their knowledge, that the Opposition vote has generally been given to swell expenditure, instead of being given to check it. When he spoke of the Opposition, he meant to be understood as speaking of them as a body, and not as intending to include every single individual of which that party was composed.

The Senator from South Carolina had, said Mr. B. objected to the printing of the extra number of copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, explanatory of the public expenditures, and of the items which constituted them.

[Mr. PRESTON here rose to explain, and said he had not opposed the printing of the report.]

Mr. BROWN resumed, and said that he did not know whether the gentleman intended to vote against the printing of the report or not, but his whole argument was of that character. He had charged that it was extravagance to order the number of copies for the public which had been moved. He had charged that it was an ex parte document—objections which, if true, were certainly such as went to deny the propriety of printing it. The document contained a plain and simple statement of the public expenditures, and the objects for which they were made, from the year 1824 to that of 1839, inclusive.

It was a document furnished on the call of the Senate, and its accuracy was vouched for, by the high official character of the Secretary, who had sent it to us in obedience to our requirement. Are gentlemen on the opposite side afraid for the people to have light on this subject? Are they apprehensive that it will counteract the dishonest and fraudulent misrepresentations, which have been spread far and wide, and in every direction, through the country, in regard to the public expenditure? Was there an Opposition member of either House of Congress, who, when he rose in his place and asserted that the expenditures for the year 1837 had amounted to the sum of thirty-nine millions, did not know that he was making a gross misrepresentation to go forth to the country? Was it not known, at the same time, by those who uttered those declarations, that indemnities which had been secured by treaty, from foreign Governments, for the benefit of our merchants, and which formed no part of the public funds, but belonged to private claimants, amounting to considerably more than four millions of dollars, made part of that sum? Could they be ignorant that funds amounting to largely more than a million of dollars, held in trust by the Government for certain Indian tribes, and which had been invested for their benefit, by authority of law, formed also a part of that thirty-nine millions charged by them against the Administration, as expenditure? And again: were those who made these declarations, and charges of extravagance, ignorant that the aggregate amount of expenditure for that year, for permanent and ordinary purposes, excluding payments on account of objects either extraordinary or temporary, amounted to but little more than thirteen millions, agreeably to the official report then before them? He had selected this year, because it had been especially singled out by the Opposition as one of the highest appropriations. Much of that amount, however, constituted no expenditure in reality, as a large amount of the money paid out that year, as he had already shown, formed no part of the public funds, and a larger portion of the residue consisted of appropriations for extraordinary and temporary objects—such as the removal of Indians and the suppression of Indian hostilities—that would make no part of the permanent expenses of the Government hereafter.

Mr. B. said he had therefore heard, with utter amazement, the declaration which, at different times, had been made in the two Houses of Congress, and which had been so eagerly propagated by every bank-bought press in the country, that the expenditures of the Government had, for the year to which he alluded, been run up to the sum of thirty-nine millions. Gentlemen might differ with each other in regard to public measures, and every charitable allowance should be made for such differences of opinion; but in regard to facts, plainly and easily ascertainable, no such indulgent consideration should be extended.

He held that it was a violation of the principles of moral honesty in those who, with a full knowledge of these misrepresentations, gave them sanction and countenance. If it were done without such knowledge, then it betrayed great ignorance of public duty. Nor was this the only aggravating circumstance of the case. The very party who were, in a great degree, the perpetrators of the mischief, and who were themselves the greatest offenders against the principles of economy, were now loudest in raising the charge against the Administration, for that very extravagance which their own votes had so materially aided in bringing about. It was, however, perfectly characteristic of the political morality of the Federal party of the present day. Determined to attain power, if possible, it neither scruples at the means, nor hesitates to employ any plan which promises success to its partisans. The moral sense of the country, and the principles of liberty which yet exist in it, cannot fail to measure out the proper degree of reprobation for the outrage thus offered to the former, and the dangerous assault made upon the latter.

The Opposition had, in some quarters, even set down the sum appropriated for the Post Office Department, as expenditure, which had, for several years past, amounted to near five millions. The revenue arising from that Department having been directed, by a late law, to be paid into the public Treasury, it consequently required an appropriation before it could be returned to it again. Thus, it would be seen, that simply because a late law had directed the funds of that Department to pass through the public Treasury, which was not formerly the case, it was made another ground on which the Opposition were to build up the charge of extravagance.

The Senator from South Carolina had, in the review of the condition of the country with which he had favored the Senate, asked, with much emphasis, whether the Indian relations of our country were in any better condition than they were before President Jackson came into office. The great success which had attended the policy of that Administration with respect to that subject, and the immense benefits which had resulted to the country from it, furnished the best answer to this question, and afforded the most triumphant vindication of the system which had been adopted. The administration of President Adams had offered the State of Georgia the bayonets of a regular soldiery, and threatened her with the calamities of a civil war, because she dared assert her rights of sovereignty over the Indian tribes within her limits. In exchange for these, said Mr. B. the administration of President Jackson, the policy of which had been carried out successfully by the present Executive, had secured her rights, had given her peace and tranquillity on this embarrassing question, and had removed beyond her borders the powerful Indian tribes that had inhabited so large a portion of her territory. In the benefits of this policy, North Carolina, Tennessee, and Alabama, had also participated. Many other States of this Confederacy had likewise experienced the beneficial effects of this policy, by the removal of savage tribes beyond their limits. The past Administration and the present had accomplished more in relieving the States from that kind of population, than all others together, which had preceded them. It had not been money thrown away, but money well laid out.

Besides the great benefits resulting to the States themselves, the Government of the United States, on a mere question of pecuniary calculation, would be found to be gainer, by many millions, from the immense bodies of valuable lands which it had in that way acquired, and the sales of which would go to enrich the public Treasury.

But when gentlemen, said Mr. B. thought proper to make a serious charge against the Administration on account of the money expended in removing Indians, and in defending the country against Indian hostilities—expenditures for which the votes of their own party would be found recorded in the journals of the two Houses of Congress—he could not refrain from expressing the opinion, long and deliberately entertained by him, that their own party had much to answer to the country for, on this subject. He declared in his place his most solemn conviction that the course which had been taken by a part of the Opposition, from the commencement of the administration of President Jackson, and which had been for years after persevered in, with respect to the Indian tribes, had been the cause of the Government having to pay nearly double what it otherwise would have paid for the treaties which had been concluded with them. A portion of the Opposition had appeared to consider the Indian tribes under their especial guardianship. The Indians were told by missionaries who went among them, and who were opposed to the policy of their removal, that the Government was endeavoring to impose upon them, and defraud them of their possessions, without adequate compensation. The same language was held in the two Houses of Congress by members standing high in the ranks of the Opposition. This had been their course more particularly in regard to the Cherokee Indians, whose chiefs had been treated at the seat of Government, by some of them, almost with the consideration of foreign ministers, and who were taught to believe, from the same source, that they had a right to establish an independent Government in the very bosoms of those States which they inhabited. That this course of the Opposition had led those chiefs to make the most exorbitant demands on the Government, he had not the least doubt. The consequence was, that their demands had to be complied with, or the most fatal and disastrous results would have followed the further continuance of that tribe in the State of Georgia.

When, therefore, gentlemen dwell so much on this class of expenditures, (said Mr. B.) let them remember the language and course of their own partisans, in Congress and elsewhere, on the policy pursued by the present and past Administrations in regard to the Indian tribes. Was it then at all a matter of surprise, that consequences, such as he had described, should have resulted from the interference of political missionaries with these tribes, and from the denunciations constantly uttered here against Indian treaties, as founded in fraud and injustice? Nay, more: was it a matter of surprise that, instigated by such influences, the tomahawk and scalping knife of the Seminole had gleamed in Florida, and yet continued to devastate her fair fields?

The Senator, in his zeal to denounce the Administration, had reminded us of what he had chosen to designate the bankruptcy of the Government at the called session of 1837, and of its inability to meet the public engagements. And why was it bankrupt, if the gentleman prefers that term? It was because of the suspension of specie payments by the banks, the political allies of the Senator and his friends, who were entrusted with the public funds, and the seizure by them of more than twenty millions of the public revenue. By having thus withheld the public revenue from the Government, when its necessities required it, the banks had not only violated the most sacred obligations, which they undertook to perform, but they had committed an act of moral treason against the people of the United States, which threatened to arrest the action of the Government at the time, and might, at a more critical period of public affairs, have brought irreparable injury on the country.

These corporations, continued Mr. B. scattered throughout our wide extended country, are now acting with the Senator and his party, and are co-operating with them to overthrow the present Democratic Administration, in order to substitute one in its stead more congenial to their notions of privilege and of power. While gentlemen rose in their places here, and proclaimed that the Administration had, by its measures, brought the present pecuniary distress on the country, and which charge was reiterated by every bank-bought press throughout the land, the banking corporations—their great political allies in this contest—were applying the screw to the people to aid in making the charge the more effectual. No, sir, it is not the Administration that has produced a decline of prices and pecuniary distress, but it is the secret and invisible, but powerful, hand of the moneyed and banking power, that has inflicted the blow, and which has made itself to be felt throughout our entire country. It is now in the precess of carrying out that oft repeated maxim, in the political creed of the Federal party, and which is so revolting to the principles of freemen—that the people must be made to feel, before they can be brought to their senses. In other words, that the spirit of freedom must be conquered before the people can be made to submit to the despotism of banking corporations, that now aspire to govern them and the country.

The pecuniary distress of the country was easily accounted for, and could, with no reason or justice, be imputed to the measures of the Administration, however it might suit the purposes of political partisans to ascribe it to that cause. Ever since banks had been established in this country, an expansion of paper had always produced an apparent prosperity, and a rise in prices, while a contraction had uniformly caused the very opposite effects. This had been the history of those corportations under all Administrations, and was undoubtedly the true cause of the present pecuniary difficulties.

The warfare (said Mr. B) which had been waged unrelentingly against the people of this country by the moneyed power and banking corporations, under the command of Federal politicians, had commenced near eight years ago: since which time they had endeavored to harass the country in every possible way, as he believed, to accomplish its subjugation to their purposes of governing it. The time which this warfare had been carried on against the country and its republican institutions, very nearly corresponded with that which a foreign monarch employed in the attempt to conquer and enslave it. He trusted that the same noble spirit of resistance that had defended and saved the country then from the tyranny of a foreign power, would again save it from the merciless grasp of a moneyed despotism. The struggle was a most important one to the country, and would be decisive of its political fate, for years to come, if not forever.

It had been predicted, (remarked Mr. B.) more than two years since, by a distinguished individual of that body, as well as by others, that a second bank suspension would take place just in time to do good service in behalf of their political allies, that they might profit by it in the Presidential election. This prediction had been realized, and all the mighty influences which the pressure and pecuniary distress, consequent on such a state of things, produced, were now to be employed to defeat the Democratic party. He would exhort them, in the name of the Constitution, to stand firm. He would exhort them, as they valued the liberty and independence of their country, once more to rally in this last great and decisive conflict between parties, and overthrow this formidable coalition that now contended for mastery over the country. One more defeat, and their banking allies would cease to harass the country for political purposes. The coalition of politicians, which had acted with them, would be disbanded, and the principles of free Government would be more firmly re-established.

The great question to be decided, in the present conflict between parties, was one, in his estimation, far transcending, in importance, mere questions of temporary policy; it was a question that, in his opinion, went to the very form and principles of our Government; it was a question, whether the people should continue to rule themselves, or were to be ruled by banking corporations. It had often been exultingly proclaimed, in this chamber, during the present session; and again had been distinctly intimated in the course of the present debate, that a change in the Administration of the Government was near at hand, which was to be followed by all the blessings, so unsparingly and delusively promised by those who sought to attain power. And what were the blessings, he could ask, that this change, now anticipated with so much joy, was likely to confer on the country? What benefit could the people hope for, by the coming into power of an Administration, formed by a coalition of Bank, Abolition, and high tariff parties? These were political elements, destructive to the peace and happiness of the country, the liberties of the people and the union of the States.

It formed a subject for the most momentous consideration of the people in every part of the country, but more particularly for those of the Southern portion of this Confederacy.

Mr. B. pronounced it as his deliberate opinion, that the success of the Federal party, under existing circumstances, would be practically a revolution in our Republican form of Government. With the mighty energies and influence of near eight hundred banks, penetrating every part of our country, added to the patronage of the Government of the United States, their power would be irresistible, and their authority would be permanently established over the country. The great right of suffrage, by this mighty influence, brought to bear on it, would be overwhelmed, and rendered utterly unavailing to check their tyranny, and to expel them from power. The Democratic principle would be struck down, and would not probably for a half century, if ever again, recover control of the Government. These were subjects addressing themselves to the most solemn considerations of those in our country, who wished to preserve our Republican institutions.

The most extraordinary means were resorted to, at this time, for the purpose of effecting this change. The miserable pageantries which the Federal party had attempted to play off, in every part of the country, for the purpose of operating on and deluding the people, were an insult and a contempt to American freemen, and a virtual denial of their intelligence and capability for self government. They were appeals, not made to their reason and patriotism, but to the most degraded prejudices. They were of the same character, and designed to have the same effect, with the public games and exhibitions, given by artful demagogues, who intended to enslave the people, in the most degenerate days of the Roman Republic. They were means better suited to be used by the privileged orders of Europe, to amuse and keep in subjection their serfs, than to convince the understandings of high-minded and intelligent freemen. He appreciated too highly both the virtue and intelligence of the American people, to believe for a moment that they could be deluded and imposed on by such miserable attempts at deception and imposition.

Mr. B. said that he had spoken freely and plainly on the present occasion. The crisis demanded that no one, who wished to perpetuate the liberties of his country, should shrink from the performance of his duty. Actuated by these sentiments, he had been induced to make the remarks which he had, on that occasion, felt himself called on to submit to the Senate.

Mr. SOUTHARD insisted on the impropriety of printing 30,000 copies of a document, the truth and importance of which was known but to one Senator. He also argued to show that the Opposition were not responsible for the extravagant expenditures of the Government.

Mr. HUBBARD said that he rejoiced that this debate had arisen. The time, the occasion, and all the attendant circumstances, gave to the discussion a peculiar interest. There were in attendance, within the reach of his voice, many of his own constituents, the friends and the foes of the Administration. The Senate could not fail to be reminded, by the unprecedented number of the freemen now occupying the galleries of this Senate chamber, that there could be no more appropriate time than the present to discuss the great subject of public expenditure; to compare the expenditures of this, with the expenditures of former Administrations; to show forth, in the hearing of our constituency, whether this Administration had, by its extravagance and profligacy, forfeited the confidence of the American people, or whether its course of conduct had been marked by that regard to the public interest, by that strict and vigilant adherence to public economy, and by that untiring effort to maintain unimpaired the principles of the Federal Constitution, so as to merit and command the support of this Confederacy. He rejoiced that this subject was before the Senate, and that it was likely to be fully discussed. He would not shrink from the most full and ample investigation; and from what had recently taken place—from what had of late been sent forth, by the semblance of authority, setting forth the expenditures of this Administration, and contrasting them with those of former Administrations—it was due to the American people—it was due to the cause of truth and of justice—it was due to those charged with the administration of our public affairs, to set history right—to present to the people incontrovertible facts—to remove from their minds any false impressions which garbled and imperfect exhibits of public expenditures are calculated to make.

There is at this very moment an extraordinary excitement abroad in the land, touching this very subject. It is not confined within the limits of this District, but it has reached his own State; it is running through every section of the country. Not an Opposition journal is to be seen, but what is manifestly laboring to impress the public mind with the extravagance and profligacy of this Administration in its expenditures. Within a few weeks, if rumor can be relied upon, a neighboring Commonwealth has literally been flooded with a document, tending to show the aggregate expenditures of this Administration. It probably has produced its designed effect there. It was a subject upon which the people were peculiarly and properly most sensitive. The expenditure of the public money was a matter connected too intimately with their interest, not to excite their attention, and to awaken their vigilance. Aware, as he was, of what had taken place, he rejoiced when his friend from Missouri offered the resolution, calling upon the Treasury Department for information of the aggregate expenses of the Government from 1824 to 1839, inclusive. He knew not that such a resolution was to have been presented. He had not exchanged a word with that Senator in relation to the matter. He had offered it, undoubtedly, to elicit the truth, for the purpose of counteracting the statements having the sanction of an "Executive Committee," which was circulating through the country. He had read the resolution after it was offered, and he could not but congratulate himself and his friends that it had been presented. The answer was reported to the Senate this morning, and, in the temporary absence of the Senator from Missouri, he had moved to have it printed. He knew not the contents of the report, but he doubted not that it was a true answer to the resolution, as offered; and if so, it was of the utmost importance to have it printed. His motion was agreed to.

The Senator who offered the resolution had been favored, it seems, with an opportunity of inspecting that report; and he had just given to the Senate a full exposition of the contents of the report itself; and it had seemed to him, who had listened with fixed attention to the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, that if there was, or ever could be, an occasion for printing an extra number of any document, this was that occasion, and this was that document. He had therefore suggested the number of thirty thousand, as the number of this document that ought to be printed. It was on his suggestion, that the motion now pending was made. He would, if he could, place this document in the hands of every freeman of the Confederacy. The bane had been sent into every "log cabin" of the country. He would circulate the antidote as extensively. This was due to the Administration and to the country. It was just that description of document which the people would read—would careful examine and well understand. It treated upon a subject closely allied with the exactions of their Government. A tax paying community have a right to claim from their public servants a full expose of the public appropriations. They have a right to know how their money is expended. They have a right to see whether those charged with the execution of the laws are faithful, prudent, and economical in the expenditure of their contributions. This is one of the most effectual modes which can be adopted by the public servant to give up to his master a full account of his public stewardship. He could not expect to have a greater number of this document, than that named, printed by order of the Senate; he hoped not to have a less number. It was, he admitted, the largest extra number usually called for; but the document itself, and the time and circumstances, demanded that number.

He would not add another remark, if the adoption of the motion made by the honorable Senator from Missouri, upon his suggestion, had not met with the most determined opposition. As it was, he should go into a brief examination of the resolution submitted by his friend, and the notice which had been taken of the answer to that resolution. He had not read the report itself, but was familiar with the terms of the resolution. He had never exchanged a word with the Secretary of the Treasury upon the subject of his report. He was, however, much gratified when the resolution was offered to the Senate; and he had no doubt that he should be as much pleased with the answer now given. The information required, was of the utmost importance, and demanded by every consideration of justice.

What was the resolution? What was the nature of the information which the resolution was designed to elicit? This resolution, calling for specific information, had been before the Senate a number of days—it had been printed, and Senators could not but be familiar with its terms. It required, first, the aggregate amount of all expenditures or payments of every kind from the Treasury, from 1824 to 1839 inclusive. Secondly, the aggregate amount, independent of the payments on account of the public debt, whether funded or unfunded. Thirdly, the aggregate amount for permament and ordinary purposes, excluding payments on account of objects either extraordinary or temporary, and goes on to state eighteen or twenty heads, under which he included the extraordinary expenditures of the Government. The resolution was explicit, and was drawn up with great particularity. The resolution required that the information should be arranged under distinct columns. The Register of the Treasury, upon whom the duty necessarily devolved, had prepared the answer, and the Secretary of the Treasury had this morning communicated that answer to the Senate—and the honorable Senator from Missouri had now given a detailed statement of the contents of that answer. But had he not done so, can there be a doubt that this report is a true response to the resolution?—and if so, it is merely but a transcript from the public records of the Government. What occasion, then, to delay the printing until the report shall have been examined? Is this the usual course? When calls are made upon the Departments, are not the answers to those calls ordered to be printed at once for the information of the Senate? Is it the usage of this body to lay such reports upon the table, until they can be examined, before there is an order to print? No sir. Are not these reports necessarily made upon the responsibility of the Departments? Does not the report, now before the Senate, come from one of the Executive Departments? And if perchance the head of that Department has travelled out of the record, and incorporated into this report matters and things foreign from, and uncalled for by the resolution, there will be, in that case, no disposition, in any quarter of the Senate, to screen the Secretary of the Treasury from reprehenston. No, sir, that officer has not such a strong hold upon the affections of those opposed to the Administration, as to expect favor from that quarter. He hazarded nothing in saying that the report of the Secretary of the Treasury would be found to be a full and proper answer to the resolution. He could not well conceive how it could be otherwise. Specific information is required as to the public expenditures. How is that information to be obtained? From the books of the Register's office. There stand recorded the aggregate expenditures of the Government for each year, from its commencement to the present period—there stand recorded the payments which have annually been made on account of the public debt—there stands recorded all the information which the resolution seeks to obtain. There could be no speculations of the Secretary in relation to this matter. His course of duty was plain, and he had no doubt that duty was well understood and performed. He hazarded nothing, then, in saying that the report, on the most minute examination, would be found to be an answer, and nothing less or more than a true answer to the resolution itself. It seemed to him, therefore, to be wholly wrong that the printing of this report should be delayed until Senators could have an opportunity of comparing the copy with the record, in order to see whether the certificate of the Register be true or false.

The Senate had learned, in the course of this discussion, that the aggregate amount of all the expenditures of the Government, or payments of every kind from the Treasury, for the year 1824, had been about thirty-two millions of dollars, and that for the year 1839, they had been over thirty-seven millions of dollars. Here was a difference of over five millions of dollars, which he should find no difficulty in accounting for without imputing to the Administration any extravagance. The Senate had learned that the expenditures for permanent purposes for the year 1824 had a little exceeded seven millions of dollars, and that the expenditures for the same objects in 1839 had a little exceeded thirteen millions of dollars, making a difference of about six millions of dollars in the public expenditures for ordinary and permanent purposes, between the years of 1824 and 1839. This difference the Senator from Missouri had not particularly accounted for; and he could only, from a general recollection of the documents which have from time to time been laid upon our tables, giving an account of the public receipts and of the public expenditures, and also of particular documents communicated to Congress from the Treasury Department, be able now to particularize in what the whole of that difference consisted. He had tables showing the public expenditures for a series of years; and he might add hereafter extracts from those tables. In the first place, the expenses of the navy alone, since 1824, had been increased, by the legislation of Congress, nearly, if not quite, two millions of dollars. The expenses of the army, including the expenses necessary for the support of the Military Academy, had been increased also something like two millions more. These great additional expenditures in the support of the navy, and in the support of the army, were not to be charged to the account of this Administration. They were authorized by law, and they had received the support not only of the friends, but of the opponents of the Administration. He did not propose to look into the journals to see how particular individuals may have voted on particular measures. But he presumed that he should not be contradicted, when he said that every measure tending to swell the expenses of our naval establishment, had received the unqualified support of those now arrayed against the Administration. Here were, then, two-thirds of the whole difference at once accounted for; and is this Administration to be blamed for this increase of expenditure—an increase necessarily connected with the protection of the commerce and general defence of the country—an increase of expenditure demanded by every consideration of patriotism and of justice, and by a proper regard to the public welfare? Again, the legislative expenses between 1824 and 1839 had necessarily increased more than a half of a million of dollars. The expenses of the judiciary had nearly doubled within that time—an increase rendered necessary by the increase of the population and of the business of the country. Our light houses had more than doubled between 1824 and 1839, and the increased permanent expenses on that account, between th first and last of those years, had nearly equalled one hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The public printing; also, payments from the Treasury to compensate custom-house officers, in consequence of the gradual reduction of duties under the tariff of 1833, and on account of the necessary reduction of their fees, have, in a single year, nearly equalled two hundred thousand dollars. These increased expenses and charges upon the Treasury were the effect of the legislation of Congress, and could not with any more propriety be charged to this than to any former Administration. They were provided for and required by existing laws; and the Executive charged with the execution of those laws can in no respect be made culpable for expenditures warranted by such enactments. He would not proceed further in undertaking to show what goes to make up the difference between the expenditures of 1824 and of 1839. If the items to which he has referred were added, it would be found that the aggregate would make all the difference in the expenditures of those years. The resolution, and he presumed the report also, did the same justice to the Administration which preceded that of General Jackson as it did to his, and as it does to the Administration of the present incumbent. The same information was required for the year 1824 as was required for the year 1829—and the same information was asked for the last year of Mr. Adams's as for the last year of Mr. Van Buren's administration. No injustice, then, has been done—no partiality has been shown to either Administration; and he confidently believed that it was not in the power of any Senator to put his finger on a single entry in that report which did not accord with the truth. In order, then, more satisfactorily to show that this Administration was entirely exempt from the charge of wasteful extravagance in the public expenditures—he purposed to make a more minute comparison of the expenditures of the Government, for the years 1824 and 1838. This comparison would be more just, as the long session of Congress took place in each of those years. His object was to confine himself exclusively to the permanent and ordinary expenditures of the Government in those years. The Senator from Missouri had faithfully stated the extraordinary expenditures and the reasons and necessity therefor: he did not intend to refer at all to them.

In 1824, it will be seen, that the aggregate expenditures for ordinary and permanent purposes amounted to the sum of $7,107,892 05.

In 1838 they amounted to $13,837,594 44.

Making a difference against the year 1838, of $6,729,702 39.

He would now endeavor to show some of the items of expenditure which went to make up that difference:

Increase of expenditures in 1838 beyond the expenditures under same heads in 1824.

Legislature,	$685,000
Executive Departments,	383,000
Surveyors and clerks,	42,000

Contingencies of the navy,	242,000
Marine corps,	81,000
	$6,628,000

He hoped that this statement would be carefully examined; if so, there was no friend of truth and justice that would dare to charge upon this Administration extravagance and profligacy, for such items of expenditure so essentially, so closely connected with the public welfare.

The foregoing table had been prepared from a careful comparison of the public expenditures in the years 1824 and 1838, and he had no doubt that it would be found to be substantially correct. It will be seen among the items that the expenses of the Executive Departments had been increased in 1839 over the expenses of 1824, $383,000. Let not the Administration for this be charged with extravagance. The cause of this increase would mainly be found to proceed from the organization of the Land Office—from the necessary increase of expenditure in the Post Office Department, including the establishment, by law, of an Auditor's Office—from the necessary increase of the Indian Department, including the establishment of a Commissioner of Indian Affairs—from the Pension Department, including the establishment of a Commissioner of Pensions, and from the creation of a Solicitor's Department. It will be recollected that in 1832, and in 1836, important changes were made in the pension laws, unavoidably increasing the expenses of that branch of the War Department. This expenditure of $383,000, in 1838, is thus shown to have been necessarily incurred by the effect of existing laws, and for the proper administration of our public affairs. This addition to the public expenditure, since 1824, in the Executive Department, had partly arisen from our Indian relations having assumed a new posture since that period. They had arisen partly from the great increase of our population, and from the consequent increase of the public business. He had prepared another table, showing a comparison between the expenditures of the Government in 1824, and in 1838, arranged under appropriate heads, and accompanied with brief remarks, giving some of the reasons for the necessary increase of the public expenditures in 1838. He would here subjoin that table:

The following table is an exhibit of the permanent expenses of the Government on some leading items, in the years 1824 and 1839, with a brief statement of some of the reasons for the difference:

He had been able, by referring to the documents which the Secretary of the Treasury had communicated to the House of Representatives, one numbered 39, and was printed January 4, 1836, the other numbered 17, and was printed December 30, 1839, to present the foregoing table; and thus showed conclusively that the few items above specified, make a difference in the amount, of the necessary and indispensable expenditures of the Government, in 1824 and in 1838, for permanent purposes, of over six millions of dollars; and accounting for the whole difference, with the exception of less than a million of dollars, which the table, before exhibited, accounts for. And yet it has been sounded from Maine to Florida, that the expenditures of this Administration had trebled the expenditures of that of the younger Adams; that while the disbursements of the latter were annually thirteen millions, the expenses of this Administration amounted to forty millions annually. Such were at this moment the character of the charges against this Administration pervading the country.

He asked for justice, and for nothing but justice. He desired to have the document upon the table printed. He wished for its extensive circulation, not to deceive, but to undeceive, the American people—to enable them to understand this whole matter. He was not aware, in the list of items which he had specified, that there was a single one calculated to swell the aggregate of public expenditures, for which those in the Opposition had not voted. He made no complaint for their so doing. They were expenditures which the posture of public affairs and the condition of the country required.

It has been said, by Senators in the Opposition, that this Administration are answerable for the aggregate of public expenditures; that the people should look only to the footings of the account; that temporary expenditures take place, of necessity, under every Administration. Will this course serve gentlemen? How compares the aggregate of the expenditures of this, with that of former Administrations? This, it is said, is the true criterion to test the economy, or to show the extravagance, of an Administration. How stands the account between 1824 and 1839, in the aggregate expenditures? Not more favorable to the Opposition. But is this the fair, the honest, the just mode of settling the account? May there not be public expenditures of a temporary character unavoidable in one year, which would not occur in another? Would it be right to charge such an expenditure to the Administration then in power? No, sir; no. The true mode is the one which he had adopted for his guide. Look to the permanent expenditures of the Government for each year; compare the expenditures of one, with those of another year; let the difference be made to appear; and let the Administration in power account for any difference against it. This would be right; but if it suits Senators in the Opposition better to take the annual aggregate of expenditures for all purposes, and to compare the aggregate of one Administration with that of another, it will lead to no more favorable result for them for the years 1824 and 1838, or 1839, than that before stated. The Senators over the way would gain nothing by instituting any such comparison. But the report of the Secretary, now before the Senate, had been denounced because it speaks of a payment of a portion of the public debt in 1838, when, it is alleged, there was then no national debt. No national debt! Is this so? A few days past, both himself and the Senator from Massachusetts, contended that the bill providing for the issue of Treasury notes, could not be justified upon any other constitutional ground than under that clause of the Constitution which conferred upon Congress the power to borrow money; that it was a loan, and when made it became a public debt. He admitted that it was an unfunded debt; but nevertheless was, in every view, a subsisting debt, and for the redemption of which the faith of the Government was solemnly pledged.

The payments therefore made from the Treasury in 1838, in taking up these Treasury notes, were as much an extinguishment to that amount of the unfunded public debt, as the payments made in 1834 for a like purpose were an extinguishment of a corresponding amount of the funded debt of the Government. The only difference was, that in the latter case, the debt was due abroad; in the former, the debt was due at home. He would say in conclusion, that he hoped to see the motion submitted by the Senator from Missouri adopted. If there was truth in the stories abroad in the land, as to the extravagance and profligate expenditure of the people's money by this Administration; the publication of this document can have no effect. If there is no foundation in truth for such statements, the printing of this document will tend to correct every error, to remove every false impression now resting upon the public mind in relation to this subject. That cause must be both weak and wicked which can only be sustained by deception and trick; and that cause is strong, and must prevail, which rests upon the immovable pillars of truth and of justice.

Mr. WEBSTER, having urged the impropriety of printing 30,000 copies of a paper unknown and unread, proceeded to comment on the fact that one of the columns of this paper embraced those items which were considered extraordinary or temporary by the Secretary of the Treasury; which items, by the express terms of Mr. BENTON'S resolution, were to be separated from the ordinary aggregate, and not to be charged upon the Administration as proofs of prodigality. But the very complaint was that these were extraordinary items, and that they went to make up the extravagant expenditures of the Government. All prodigality was necessarily extraordinary in a justly administered Government. This document was evidently not a mere authentic matter of record; it was a statement, left, to a considerable extent, to the discretion of the Secretary.

Mr. W. also replied to Mr. HUBBARD, commenting on various items of expenditure by this Administration, and particularly on the unfortunate choice which they had made of enormously defaulting public officers.

Mr. BROWN observed, that the gentleman from New Jersey had made a new issue in regard to this subject, and demanded the production of the record to show that himself and his friends had voted for extravagant appropriations. He presumed that gentleman would not deny that he had voted for those bills, which constituted almost the entire amount of the expenditures of the Government. These were the naval appropriation bill, the military appropriation bill, and the appropriations for the civil list, together with those for the removal of the Indians.

But allow me, said Mr. B. to exhibit some instances in which that Senator and his friends have voted for most enormous extravaganees; and he had no doubt but, by examining the journals, similar votes of that Senator and his party could be found, without number. In the bill providing indemnity for French spoliations prior to 1800, five millions of dollars was the amount that would have been appropriated, had it passed both Houses. Now, on the final passage of that bill by the Senate, page 125 of the journal, at the session of 1834 and '35, that Senator's name is recorded in the affirmative; and yet this was an old claim, that very many well informed statesmen believed never had any foundation in justice. That bill was passed by the Senator and his friends in this body, a majority of the friends of the Administration voting against it. Then there was the bill for the relief of the three corporations of Washington, Georgetown, and Alexandia, appropriating about a million of dollars, and the name of the Senator, together with those of most of his friends, was found recorded for that bill, a large number of the friends of the Administration voting against it. These were specimens of that economy on which the gentleman and his friends had thought proper to favor them with a lecture; and he had not a doubt but, by examining the journals, many more of such specimens could be found. But the gentleman said, in regard to banks, that they were the friends of the Administration. What, sir, said Mr. B. after what the gentleman has told us from day to day, that the policy of the Administration was ruinous to the banks, but which he himself did not believe, would he now have us to understand him as saying that these institutions were friendly to those whose policy was, he alleged, breaking them down? Why, this was an absurdity that even the gentleman himself must be forcibly struck with. The gentleman himself was, not a very long time ago, if he was not now, president of a large banking institution, and he believed that he, at least, was not distinguishd for his friendship to the Administration. For his part, he never did admit that the Administration had pursued a line of policy with a view of injuring the banks; but he believed that these corporations pursued a course of policy with a view of forcing a restoration of the funds of the Government to their keeping. The gentleman, in a very good natured way, reminded him that in a very few months he would receive (Mr. B. presumed from North Carolina) a reproof for the course he had taken.

[Mr. SOUTHARD here said he did not allude to North Carolina.]

Mr. BROWN continued. The gentleman spoke personally in relation to me, and I was left to infer that the rebuke he anticipated for me was from my own State.

Sir, should I meet with the misfortune of receiving such a rebuke, the gentleman, from practical experience, will know how to sympathize with me, for the gentleman, and the Administration of which he was a member, had received such a rebuke from the popular fiat some years since, in the most unequivocal manner. That the gentleman and his friends should wish to be reinstated in office, and that they should even, in defiance of probabilities, indulge in the most sanguine anticipations, was reasonable enough; but that the popular rebuke, such as he anticipated would be bestowed on the Democratic party, was, to say the least of it, not very probable. The gentleman, in good time, would find himself greatly mistaken in his predictions.

Mr. CALHOUN. I am the friend of economy, and have, I trust, ever evinced it by my votes and other public acts. I believe that in all free States it is a cardinal virtue, and in ours, an indispensable one, if we desire to preserve our political institutions. As the friend of economy, I rejoice to hear this debate. The crimination and recrimination of extravagance between the two sides of the Senate, is a proof that the day of extravagance is passed, and that of economy has arrived. We have had a period of extravagance. It is manly to acknowledge the truth. Our expenditures have gone far beyond what they ought to have been. The important question is, what and who caused it?

The cause, sir, will be found in an overflowing Treasury, which had to be sluiced by appropriations to prevent an inundation; not overflowing with gold and silver, but with bank notes, paper credit, to retain which in the Treasury would, in effect, have been but to borrow so much from the banks for the time. The greatest of all absurdities is to hoard up bank notes, or credit, in the Treasury. It is but to draw so much from circulation to be filled up by new issues, thus giving the banks interest both on the old and the new issues. But this is not the only objection. It is liable to another, still stronger, if possible. The notes drawn from circulation being replaced by another issue of equal amount, the channels of circulation are kept full, and when the Government comes to draw from the Treasury the accumulated mass, the necessary effect is, that the addition to the already full channels of circulation, swells the tide till an inundation follows, sweeping all before it, such as we lately witnessed. Yes, we have just passed through a period, in which the most wasteful and corrupt expenditures could not sluice the Treasury fast enough to prevent the inundation of paper, but has left the country and Government in their present embarrassed condition. I now ask, what caused this overflowing Treasury, with all the accompanying extravagance and following disasters? What, but the prolific parent of evil, the protective system—duties imposed, not for revenue, but to favor one branch of industry at the expense of all others; and which exacted from the people more than the wants of the Government needed, or even its waste and extravagance could expend.

It is difficult, in the changed condition of things, and in the midst of the present denunciation of extravagance and praise of economy, to realize the scenes through which we have lately passed. It is but four years since, when he was considered a benefactor who could devise some new scheme of spending money, and when the then Administration, notwithstanding the extravagance of the appropriations, was censured for not spending money fast enough, and was even called on by a resolution of the Senate to know how much they could spend. Such was the cause of the extravagance which is now condemned on all sides, and the fruits of a mistaken and mischievous policy.

In order to determine who is responsible for this extravagance, it is only necessary to decide who are responsible for the policy in which it originated. I, then, put the question, who were the authors and supporters of the protective system? I leave gentlemen to answer. I submit it to the journals of Congress and the public voice to decide. Appropriation and expenditures are but consequences—dangerous and corrupting consequences—but, at the same time, consequences whose alternative, an accumulation of a surplus mass of bank notes in the Treasury, is, to say the least, not less dangerous and corrupting. It has been our misfortune to be cursed with these combined evils.

But, as important as are these questions, there is another still more so, relating to the future. The past is past, and cannot be recalled; and a recurrence to it is only profitable as furnishing lessons of experience. The future is still before us with its realities, and the important question is, who are now the advocates and supporters of so calamitous a policy, in spite of the severe lessons of experience? Time will show, and when it does, it will make manifest who are the real friends and authors of extravagance, and foes of economy and retrenchment. I repeat, economy is a cardinal republican virtue; and that there never existed a Government of the kind, in which it was so indispensable as in this of ours. I do not intend to go into the reasons on this occasion; but of all Governments, ours is that in which patronage and extravagance are the most corrupting and dangerous. Thus thinking, I rejoice that we are compelled to retrace our steps and economize. Yes, compelled by that which only can enforce economy on a dominant party and empty Treasury. It is on that I rely. Its mandates must be obeyed, and I wish it to be understood that I intend to use my best efforts to keep it low, till the Government is thoroughly reformed and restored to its original purity. Fill the Treasury to overflowing to-day, and to-morrow the scenes of profusion and extravagance through which we have thus far passed would return. Nothing but stern necessity can correct abuses; and I now give notice, when the time has arrived for the readjustment of the tariff, I shall resist all attempts to draw more money from the pockets of the people than is absolutely necessary, with rigid economy, to the just and constitutional wants of the Government. In doing so, I shall give the highest evidence of being the friend of economy and our free institutions. Here let me say, that I deem fifteen millions of dollars annually to be ample to meet all the just wants of the Government, not including the Post Office Department. With that sum, we may place our civil list and military establishment, in all its branches, on a respectable footing, and enlarge our navy, so as to give protection to our wide-spread commerce, and give us the command of the adjacent seas.

I know nothing of the contents of the document that has caused this discussion, but will vote for the motion without knowing whether the effects of the publication will be such as the mover contemplates or not. The public attention is roused to the subject of our expenditures, and whatever we publish on the subject, I doubt not, will be closely scrutinized. If there be errors in the report, or if be drawn up so as to make false impression, it will been seen and pointed out; but, if not, it will have its due weight. With this impression, I care not to look at its contents before giving my vote; but, if any gentlemen desires time to examine it before he votes, as far as I am concerned it shall not be withheld from him.

Mr CLAY was glad that the Senator from South Carolina admitted that the expenditures of this Administration had been extravagant. Coming from him, it was an admission very important. And Mr. C. denied both his premises and conclusion; and proceeded to argue that the protective system was not the cause of the surplus revenue, and that it did not necessarily follow that a Government, with a surplus, would always be extravagant, though he admitted the conclusion to be correct in regard to this Administration. Mr. C. proceeded to point out what he thought the real causes of a surplus, and to specify and comment upon various expenditures of the Administration.

Mr. BUCHANAN said: I rejoice at this day's debate. It has been the most propitious day for eliciting truth which we have seen since the commencement of the session. Its consequences, for good or for evil, must be felt, and will be felt, either by our friends in the Opposition or by ourselves. I am most willing to abide the result.

I do not rise to discuss any of the great questions agitated to day, which have not an immediate bearing on the subject before the Senate. My purpose is, so far as my voice can be heard, to fix the the attention of the Senate and the country upon the very question now at issue between the two great political parties; which is, have the present Administration been guilty of an extravagant and wasteful expenditure of the public money?

As to the result of the next Presidential election;—I shall never make that a subject of discussion in this body, unless I should be forced into it by Senators in the Opposition. In passing, I would merely say, "Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself, as he that putteth it off." I shall never raise the shout of victory, until the battle has been fought and won; although I may feel great confidence in the result. The event, under Providence, is in the hands of the American people; and this day's debate will essentially serve to enlighten their judgment and to influence their decision.

Mr. Van Buren came into office on the 4th of March, 1837. Since that day, we must all admit that the Treasury has not been full. On the contrary, we have found difficulty ever since in raising the ways and means. This fact we cannot deny; and if we have been guilty of extravagant and unnecessary expenditures of the public money within that period, we can neither justify nor excuse ourselves under the plea of an overflowing Treasury. We desire to escape from this charge under no such subterfuge. We boldly deny the accusation of extravagance preferred against us by our political opponents, and demand the proofs by which it is to be sustained.

In order to establish their accusation, that this Administration has been guilty of an extravagant and unnecessary expenditure of the people's money, since the 4th March, 1837, they must clearly and distinctly point out the items and the objects of this extravagant and unnecessary expenditure. We call upon them for their bill of particulars. We ask them where, when, and how, have these expenditures been incurred? Vague and general charges of extravagance, although clothed in the most eloquent language, amount to nothing. We call for specifications—for items. By this report from the Secretary of the Treasury, we furnish our opponents with the best weapons to assail us, if we are vulnerable. It enumerates, under different heads, all the expenditures of public money since the present Administration came into power. It presents the subject, item by item, and makes an aggregate for the last year (1839) of thirty-seven millions of dollars. The permanent and regular expenses of the Government, during that year, did not reach thirteen millions and a half; and it has never, to my knowledge, been asserted, either by friend or foe, that, under any system of wise economy, they could have been reduced below this sum. The remaining twenty-three millions and a half (I speak in round numbers) consist of eleven millions expended in the payment of the public debt, which we were compelled to create in consequence of the bank explosion of 1837; and twelve millions and a half appropriated by Congress for the purpose of meeting extraordinary and temporary expenditures which we allege were unavoidable. We now come to the very point in controversy. This is a question of figures; and honorable Senators in the Opposition are called upon, with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in hand, to lay their finger upon those items of expenditure, whether ordinary or extraordinary, which they condemn. Let them point out such as could have been avoided. This, and this alone, is the mode by which they can establish the charge of extravagance against the present Administration. Now, sir, our case is presented. The heads of our expenditure are before the Senate, and the people of the United States, in an official and authentic form; and feeble as I may be, I am willing to take up the gauntlet, and do battle with any of our political opponents in defence of the present Administration against this charge. I shall not refer to the ournals for the purpose of proving that they themselves have voted in detail for the very expenditures which they now condemn in mass. This has never been my practice. I take these expenditures as I find them; and all I ask is, that our opponents shall come forward and specify, in a distinct and tangible form, those particulars which they deem unnecessary and extravagant.

Gentlemen, in the first place, fix fifteen millions of dollars as the proper annual expenditure of the Government, and then charge the Administration with extravagance, because it has exceeded this imaginary standard. The present report of the Secretary of the Treasury exposes, in the clearest light, the fallacy and the injustice of such a course. Among the items constituting the twelve and a half millions of the extraordinary and temporary expenditures during the last year, we must certainly find the evidence of this extravagance, if it is any where to be found. Can any Senator specify a single expenditure upon this list which ought not to have been made? In it the items for Indian wars, for the purchase of lands from the Indians, and their removal west of the Mississippi, amount to a large sum. But who will say that these expenditures have been unnecessary? The present Administration, when it came into power, found an Indian war raging on our Southern frontier. This war was more savage, if possible, than any war which the savages had ever waged against us. Men, women, and children, were murdered indiscriminately. Would any one of our friends on this side of the House, stop to calculate the cost of defending our citizens against such a cruel and treacherous foe? I answer, not one. If millions more had been necessary for this purpose, they would themselves have granted these millions. With what justice, then, can the Administration be censured for this expenditure? Extravagance in this particular can with no more justice be charged on Mr. Van Buren, than on the Emperor of China. He found the Florida war raging when he came into power; and he was bound, by the most imperative obligations, to apply the money granted by Congress to the defence of the country. Had he acted otherwise, he would have violated the highest duty of his station; and yet this is a heavy item in the extravagant expenditure with which he is charged. It is perfectly fair for gentlemen to examine carefully the manner in which this war has been conducted, and if they can find any thing in it justly censurable, to hold it up to public view. But the war itself, and the necessary expenses of conducting it, were inevitable. Then as to the removal of the Indians and the purchase of their lands. This policy was, I believe, commenced under the administration of Mr. Monroe, and has been steadily pursued throughout all the succeeding Administrations. The object has now happily been almost accomplished. Is Mr. Van Buren chargeable with the expense incurred by pursuing this policy? If Indian treaties, ratified by the Senate, and sanctioned by Congress, had required the expenditure of five or ten millions more in removing the Indians from the States east of the Mississippi to the west of that river, who could have fairly charged Mr. Van Buren with extravagance in this increased expenditure? Is there any Senator who would restore the Indians to Georgia, and the other States from whence they were removed, even if, by doing so, he could restore the cost of their removal to the public Treasury? Not one.

The most extraordinary item embraced in this general charge of extravagance, is the large amount of indemnities paid by the Treasury to our own citizens, for losses sustained by the injustice of foreign Governments, and which the administration of General Jackson obtained from these Governments by its vigorous and successful policy. These sums were paid into the Treasury in trust for the claimants, and of necessity they were paid out to these claimants. And yet this very disbursement contributes largely in swelling the aggregate expenditure of the last year to $37,000,000, and is thus made to constitute one of the items of proof to establish the charge of extravagance against the present Administration.

I might examine in detail the whole list of these extraordinary and temporary expenses of the Government during the last year, and ask which one of them could have been avoided; and the answer to each individual question must be the same. They were all necessary. Mr. Van Buren is fairly chargeable with none of them. Point out when, and where, and how, he could have avoided or diminished any of them. Unless you can do this, you give up the question.

The honorable Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] takes up the expenses of the civil list. He compares their aggregate amount with what it was a number of years ago, and shows that it has increased. This increase has been rendered absolutely necessary by the increase of our rapidly extending country. But he deals altogether in generals. He does not descend to particulars where we could meet him.

Here Mr. CLAY said, I do descend into particulars. I mentioned the increased number of custom-house officers.

Mr. BUCHANAN. The gentleman refers generally to the custom-house officers. What kind of a bill of particulars is this? If the number of custom-house officers has been increased, let it be shown that this increase was made without necessity, and was not required by the public service. This, I think, will prove to be a difficult task. Let the subject be minutely investigated.

This is not a question to be carried by eloquent appeals, but by a close examination of facts and figures. The Secretary of the Treasury has laid the case fairly open for gentlemen: and if there has been any expenditure not justified by necessity, I am willing to unite with them in condemning it. Three years of the expenditures of the present Administration are now before the country; and I shall expect, at an early day, to hear from our friends in the Opposition on this subject. I repeat again, let them point out the items of extravavance; and if we who are the political friends of this Administration cannot defend each one of them in detail, we must suffer the consequences. The people of this country have a right to know whether any, and, if any, what, amount of the thirty-seven millions of dollars paid out of the Treasury during the last year, has been expended without necessity.

Sir, the necessary expenses of this Government must go on increasing. No human prudence or foresight can prevent it. All that we can do, is to take care that not a dollar shall be expended which is not necessary to promote the interest or defend the honor of the country. You might, with equal propriety, say that the same quantity of cloth would make a garment for the full grown man, which was sufficient for him when he was a little boy, as to allege that the necessary expenditure for this country, now embracing twenty-six States and three populous Territories, should be limited by what they had been ten or twenty years ago.

The position cannot, for a moment, be maintained.

I agree with the Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. PRESTON] that sound policy dictates to us to increase our navy. It is our best and most natural defence against a foreign foe, and our commerce, which is spread over every sea, demands additional protection. But, according to the positions assumed by gentlemen, the appropriations which may be made by Congress to carry this policy into effect, would constitute, in the aggregate of the account current, a heavy item of extravagant expenditure against the President, who should execute our will.

The present issue is precise and limited in its character. Have the expenses of the Government been extravagant since the 4th March, 1837? We are ready for the trial. This question, however, is not to be decided by comparing the aggregates of expenditures for the years 1837, 1838, and 1839, with the aggregate for previous years, when there were no Indian wars—no Indian lands to be purchased, nor Indians to be removed, and none of the other enumerated extraordinary expenses to be incurred. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. CALHOUN. My object, when I first addressed the Senate on this subject, was neither to accuse nor defend the Administration. It was much higher—to state facts, point out causes, and trace consequences. In affirming that there had been a period of extravagance, I made no particular reference to the present Administration; but, on the contrary, asserted at the time that the period of economy had commenced. But, as the Senator from Kentucky had thought proper to refer what I had said to the existing Administration, I feel myself called on, as an act of justice, to state my impression how far they are or are not responsible, in reference to the subject of discussion.

There certainly remains much to be done to complete the work of retrenchment and economy; but, as far as I can judge, it would be doing great injustice to deny that, in the ranks of the Administration, there exists a strong desire to reform the expenditures, and that a good deal has been done already, under circumstances of no small difficulty. So strong has been this spirit at the present session, that thus far few bills have passed, involving expenditures, to which I could not cheerfully give my assent. But I attribute the reformation to the exhausted state of the Treasury. I know well, from past experience, if the Treasury had been full, the money would be spent. It would not have been in the power of this, or of any other Administration, to prevent it; and I take the occasion to repeat, that I rely on an empty Treasury, as the only certain remedy against extravagance. The most that can be done by the Administration, is to bring down the expenditures with the diminishing means of the Treasury. This is no difficult task, and necessarily requires time. I ask the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, in all candor, whether it would be possible for the Administration to reduce the expenditures to the proper standard, all at once? Take the pension lists. There are about forty-four thousand remaining on it, at a cost of upwards of three millions annually. Can that be got clear of at once? What can be done under this vast head of expenditure, but to arrest the further progress, and to leave it to time to retrench? I appeal to all whether there has not been great vigilance for the last two years, to prevent the increase of the lists, or whether more could well be done in that particular than has been? Again; take the Seminole War, for which the present Administration is not certainly responsible. They found it existing, and how could they prevent the heavy expenditures from that source while it continues to exist?

I have had, sir, some experience on the subject of retrenchment and economy. It was my fortune to administer the Department of War under Mr. Monroe. The Department was in a state of great disorder, and the expenditures extravagant. I went in with the determination to use my best efforts to economize and retrench, to which I devoted myself; but I found the task a work of three years of incessant labor, before it could be accomplished, to any thing like satisfaction to myself.

The Senator has asserted on this as well as other occasions, that the tariff was not the cause of the surplus revenue, but that it was caused by the public lands. A very few remarks will, I trust, satisfy the Senator himself that he is in error. The tariff of 1825 raised the duties, on an average, of all the imports so high, that nearly one-half in value of all the goods imported was paid to the custom-house; that is, out of an import of about sixty millions of dollars, the Government collected about thirty millions. That was about the amount of the imports when the compromise act passed. Since then our domestic exports have risen to nearly 100,000,000; which, adding the profits of trade, and the whale fishery, with other resources, would give an import of not less than one hundred and twenty or thirty millions, and which, if the tariff of 1828 had not been reduced, would have given an income from the customs of sixty or seventy millions. Could so large an amount have been collected without a heavy surplus? It may, indeed, be said, that if the tariff had not been reduced, the exports would not have been increased, but that would place its oppressive character in a still stronger light. The object for reducing the tariff was in part to get clear of the excess of revenue; but notwithstanding the reduction, which had to be gradual to prevent the destruction of the manufactures, the duties were sufficient to swell the income from that source to an amount greatly beyond the expenditures of the Government. The surplus, after the payment of the public debt, and the removal of the deposites, was placed in State banks; and afforded the means of bank accommodation, on so large a scale, as to raise prices, and to give an unbounded impulse to speculation in the public lands; and hence the revenue from that source, to which the Senator attributes the surplus. It, indeed, greatly increased it; but properly considered, it was itself but one of the effects of the surplus already accumulated in the Treasury from the tariff.

But the Senator said that, admitting it was the cause, still there was no necessity that the surplus should be spent: no necessity for spending a revenue of forty or fifty millions of bank paper, passing into the Treasury annually? Could such a tide of paper be permitted to flow into the Treasury from year to year, without flowing out through some other channel? I put the question to the Senator, would not its first effect have been to transfer a large portion of the property of the country to the banks, and their favorites, and finally, on the reflux of the tide, to leave them in the embarrassed and prostrated condition in which we now find them? Is not, in fact, the present condition of the country, proof conclusive of the truth of what I have asserted?

[Mr. CLAY. The accumulation might have been prevented by the distribution of the surplus.]

Yes, it might, and I accordingly made the qualification, that it must be spent, or got clear of some other way; but the Senator knows my objections to the scheme of raising a revenue for distribution. It may be expedient to get clear of an accidental surplus to avoid a greater evil, by a deposite with the States, as was the case in 1836; but of all measures, I regard a permanent distribution of the revenue, as the most fatal effect that could grow out of a surplus revenue. As bad as are extravagant expenditures, it is still worse. We have had the two combined, and they, in the short space of a few years, have well nigh proved fatal to the country.

The Senator in conclusion declared against a high tariff, but asserted, if I understood him correctly, that he was for protection, and was in favor of a system of countervailing, or retaliatory duties.

[Mr. CLAY explained, that he was in favor of maintaining the compromise act, and of affording protection within the limits to which it would reduce the duties.]

I certainly understood the Senator to say that he was prepared to meet prohibition by prohibition. Did I understand him correctly?

[Mr. CLAY assented.]

I do not intend to go into the important question involved; but I take the occasion of raising a warning voice against the whole system of retaliatory duties. It would prove worse in the end than the protective system. Go into it when you may, it will be almost impossible to get out of it. Begin the war of duties against duties and prohibition against prohibition, and you will find no stopping place. It will go on. The passions will be roused on both sides. Pride will be enlisted. If you raise the duty on one article in order to force a reduction on another, instead of reduction, additional duties will be laid to countervail yours. If you prohibit on one article, to force the removal of prohibition on another, it will in like manner be met by prohibition on some third article. In every instance there will be less resistance to increased duties on one side, than to the reduction of the duties on the opposite, and to adding to the list of prohibited articles on one side, than diminishing the list on the other.

It is easy to see the end. We should have the protective tariff in the worst possible form, still more oppressive and more difficult to throw off. I proclaim the danger in advance, and I call on those interested to be on their guard.

In guarding against the danger of the retaliating system, I am not insensible to the unequal and oppressive duties under which some of our great staples, and especially tobacco, labor in many of the countries with which we have commercial relations, to the great injury of both them and us. I hope the folly of such a policy will yield to the growing intelligence of the age; and I do trust that those who may be charged with the Executive Department of the Government, will spare no efforts, nor lose any opportunity, to remove the evil, through the agency of negotiation and argument; but I do trust that the Government will not go a step beyond. It would be, at best, but to injure ourselves in order to spite others. I hope that some more suitable occasion may be presented to go fully into this important subject, before the termination of the session.

The question being then on printing thirty thousand extra copies of the report, it was agreed to—ayes 22, noes 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Anderson, Benton, Brown, Buchanan, Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Cuthbert, Fulton, Hubbard, King, Lumpkin, Nicholas, Norvell, Pierce, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Sturgeon, Wall, Williams, and Wright—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Davis, Dixon, Henderson, Knight, Porter, Prentiss, Preston, Ruggles, Southard, Tallmadge, Webster, and White—14.

The Senate then adjourned.

SPEECH OF MR. DAVIS, OF INDIANA.

In the House of Representatives, April 30, 1840.—Delivered in Committee of the Whole House, on the subject of an appropriation for the Cumberland Road.

The general appropriation bill being under consideration in Committee of the Whole House—

Mr. DAVIS moved to strike out the following items:

For coast surveys - -	$125,000
For colonnade to the Treasury building	41,000
For completing the Patent Office -	52,000
For continuing the Post Office building	125,000
Amounting in the whole to - -	$343,000 and inserting in lieu thereof:

"That the following sums be, and they are hereby appropriated, for the continuation of the Cumberland road, viz:

For the State of Ohio - - -	$75,000
For the State of Indiana - -	100,000
For the State of Illinois - -	100,000
	$275,000

To be disbursed under the direction of the Secretary of War, subject to all the regulations and restrictions of former appropriations."

Mr. D. assured the committee that nothing but the strongest sense of obligation to his constituents could induce him to trespass for a single moment on their patience, wearied, as he knew they were, by protracted sittings and irrelevant debate. Gentlemen around him were crying out, "There is no hope for your road in the Senate," "Your bill is killed in the Senate," and similar discouraging remarks; still, though he feared that this unfortunate condition of their claim was but too true, it should not deter him from discharging the duty he owed to the people who have honored him with their confidence.

Mr. D. said there were two reasons which had induced him to move to strike out these particular items from the estimates. The first was, that, under the present straitened condition of the Treasury, he was under the impression that the colonnades, porticos, and other ornamental portions of the Patent Office, and the Treasury building, could with much propriety be dispensed with, at least for the present. One of those buildings was now occupied, and the other could be rendered habitable at very little additional cost. The Post Office could be covered in so as to preserve it from injury for another year, at a very trifling expense; and, the materials on hand not being of a perishable character, of course no great injury could result from the delay.

But the second reason, said Mr. D. why he had moved to strike out any portion of this bill, in order to insert his amendment, was for the accommodation of certain gentlemen, who are very fastidious to accommodate the legislation of the country, so as not to transcend the estimates submitted to this House by the Secretary of the Treasury. But before he proceeded to notice the objections of gentlemen to making appropriations which are not included in the estimates of the current year, he must be permitted to reply very briefly to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. PARRIS] In his remarks lately made to the House, he [Mr. PARRIS] says, that the new States have no claims upon the General Government for making this road. Now, sir, the gentleman has but little knowledge of the history of his own country, or at least that portion of it called the new States; for it is well known that this road had its origin in legislation as early as 1805; from that period forward until the last year continued legislative sanction has been extended to this road. The origin of the claim to an appropriation was first founded in the compact admitting the State of Ohio into the Union as will be seen by the report of a committee made and the bill subsequently founded upon it, and approved 29th March, 1806, entitled "A bill to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio."

This first act of Congress not only provides for the construction of this road by the two per cent. reserved for that purpose by the compact between the United States and the State of Ohio; but it makes this additional provision in the same bill: "That any further sums of money required for the continuation of the road, shall be appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States." Here is a direct appropriation of money from the Treasury, in addition to the two per cent. already reserved for that purpose, and every subsequent appropriation bill passed, from that day to the present, has drawn from the the Treasury money in advance, with the contingency that it be reimbursed from the beforementioned two per cent. reserved fund; showing conclusively that the gentleman from Maine is in error, when he alleges that the new States have no claims upon the General Government for this road; for the States of Indiana and Illinois have claims arising from the compact admitting them to the Union, couched in language as strong as that of the compact with Ohio. The obligation on the General Government to complete this road is imperative; for, according to the wording of the compact admitting Illinois into the Union, it is expressly stipulated that the Government of the United States shall apply this fund, (viz. the two per cent. reserved) to the making of a road to the State. This road to the State, the General Government has commenced; and will they adopt the miserable policy of withholding from this great national work the sum necessary to its gradual completion? thereby permitting it to sink into a state of dilapidation from which ten times the sum will be requisite to consummate the work that may be necessary to complete it, if reasonable annual appropriations be made? Such a course of proceeding is worse than folly, and is, perhaps, only equalled by the conduct of the dissolute Catharine the Second, of Russia, who expended millions in erecting gigantic edifices at both Moscow and Petersburg, and then commenced a public highway to connect both these capitals; but having abandoned her road to build a marble palace for one of her favorites, it remained a monument of her folly, and an obstruction rather than a facility to travellers. Shall such be the fate of the only enterprize of which this great nation can boast? in his judgment, the only one destined to perpetuate our nation's greatness, and as such, the only one having demands upon our nation's care, and our nation's treasure. All, who have reflected upon the subject, will approve the policy of extensive land holders making roads, with a view to enhance the value of their own possessions; and on this ground alone the General Government would have been justified in making this road, had they had no other object to countenance the outlay. And is it not notorious that millions upon millions have found their way into the public coffers, that never would have reached them, had it not been for the facilities already afforded by this great national undertaking, and the others held out by the pledge of its completion, as inducements to the people who have colonized the West?

It was due to himself, said Mr. D. and to the opinions he had long entertained, in relation to the constitutional power of Congress to construct works of internal improvement, to say, that according to his judgment, no such power exists, unless for objects strictly and purely national; no power is given by the Constitution to collect taxes from the many, to be disbursed for the benefit of the few; nor is the policy of collecting money from the people to be sent back to the people, in accordance with the tenor and spirit of our institutions; for the people (to say nothing of the folly of such a course) must be the losers by this process of collecting and paying back their own money; but he apprehended none of these objections would apply to the case before them, as it is evident this work has claims paramount to any other now under the supervision and control of the general Government.

The gentleman from Maine further alleges that this road is exclusively local and sectional, and of course unconstitutional. Now (Mr. D. said) he was at a loss to know by what kind of logic the honorable member can make this a local work, when he knows, or if he does not know, it would be but civility on his (Mr. D's) part to inform him, that this road passes through portions of seven of the States of this Union, overcoming in its course the most serious obstacle to an internal commerce of the States—the Alleghany mountains—thereby acting as the great binding ligament of the Union, facilitating and establishing a social intercourse between the East and the West, indispensable to the permanent existence of our great Republic. To talk of the unconstitutionality of this great national enterprise, at this late period of its successful progress, is absolutely worse than chimerical. After it has received, for the long space of five and thirty years, the most unqualified support of the most logical expounders of constitutional law, both in and out of Congress; after it had received the deliberate sanction of Jefferson himself, whose pertinacious adherence to the Constitution was only equalled by the wisdom that directed his opinions; and also having received the sanction of Madison, Monroe, Adams, Jackson, and Van Buren, as they successively approved bills providing for the continuation of this work. Surely gentlemen cannot hope to make a successful attack against this road, upon a point so totally untenable; nor is it by the common or practical construction of that instrument alone that this work may be continued; for its magnitude and nationality defies even a rigid construction of the Constitution itself.

The gentleman has also brought forward in his remarks, made in opposition to this work, the cost per mile, taken, as he alleges, from the estimates for making the road; now, in this report the gentleman has acted, if not with a view to mislead the public mind, at least illiberally and erroneously. Who ever heard of an average of expenditure being drawn from a single item in a long and fluctuating account, and that item the very highest in the mass? Why, in the name of common justice and fair dealing, did he not also tell you that the enormous average, as he would have you understand it, in this partilar mile, was swelled into its magnitude by the unusual difficulties of the locality and the expenditure of four hundred and fifty-four thousand dollars upon bridges alone, leaving the actual expense of this mile of road, exclusive of the bridges, only ten thousand dollars. Why did he not present the two preseding miles at the same time, one of which (No. 69) only cost four thousand two hundred dollars, and the other (No. 70) only three thousand seven hundred dollars.

The gentleman has also taken some pains to travel out of his way, in order to attack and villify a most useful class of Western citizens, called squatters, who should more justly be denominated the pioneers of the West; he has stigmatized them as mere "pillagers of the soil, calling upon Congress to make roads for their accommodation." He knows but little of the persons he thus wantonly attacks, or he would not brand them with such unmerited and opprobrious epithets. Sir (said Mr. D.) if there is one class of citizens among the people of the West, more honest and patriotic than their neighbors, they are the hardy squatters, who have broken through the wilderness, and rendered it subservient to the comforts and prosperity of the gentleman who so unjustifiably maligns them. Many, very many, of our most respectable and intelligent yeomanry were once settlers upon the public lands; many of that class are still so, and no man who knows these people will ever think the less of them for the humbleness of their outset in life, unless indeed he may entertain the opinion that wealth is essential to honesty, and true love of country; for himself, he must say that he had ever found, among the occupants of the humble cottage of the West, a hospitality, and devotion to their country, never to be found in the contaminated and fashionable circles of wealth.

Besides, sir, the gentleman should remember that these "squatters" are made up of emigrants from all parts of the Union; we have them even from the State of "Maine," and they too make good and industrious citizens; their only distinguishing characteristic is an unusual fondness for "pine logs and saw mills."

As my friend from Maine has already received a pretty severe castigation from one of my colleagues, [Mr. HOWARD,] I will, with one additional comment, dismiss that gentleman's attack upon the people of the West. He told us that he approved of the policy, and admitted the constitutionality, of the General Government making, as they had done, a road from Bangor, in Maine, to the British dominions, because, forsooth, it was dubbed a military road; constructed, as the gentleman says, for the purpose of transporting troops; and this road, according to the honorable member's own showing, has been McAdamized for the purpose. Now, sir, he could tell the honorable member that these poor and despised squatters, whom he is so gratuitously disposed to traduce, would be ready and willing to march, at a moment's warning, against the enemies of their country, without requiring that country to prepare a McAdamized turnpike for them to travel over. This was no oratorical conjecture, but had actually taken place; and he felt pleasure, as well as pride, in thus bearing testimony to matters of fact which fell under his own knowledge.

Mr. D. said he regretted exceedingly that this national road question had, like every other subject discussed this session, formed an arena for a party conflict. The President has been censured for his course, and the opponents of the Administration have, in some manner, been held to accountability for the probable failure of this appropriation.

Mr. D. said he would give a candid statement of the present posture of this affair (as he understood it) in a very few words.

At the opening of the present session, the President's message was accompanied by a schedule of estimates for the current year, coming to this House, as is usual, through the Secretary of the Treasury. In the aggregate amount, presumed by that officer to be necessary and proper for the economical and efficient management of the Government, no sum was named for the continuation of the national road. This omission is said to be novel, and many think it culpable; for himself, he must say that he regrets this omission, as it has furnished some gentlemen, (among whom Mr. HOFFMAN of New York avows himself one,) who have hitherto sustained this work, with a pretext for opposing it now; but what is extremely novel in their position is the fact that these same gentleman are decided opponents of the President, unwilling to follow his suggestions in any instance whatever, except this; and now, forsooth, "so strange a spirit has come o'er their dream," that Mr. Van Buren must play the part of the "oracle," to their pliant consciences, before they will vote us one "sous" for our road! Truly,

"Consistency, thou art a jewel!"

I wish these fastidious gentlemen could find it convenient to abide the recommendations of the President in some other particulars.

[Here Mr. BROWN of Mississippi said he apprehended that such a course of remarks would lead to reply, and elicit a long debate.]

Mr. D. said he was determined to confine himself to the question; but that nothing was to be feared by the friends of this road, if debate should be elicited, for he was confident that much of the opposition to this work arose from the fact that the subject was not well understood.

Mr. D. said, when he was interrupted by the gentleman from Mississippi, he was in the act of defining the course of the President in relation to this subject. Some gentlemen reflected upon the Secretary of the Treasury also, for not submitting the necessary estimates; but it never was any part of his duty to compile the items necessary for public works not connected with the necessary operation of the Government: it is true, however, that he has usually been the organ of communication for such estimates, coming, as they always have done, from the Secretary of War. At this session, this information was sent to this House, direct from the War Department, as will be seen in a document from that officer, marked No. 2, and evidently intended as a part of the President's message and accompanying documents.

On page 624 of these reports, the Engineer-in-Chief, as introductory to his estimates, holds the following language:

"I transmit an estimate of the funds required to complete the various civil works under charge of the Engineer Department, together with an estimate of funds required for operations during the year 1840."

This language has the approbation of the President and the Secretary of War, as passing under their inspection and approval from the Engineer to this House; and on the succeeding page may be found the following items:

For completing the Cumberland road in Ohio - - - -	$628,166 26
For completing the Cumberland road in Indiana - - -	3,144,250 20
For completing the Cumberland road in Illinois - - -	1,432,138 49

The amount required to carry on the work for 1840, is as follows:

For Ohio - - - -	$100,000
For Indiana - - - -	150,000
For Illinois - - - -	150,000

The aggregate amount estimated as necessary for the completion of this road, is, in my humble opinion, much too high; at least such is my belief, so far as Indiana is concerned; and I express this opinion with great deference to the judgment of Captain Ogden, the superintendent of this road, whom I know to be an efficient and competent officer; but, sir, I venture this proposition to the General Government, that if they will give us one-half of the above mentioned sum in reasonable instalments, we will give them a quit claim to any further drafts upon the Treasury, and they shall retain all their rights to transport troops, &c. upon the road, as a great national highway.

It has been urged by a distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIDDLE] that the President, in his course this session, upon the subject of internal improvements, was guilty of a deep finesse, made with a view to secure Southern votes, by holding out the idea that he was ostensibly opposed to a system of internal improvements, and yet intending to press for appropriations to this work in an indirect manner. Now the gentleman mistakes the character and intelligence of the people of the new States if he supposes they could be duped by any such chicanery. He, Mr. D. had no reason to doubt but that the opinions of the President remained as they ever have been; and that they are favorable to the road is evidenced by the fact that he has signed bills providing for its continuation. But if the gentleman be correct in his surmises, if the President has shifted his position, it would be far from receiving his (Mr. D's) commendation; for the great political star which had guided his course through life was to do what he thought best for his country and his constituents, regardless of other men's opinions. And yet, said Mr. D. I never have been viewed as one of your plastic politicians, whose only merit is their pliability. But, sir, if the President has acted as the gentleman alleges, it appears to me to be a most mistaken policy, endangering a loss of confidence in the West, and by no means securing new friends in the South.

[Here Mr. HUBBARD rose to a point of order, and said that the appropriation had nothing to do with the opinions of the President, but must be judged upon its own merits.]

Mr. D. said, in reply to Mr. H. that that was precisely what he desired gentlemen should do in voting on this appropriation, without insisting that the President, or any other individual, should first instruct them how to proceed. Mr. D. said he felt it due to himself, to notice for a moment, the remarks made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOFFMAN] some time since, upon this subject. He [Mr. H.] exultingly proclaimed to this House and to the country, how much devotion the Whigs of the last Congress had manifested by their votes upon the question of this road. Now, it is probable, said Mr. D. that a majority of the seventy-four votes given for that road on the last day of the last session, were of that gentleman's party, and it is a matter of deep regret that the same result was not made manifest by the vote taken in this body some weeks since, on a motion to instruct the committee to report a bill for this road; on that occasion, of the eighty-eight affirmative votes, forty-eight were of the Democratic party, the gentleman himself voting in the negative. The gentleman also alleges, that the members upon this floor, from the line of this road, are here because the Democratic presses in Indiana (three or four of which he specified by name, and one of that number in his, Mr. D's, own district,) opened their batteries during the last canvass in Indiana upon our predecessors; "and to Whig inefficiency and Whig lukewarmness was attributed the defeat of the Cumberland road." The facts, he says, he gives upon the information of others; and my colleague from the Evansville district avows himself the informant. Sir, said Mr. D. if my honorable colleague had been as faithful in detailing the whole facts connected with the late elections in Indiana, as he has been in supplying a part of them, I should have been spared the necessity of this explanation. During the pendency of the last election, there were nine political papers published in my district; six of that number were decidedly opposed to my election. The whole nine were zealous and active in the support of their favorite candidates for Congress; and all that could be said in truth, and perhaps a little more, was published for and against my predecessor and myself; so that the charge of Whig impotency, to which the gentleman refers, was more than balanced by the untiring exertions of our opponents; and special pains were taken by the Opposition prints to lay before the public the relative strength of parties, as expressed in the vote for taking up this bill at the close of the last session.

But, sir, the gentleman would have you understand that those of us who represent districts through which this road passes, are here exclusively on this question, as he is informed. Now, Mr. D. said, to speak only for himself upon this subject, he could inform the gentleman, that of the ten counties he had the honor to represent, seven do not touch upon this road, and have no more immediate or direct interest in its completion, than the district represented by his colleague who sits before him, [Mr. PROFFIT;] and in the three remaining counties through which the road passes, his Mr. D's aggregate majority was less than one hundred, whilst his ultimate majority in the entire district was thirteen hundred.

The honorable member from New York has given us a glowing and eloquent description of the importance of this "queen of ways." He tells us that "he is its friend from principle;" that he looks upon it "as a great national road"—"as a monument to stand in after times to record the wisdom of those who planned, and those who sustained it." He tells us, moreover, "that his friendship for it is not mere oratorical profession, but stands recorded on our journals." Why then, sir, has the gentleman turned his back upon this national and magnificent undertaking? He tells you himself, in language so plain that those who run may read. I wish that others of his political friends would be as candid on this subject as he is. He tells you, sir, that, if this effort for an appropriation should be crowned with success this year, it will furnish the present delegation from Indiana with capital to sustain both themselves and the President. "If political agitation was required before the election, it would again be summoned to aid the friends of the Administration." He tells you "that, if these appropriations be now made, the course of the Representatives from Indiana will be one of triumph;" that, fearing these results, he is bound to withhold his support; in short, he admits that party, with him, has triumphed over principle. I forbear, sir, (said Mr. D.) to draw conclusions from such a course of conduct. I leave to the intelligent yeomanry of my district, and of the country, the task of estimating the efforts of this eloquent gentleman.

[Mr HUBBARD here said he must protest against going into general politics.

Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina considered it in order, on an appropriation bill, to go into the whole course of the Government.

The chairman of the committee [Mr. CASEY] said that the gentleman from Indiana was strictly in order.]

Mr. DAVIS then said that he had felt it to be his duty to reply to accusations, in some sense personal to himself; but that he should now dismiss the honorable member from New York, for whom, having the honor of his acquaintance, he must say he entertaid the highest personal regard.

One word, however, said Mr. D. to my colleague from the Evansville district, for whom, also, I entertain the kindest personal feeling. He told us, some days ago, in his remarks, avowedly made upon this subject, that he was determined to tell this House of "the tricks and capers cut on the stump in Indiana at the last election." It is but justice to him to say, that of all my colleagues, I believe him to be the best qualified for the task, especially if experience is to form the basis of his avowal.

[Mr. PROFFIT very good humoredly asknowledged the fact.]

Mr. D. said he had also a word to say to the representatives from Virginia; he regretted that the constitutional scruples of many of them had increased so much since the road had crossed the Ohio river. They tell us, "that the primitive object in making this road, was attained, whenever the waters of the Atlantic were connected by it with the navigable waters emtying into the Mississippi."

Now, Mr. Chairman, I apprehend that if these gentlemen had been disposed to give a rigid construction to the Constitution, and the compact in which this road had its origin, their efforts in its support should have ceased, as soon as it reached the Monongahela, as this river is one of the navigable tributaries of the Ohio. But, sir, it was found quite convenient to consider it as perfectly constitutional, until it was completed as far as Wheeling, having passed through a portion of their territory. Are these gentlemen aware of the fact that Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania, all by solemn acts of legislation, sanctioned the passage of this road through their respective territories? Do they not know, that by the compact with Ohio, the general Government is bound to make a road to and through that State? and in the compact with Indiana, they are bound to make a road to that State, and by the compact with Illinois, they are further bound to make a road to that State? Do gentlemen, representing the old States, know, that more than three millions of dollars have been expended, in making that road east of the Ohio? But as the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. MASON,) has so ably stated all the facts connected with the history and constitutionality of this road, I will not dwell any longer upon it.

Mr. D. said he could not refrain from expressing his regret that there should be such a manifest apathy, not to say opposition, to this work on the part of those States through which it passes, since it has been finished and ceded to their jurisdiction. He thought such a course did not argue very strongly in favor of their patriotism, to say the least of it; and hoped gentlemen would consent to act more magnanimously towards the new States.

Mr. D. said he now proposed to say a word in reply to an observation that fell from some gentleman near him when he first commenced making his remarks. That observation was, "Your bill is killed in the Senate." It is certainly a matter of deep regret to the friends of this road, that they have not been able to procure a direct vote upon the isolated proposition for an appropriation; because many members have given us distinct pledges that upon such a proposition, they would support us, that did not feel at liberty to do so when the question was presented to them, as it has ever been, coupled with other subjects which they regarded as extraneous.

For a long time we looked to the Senate to furnish us with this opportunity, by passing a bill, and sending it here for our concurrence; but, to our great mortification, this prospect, we fear, was illusive. I propose to advert, for a moment, to one of the principal sources of our blighted expectations in the Senate. A very distinguished Senator from Kentucky—

[Here Mr. THOMPSON of South Carolina said, in an under tone of voice, "you admit him to be distinguished?"]

Yes, replied Mr. D. distinguished alike for his talents and his inconsistency—inconsistent, as well on this as on many other important topics of national legislation.

This Senator, who for so many years was the eloquent and vigilant defender of the interests of this work—to commemorate whose efforts, a statue of imperishable materials has been erected on the road, near Wheeling—he, too, sir, has not only given his vote against this measure, for the first time, but he has poured forth a torrent of his mingled invective against both the President and this great national undertaking. Like the gentleman from New York, to whom I have referred, and many other leading members of their party, he has sacrificed this, his own darling and favorite measure, upon the altar of his unhallowed party ambition—as is evident from his remarks, recently made in the Senate. We are indebted to the efforts of this Senator, and his only, for the failure of our appropriation in the Senate; and, in my humble judgment, its consequent failure to become a law; as I believe, if the Senate had given us a bill, we could most undoubtedly have passed it.

But in order that this Senator's course may be properly appreciated, I desire to read a short extract from a speech delivered by that gentleman in favor of this road in January, 1824, to show you how eloquently he discoursed at that period in its favor; and that you may compare it with his remarks recently delivered in the Senate. (Mr. D. was about to proceed to read the extract refered to, when Mr. PROFFIT and Mr. STANLY rose simultaneously, and gave notice that this part of Mr. D's speech would certainly be answered.]

Mr. D. then read the following extract from Mr. Clay's speech upon this road as delivered in Congress in 1824:

"Let me ask, Mr. Chairman, what has this Government done on the great subject of internal improvements, after so many years of its existence, and with such an inviting field before it? You have made the Cumberland road, only. Gentlemen appear to have considered that a Western road. They ought to recollect that not one stone has yet been broken, not one spade of earth has been yet removed in any Western State. The road begins in Maryland and terminates at Wheeling. It passes through the States of Maryland, Pennsylvania and Virginia. All the direct benefit of the expenditure of the public money on that road, has accrued to those three States. Not one cent in any Western State And yet we have had to beg, entreat, supplicate you, session after session, to grant the necessary appropriations to complete the road. I have myself toiled until my powers have been exhausted and prostrated, to prevail on you to make the grant. We were actuated to make these exertions for the sake of the collateral benefit only to the West; that we might have a way by which we should be able to continue and maintain an affectionate intercourse with our friends and brethren; that we might have a way to reach the Capital of our country, and to bring our counsels, humble as they may be, to consult and mingle with yours in the advancement of the national prosperity. Yes, sir, the Cumberland road has only reached the margin of a Western State; and, from some indications which have been given during this session, I should apprehend it would there pause forever, if my confidence in you were not unbounded, if I had not before witnessed that appeals were never unsuccessful to your justice, to your magnanimity, to your fraternal affection.

"But, sir, the bill on your table is no Western bill. It is emphatically a national bill, comprehending all, looking to the interests of the whole. The people of the West never thought of, never desired, never asked, for a system exclusively for their benefit. The system contemplated by this bill looks to great national objects, and proposes the ultimate application to their accomplishment of the only means by which they can be effected, the means of the nation—means which, if they be withheld from such objects, the union, I do most solemnly believe, of these now happy and promising States, may, at some distant (I trust a far, far distant) day, be endangered and shaken at its centre."

Mr. Chairman, I now propose to give you a few short extracts from the Senator's remarks, made during this present session to the Senate, accompanied by a word or two of comment. That Senator says, "that he never thought it expedient to create a national debt to carry on works of internal improvement; it was only when it could be done without inconvenience to the Treasury, that he had been willing to concur in appropriations to that object."

Now, Mr. Chairman, is it not a matter of history, that this Senator voted for large appropriations to this road, for many years after the last war, when our country was in debt from one hundred, to a hundred and fifty millions? And now the whole amount of our Government debt does not exceed five millions, and there are ample means to pay off that sum, if the banks would but act the part of honest agents. This is but a small sample of his consistency. Now his remarks upon the constitutionality of this work are as follows:

"The operation of the Constitution of the United States, as to the construction of artificial roads, has been suspended in all parts of the United States except in the three States of Indiana, Ohio, and Illinois. We have had, in effect, two constitutions of the United States, one for those three States, and another for the rest of the Union."

Will you have the goodness, said Mr. D. to compare this extract with his remarks made in 1824 (as quoted) in regard to the nationality of this work. When speaking of his reluctance to vote further sums for its continuation, he says:

"That reluctance was increased by a knowledge of the fact that the very States, which were thus exclusively benefited, constantly maintained the Administration which originated and inflicted this inequality. Nay more, a majority of their delegations has been always opposed to a distribution of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, by which other States, as well as themselves, might have acquired the requisite funds to construct their works."

Here, sir, we have it as one of the reasons why he will no longer support this road, that the States through which it passes dared to support the Administration, not giving him their votes for President, and thus the people of the new States are to be afflicted with the Senator's wrath for acting the part of independent freemen! refusing to abandon their principles, and refusing to support his humbug of a Land bill. That Senator should have learned, ere this, that language of intimidation should be his last resort, if he is disposed to cajole the honest and hardy yeomanry of the West. One other extract from the Senator's remarks, and I shall dismiss him.

He says:—

"Another consideration operates very strongly with me to dissuade me, at the present time, from concurring in the passage of this bill; and that is the necessity which I think exists, for a thorough investigation into the causes of the extraordinary expenditures upon this road in those States, and especially in Indiana."

Here we find the Senator seized all at once with the idea that extravagance exists in the disbursement of the public money, and especially in Indiana. If abuses of that kind do exist, I desire most sincerely their correction, and will go at all lengths with other gentlemen for that purpose; but I am unwilling to take the suggestion of the Senator, "that it will be best to remit this whole subject to the administration of President Harrison," for I have an aversion to giving so long a credit on so important a subject. There are doubts that both the Senator and myself shall have passed to that "undiscovered country," before his proffered tribunal shall have been established.

Now, said Mr. D. I have but one or two observations to make in reply to the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. PICKENS,] and I shall then close these my desultory remarks.

The amendment which he submitted when this subject was first before the House, went to make void all our efforts to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means, which committee is unfortunately so constituted that no bill will be reported by them, unless they are expressly instructed to do so. On that occasion the gentleman gave us his views in the spirit and tone of one warmly attached to the State Rights doctrines; and he and myself, said Mr. D. are not so far apart upon this subject as might be imagined. I concur with him in most of his views of State sovereignty, but we differ as to the nationality of this work. He admits the power of Congress, under the Constitution, to construct works of internal improvement, provided they are of a general, and not local character; for the benefit of the nation, and not of a State. This point is so finely illustrated in General Jackson's veto message on the Maysville road bill, that I must ask that gentleman and others who think and act with him, to give that document one more attentive perusal. I am sure if they will do this, their objections to this great national work will be dissipated. The gentleman from South Carolina has expressed great fears that the Union would one day be subverted, on account of the course pursued on the subject of internal improvements. If the gentleman has reference to works purely local and sectional, there may be some grounds for his gloomy apprehensions; but of this great national avenue, of which we are speaking, there can be no doubt of its acting as a bond of our prosperous and happy Republic, rather than as a disseverance.

Now, Mr. Chairman, permit me, in conclusion, to ask if there is not something due to the people of the new States, some obligation resting on the General Government to complete this work in addition to the many claims I have already recited? How much, Mr. Chairman, would have been the value of these public lands, if it had not been for the labor of the hard-working, tax-paying, musket-bearing yeomanry of the West, who, with an enterprise and an industry no where else to be found, have stemmed the dangers, and braved the hardships of a border life? These people have poured into your coffers more than sixty millions of dollars, the result of their hard earning. Let me ask, sir, is there nothing due them for all this? What have they had in return for all their efforts? I will tell you, sir; a system of national legislation, suicidal of their best interests. South Carolina, in her worst days of oppression, never had as strong ground for nullification, as some of the new States have had. Your system of land laws, and the miserable penury manifested in appropriations to this national road, are alike oppressive and despotic; and the small pittance you have meted out to us on this work, has only been obtained by repeated begging, and constant importunity. I, for one, sir, am disposed to change this tone of begging for our rights, into a demand for justice! I am wearied alike with your tyranny and your inflexibility; and so long as I am honored with a seat upon this floor, my hand shall be raised, and my voice swelled to its boldest notes of exclamation, in demanding justice! The time may come, and it surely will come, when we shall be able to do justice to ourselves, and to prostrate in the dust this monster power. When we shall have thus conquered, we will inscribe on our shield the motto of the good Old Dominion: "Sic semper tyrannis." If the present generation shall fail to do this, I am sure, sir, no true patriot of the West, who loves his rights as a freeman, but would, with his latest breath, infuse into the ears of his last and only son, principles of resistance to all such tyrannies.

SPEECH OF MR. PARMENTER,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

In the House of Representatives, April 20, 1840—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. PARMENTER said: Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. EVERETT,] who has just taken his seat, stated that the custom of the House, in Committee of the Whole, on the bill now under discussion, was considerably different from what it had been for several years past. That it had been usual to refer the President's message to a Committee of the Whole House for examination and debate, and that speeches on the political topics of the day were then made. He has censured the friends of the Administration for not pursuing that course, and for not referring the President's message. Since I have been a member of this body, I have witnessed the most unremitted efforts, on the part of the friends of the Administration, to have the President's message referred for the purpose of discussion. But it has been uniformly objected to by the Opposition. It would be well recollected by those who were members of the last Congress, that scarcely a day passed in the early part of the session, that a member of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. HAYNES] did not endeavor to procure a suspension of the rules, for the purpose of the reference of the message, but it was always strongly opposed by the Whig members, and the requisite vote of two-thirds could not be obtained. The message, therefore, was not referred as usual. If the remark was intended as an excuse for the wide range the debate has taken on this bill, it could not be urged that the occasion for that apology was at all attributable to the friends of the Administration; for I am sure, as far as my knowledge extends, it has always been the wish of the Administration members to give it the usual and an early reference. The fault is not with them.

Had not the Opposition on this floor extended the debate so far as to include within its scope almost every party question of the day, the friends of the Administration would have gladly forborne many remarks, which they have felt compelled to make, in justice to themselves and their cause, during the discussion of the bill now before the committee. The necessity of its early passage, and the great labor it imposes on one of the important committees of the House, (the Committee of Ways and Means,) to be in constant attendance, would have induced them to have taken some other occasion, had it been possible. But it would have been considered a dereliction of duty to have left the entire field to our opponents, and then, perhaps, unable to save any time. The gentleman from Vermont again brings forward the oft-repeated charges of corruption and profligacy against the Administration. The accusations are, as usual, vague and indefinite; but he has made one remark which has struck me with some force. He takes the ground, that no successful investigations can be had without the Executive is of the same political character with its accusers. Now, sir, as these charges are against the Executive, how can the investigators be successful in demonstrating charges, unless they be true? The Executive department deny their correctness. Does the gentleman wish them to admit they have done wrong when they have not? Or, does he mean to intimate that there has not been the most open and free disclosure of every thing on the part of the different Departments to committees of investigation? If so, I think he is mistaken, for it has always been admitted, so far as I have ever heard, that the greatest attention has been paid, and the most abundant facilities offered to every committee of investigation. The difficulty does not lie in the want of a favorable political Executive for investigation, but in the absence of truth in the various accusations brought against it. The Secretary of the Treasury has been for a time the principal object of attack, and every examination and scrutiny into his conduct, has only more and more demonstrated the fidelity and capability of this efficient officer. The assaults upon him, as well as the President, have latterly subsided, and have been, during the present session, transferred, in some degree, to the Postmaster General. But, after all the attacks upon him, he is universally admitted to be an officer of consummate ability, and of great research and industry. It is not my purpose, in rising, to make a general reply to the gentleman from Vermont; and I have made these remarks rather incidentally than otherwise. I wish to say a few words in relation to the speech made by my colleague, [Mr. CUSHING,] some days since, which was considered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. VANDERPOEL,] who succeeded him, as more than ordinarily courteous in its language and style.

We have been so generally denounced, in no measured terms, that it is no small praise for a member who, at the present day, ranks under the Opposition to the Administration, to be complimented for his gentlemanly deportment in argument; and therefore I am rather disposed to attribute some of his views to oversight than to any other cause, although his reputation for thorough examination is such as to make it a little extraordinary that he should have made the omission of some material facts.

My colleague quoted from the President's message, at the beginning of the present session, the following passage, speaking of Treasury notes:

"The whole amount unredeemed now falls short of three millions. Of these, the chief portion is not due till next year; and the whole would have been already extinguished, could the Treasury have realized the payments due to it from the banks. If those due from them during the next year shall be punctually made, and if Congress shall keep the appropriations within the estimates, there is every reason to believe that all the outstanding Treasury notes can be redeemed, and the ordinary expenses defrayed, without imposing on the people any additional burden, either of loans or increased taxes."

And then he assumes the position that the President expresses his belief that no deficit could be possible, but in the event of the contingencies therein named, which, my colleague states, are two: first, that it could not happen, unless Congress should make appropriations to exceed the estimates, which have not yet been made; and secondly, that the bank balances, being but about one million of dollars, were sufficient to go but little way towards supplying what was proposed to be given by Treasury notes—that amount being five millions.

The idea conveyed by my colleague, although he, perhaps, does not, in express terms, say so, is evidently that the President was greatly mistaken, or that he intended to make an erroneous impression on the public mind, in relation to the true state of the finances of the nation. I, therefore, regret that he should have overlooked this passage in the message of the President. It will be found on page 9:

"The precautionary measures which will be recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury, to protect faithfully the public credit under the fluctuations, and contingencies, to which our receipts and expenditures are exposed, and especially in a commercial crisis like the present, are commended to your early attention."

I will now advert to the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to which the President refers, and which was laid before Congress on the same day with the President's message. The Secretary says:

"The Department, therefore, is now without any resort, temporary or permanent, in case of material deficiencies; and considering all the circumstances before mentioned, with the dangerous liability in law to have the whole outstanding Treasury notes paid in at any moment for public dues, without a power remaining to issue others in their stead; considering, also, the present revulsions in the commercial world, which affect so seriously the receipts from both duties and lands; considering the disasters which are befalling the banks and rendering our collected funds in some cases wholly unavailable, and the advances necessary to be soon made for the large payments of pensions, and Treasury notes falling due in March, the earliest attention to new legislation on this subject seems highly prudent, if not indispensible, for the effectual security of the public credit."

The President, therefore, did not omit to mention the probability that a temporary arrangement would be necessary to relieve the Treasury, even admitting that a Treasury note issue, in anticipating the revenue, may be properly called a loan, as my colleague contends.

The Secretary of the Treasury, in his report, also presents a full view of the various other matters which bear upon the finances of the nation.

But, in relation to the intimation that the contingencies had not happened which would cause a temporary deficit. It will be recollected that his speech was made a little more than a month since, when, in addition to the proofs I have adduced, several other communications had been made, which show that a larger amount of supply for the Treasury might be needed than was anticipated. On the 4th of February, the attention of Congress was called to the state of the finances of the nation, by a message of the President in relation to the judicial construction given to existing laws for the collection of imports. The President says:

"The effects which these proceedings have already produced, in diminishing the amount of the revenue, and which are likely to increase hereafter, deserve your early consideration.

"I have, therefore, deemed it necessary to bring the matter to your notice, with a view to such legislative action as the exigencies of the case may, in your judgment, require. It is not believed that any law which can now be passed upon the subject can affect the revenue favorably for several months to come, and could not, therefore, be safely regarded as a substitute for the early provisions of certain and adequate means to enable the Treasury to guard the public credit, and meet promptly and faithfully any deficiencies that may occur in the revenue, from whatever cause they may arise.

"The reasons in favor of the propriety of adopting, at an early period, proper measures for that purpose, were explained by the Secretary of the Treasury in his annual report, and recommended to your attention by myself. The experience of the last two months, and especially the recent decisions of the courts, with the continued suspensions of specie payments by the banks over large sections of the United States, operating unfavorably upon the revenue, have greatly strengthened the views then taken of the subject."

Again, on the 17th of February, the President says to Congress by message:

"I submit to Congress a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, repeating suggestions contained in his annual report, in regard to the necessity of an early provision by law for the protection of the Treasury against the fluctuations and contingencies to which its receipts are exposed, with additional facts and reasons in favor of the propriety of the legislation then desired.

"The application assumes, that although the means of the Treasury for the whole year may be equal to the expenditures of the year, the Department may, notwithstanding, be rendered unable to meet the claims upon it at the times when they fall due.

"This apprehension arises, partly, from the circumstance that the largest proportion of the charges upon the Treasury, including the payment of pensions, and the redemption of Treasury notes, fall due in the early part of this year, viz: in the months of March and May, while the resources on which it might otherwise rely to discharge them cannot be made available until the last half of the year; and partly from the fact, that a portion of the means of the Treasury consists of debts due from banks, for some of which, delay has already been asked, and which may not be punctually paid."

Accompanying the message, of which this is a part, was an estimate of the condition of the Treasury, as follows:

Deduct the computed means -	5,100,000
Amount of additional means appearing expedient now and before the 1st of June - - -	$4,750 000

All these documents were before Congress, when my colleague selected a single passage from the message of the President, from which he inferred, that Congress and the people were kept in the dark. Does not every paper specially refer to the annual communication? Is it not already demonstrated, that much of the deficit, although some was before expected, for the early part of the year, arises from new causes? It will be seen, of the $4,750,000 wanted, two millions are to be in the Treasury, and about two millions for the redemption of Treasury notes. There can be no reason for the idea that there was any disposition to keep any other appearance on the state of the Treasury, than that which a full and frank statement would require. From the beginning to the end, the Executive has given the true view of the whole subject, and it appears to me, there is nothing to warrant the conclusion, that Congress was not seasonably informed, and through Congress, the people of the country apprised of the probable deficit of the revenue.

It would seem hardly necessary, if it were not that party prejudice is ready to attribute any thing and every thing evil to the Administration, to arrange and comment upon the statements of these several public documents. But, if it go abroad that the President, in speaking of so important a part of the national concerns as its finances, had omitted to allude to the probability of the Treasury not being able to meet the demands upon it, we all know the extent to which party zeal would go. I have thought it well, therefore, to make an allusion to it, because it has appeared clear to me, that the President and Secretary not only gave warning, but continued it in the most explicit manner. I do not believe there is a man on this floor, who was not aware that there would be, at an early part of the session, a necessity for legislation for the Treasury, or any one, who had examined the President's first message and accompanying documents, who did not see the suggestion plainly made.

If I have understood the argument of my colleague on this point, he must have intended to show, either that the President had not sufficiently investigated the state of the national finances, or that there was evidence of insincerity in the passage quoted. Therefore it is material, that all the passages in the President's message should be referred to, in order that justice should be done; not only in the annual message, as I have mentioned, does the President allude to other contingencies than those mentioned by my colleague, but in every other message, from that time until he made his speech, has he presented the whole view of the state of the Treasury, but made a special reference to the annual message and the Secretary's report. It appears to me manifest that my colleague has failed in proving either inattention or insincerity.

The expenditures of the Government are brought to the consideration of the people by my colleague. He has informed us that they have greatly increased, and quotes the report of the Register of the Treasury, and says truly, that it has been the subject of discussion throughout the whole country. I know it has been fully examined and commented upon in the section of country from which we came. It will be recollected that the charge of extravagance is, to a great extent, against the Executive. There can be no pretence that the Executive is to be held responsible for necessary expenses arising out of the wants of the country from increased population and business. No one contends this is extravagance; and if Congress appropriate additional sums for the defences of the country, our armies, fortifications, navy, and all the important arms of defence, as well as other objects, the Executive is not to be answerable, excepting for its proper expenditure. But it is said the Administration party is to be held to account, if the Executive is not. This, of course exonerates the Executive; but I shall make a few remarks on that point.

My colleague has selected the years 1828, being the last year of Mr. John Quincy Adams's administration, and 1838, the second year of Mr. Van Buren's administration. These are taken as the years which he considered the most favorable for his object. But before I proceed, I will make a single remark on the assertion that the Administration party had a majority in both Houses of Congress. My colleague says this is shown by the choice of Mr. Polk as Speaker, and the appointment of standing committees. Is it not notorious, however, that a portion of the members chosen, as friends of the Administration party, deserted the Democracy, and, under the name of Conservative, joined the Federalists, and chose an Opposition printer, whose bills of printing have been enormous, exhausting all the appropriations and leaving a large sum to be appropriated by the present Congress to pay arrearages? This was done without the Senate which was Democratic, as the House had the control of its own printing. The printing for the House, during the administration of President Jackson, when the House had a Democratic majority for each Congress, in number four, averaged one hundred and fourteen thousand five hundred and eight dollars and twenty-nine cents, ($114,508 29,) being for the whole eight years four hundred and fifty eight thousand and thirty-three dollars and eighteen cents, ($458,033 18;) while for the Twenty-fifth Congress, when Thomas Allen, an Opposition Printer, was chosen by the union of Whigs and Conservatives against the Administration, the printing bills amounted, for one Congress, to TWO HUNDRED AND THIRTY-THREE THOUSAND AND SIXTY-TWO DOLLARS AND SIXTEEN CENTS, ($233,062 16,) more than double the average for the preceding four Congresses, and EIGHTY THOUSAND DOLLARS higher than any one. Yet, sir, this party talks loudly of extravagance.

Notwithstanding the choice of a Democratic Speaker, there was a majority in this House against the Administration, by the junction of Whigs and Conservatives; and in every instance but one, I believe, have they gone over to the Federal party. The following is the list of the members of the Twenty-fifth Congress, with the parties to which they belonged, after the development as indicated in the choice of Printers at the extra session.

The Democrats were, from Maine, 4; New Hampshire, 5; Massachusetts, 1; Connecticut, 6; Vermont, 1; New York, 27; Pennsylvania, 17; Maryland, 3; Virginia, 12; North Carolina, 6; South Carolina, 7; Georgia, 8; Kentucky, 1; Tennessee, 3; Ohio, 7; Louisana, 1; Indiana, 1; Illinois, 2; Alabama, 3; Missouri, 2; Arkansas, 1; Michigan, 1—Total 119.

The Federalists were, Maine, 3; Massachusetts, 11; Rhode Island, 2; Vermont, 4; New York, 10; New Jersey, 6; Pennsylvania, 11; Delaware, 1; Maryland, 5; Virginia, 6; North Carolina, 7; South Carolina, 1; Georgia, 1; Kentucky, 12; Tennesse, 10; Ohio, 11; Louisiana, 2; Indiana, 6; Mississippi, 2; Illinois, 1; Alabama, 2—Total 114.

The Conservatives were Maine, 1; New York, 3; Virginia, 3; South Carolina, 1; Ohio, 1—Total 9.

Making 123 Whigs and Conservatives, and 119 Democrats.

With the exception of one only [Mr. HOPKINS of Virginia] all the Conservatives have permanently joined the Opposition, and are now, in name, as they were before in feeling, identified with the opponents of this Administration. It is truly singular, that the very year during the whole period, which is referred to as being that in which the expenses of the Government were the highest in amount, the Administration party was in a minority in this House, where the appropriation bills are most discussed and arranged—and the great item of public printing for the House, which, as shown, exceeded all bounds, was given to a printer opposed to the National Administration.

But the Secretary of the Treasury is required annually to communicate estimates of what, in his opinion, the wants of the country require, and such estimates are before us, and completely contradict the charges of extravagant appropriations on the authority of the Executive. But he intimates that the Administration encourage, through committees, appropriations not included in the estimates. He gives us no evidence of his opinion. The people who send himself and me here, prefer, in matters of this kind, facts, figures, and proof. They will form their own opinions. Neither will they look at amounts only, to infer extravagance. They will look at objects for which appropriations are made, and the manner in which the money has been expended.

What were the Executive estimates for the year 1838? The report for that year says:

"The expenditures for the year 1838, exclusive of the redemption of the Treasury notes which may be paid in for public dues, or become reimbursable within that year, are estimated at - - -		$26,926,892
Thus the new appropriations called for are - - -		$20,523,249
Viz: Civil, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous -	$3,172,885
Military service, &c.	11,664,612
Naval service, &c.	5,685,752
The permanent appropriations for the service of 1838, made by former acts, are - -		2,262,000
For the details of new and permanent appropriations required, see the document annexed, (B) Appropriations expected to be made by Congress beyond the estimates submitted - - - 1,000,000

These new and permanent appropriations amount to - - $23,785,249

The outstanding appropriations at the end of this year, after deducting what will go to the surplus fund, are computed at - - - 14,141,643

All the appropriations, then, which are chargeable to 1838, constitute an aggregate of - $37,926,892

Of these, it is supposed that not over eleven millions will remain outstanding at the end of the year, and, consequently, that the expenditures on account of the whole will, in 1838, be about - - - 26,926,892"

And this includes the great military expense occasioned by the Florida war, and other Indian expenses. The actual sum wanted for the use of the nation for the year is 23,785,249 dollars; although former appropriations would make the wants of the Treasury 26,926,892 dollars.

There is no fear among the people that their money will not be properly and prudently expended by each and all of the Executive Departments. It is for the political advantage of the Administration that it should be. No one, I am sure, can, for a moment, believe in the party talk about bribery and corruption. It is not the way strength is to be given to any Administration, if it could exist. I mean by the words bribery, what parties mean when they talk about it; not direct offer to do wrong for political advantage, but indirect pecuniary favor without equivalent. There are none such; they cannot exist. Does any one suppose that the motive and object could not be readily seen through by the recipient and the community? It would seldom be effective with the individual, and never with the public. If any party were so far forgetful of right, their interest would be an assurance of their correct course, so far as this point is concerned.

The anxiety of the people of this country is not excited by the amount of dollars and cents called, for by their rulers, but they are desirous to know what is done with it. They have examined the subject well, and the Opposition must bring more evidence than they have yet adduced, before they will effect a revolution in public sentiment unfavorable to the present Administration on this account. You cannot persuade the people that the inhabitants of Florida ought to be left to the massacre of the savage, and that their homes shall be left desolate and unprotected, by telling them that the war has cost fifteen or twenty millions of dollars; and by placing the military expenses of ten or twelve years since, when there were no Indians committing their ravages, in contrast with the present. The people feel that they owe protection to every part and parcel of this great Republic. And they will sustain the Administration in all its efforts to subdue this relentless foe, and restore safety and happiness to the suffering inhabitants of Florida. Neither will they complain of necessary expenses for the navy of the country; but they will watch that we do not carry the support of this arm of our national defence into expenses for which the revenues of the country are inadequate. It is a favorite with the nation, both on account of its utility, and the honor with which it is surrounded. To tell them, by a display of tables, that two or three millions have been expended for the navy, is not of itself sufficient to bring down censure upon the national councils. Useless public offices, if there be such, the country wishes should be abolished; but a mere clamor about office holders will avail nothing, unless the particularly objectionable instances are pointed out. They will not be deterred by the talk about five or six millions of dollars to carry into effect the treaties with the Indian tribes, to which the national faith is pledged, as to them, and the States in which the titles to lands are engaged to be extinguished. Of the large sums which constitute the aggregate of the increase for the year 1838, these were the principal objects for which all parties voted. But, besides, we have on hand much of useful and necessary property such as fortifications, ships of war, arsenals, garrisons, public buildings, all of which are the produce of this expenditure which is so much talked about. But there is a class of expenses, for sectional purposes, and local speculations, which ought to be discontinued. It has grown upon us gradually, until it became of such magnitude as to create alarm. For this description of appropriation, the Opposition, as I believe, are principally answerable. But a reason existed for sliding into these appropriations for local objects, which did not operate until a few years since.

During the rapidly accumulating amount with which the Treasury overflowed, there was a laxity, unquestionably, in appropriations which, notwithstanding the cause has ceased by the disposal of the surplus, whether in the best mode or not is a matter upon which there is a difference of opinion; but still it is gone from the national Treasury, never, as I think, to return, although it is placed with the States in the form of deposites. And the effect of this abundance in the Treasury has lingered with us; but the evil, however, is in a rapid course of correction. The expenditures of the nation for the last year were more than six millions less than the year preceding, and, for the present, it is supposed the expenses may be five or six millions less than the last, and no great national interest suffer.

In contrasting the expenditures for the civil list of 1828 and 1838, my colleague has taken the sum total of each year to show the difference. This head of expenditure he has selected as being that which ought to most nearly correspond in the respective items. The objects of expenditure under the several heads, I find, on examination, materially vary; some of those for 1828 being placed under a different head of expenditure from those of 1838, the years he has selected for comparison. I have been through the civil list for the years named, and have taken some of the items of expenditure, that of salaries for clerks and labor in the Departments, to ascertain whether there has been an increase in the employment of clerks beyond what it would be estimated that the population and business of the nation would warrant —about thirty per cent. I do not believe there is. Their labors have been very much increased by calls for information, which have been very frequent of late years, as will appear by the journals of both branches of Congress. From all I can learn, I believe there always has been a wish, in the various Departments, to have their work done with as few as can perform it well—not that the amount, in a national view, is large, but it is the effect of a regular system of close adherence to economy, which I believe to be practised to as great an extent as is possible, particularly where it can be brought under the direct control of the Executive. The Committee of Ways and Means justly remark, in their report of January, 1839:

"It is impossible, however, to avoid a uniform increase in this branch of the public expenditure, while we continue to multiply our laws at every session, which must be carried into effect by the Executive Departments; and while we rapidly increase, as we have done of late, the number of resolutions in both Houses calling for information, and frequently involving great labor and expense." The increase has not been more than commensurate with the growing population and business of the nation.

The report of the Register of the Treasury arranges the expenditures under six different heads—civil list, foreign intercourse, miscellaneous, military establishments, Indian department, and naval establishment. He quotes aggregates of expense for these respective years: to show the difference, I have, as I just remarked, examined the expenditures under these heads, and find the items not at all identical; and, therefore, taking the amount under one specific head of expenditure, will be no guide. For instance, under the head of miscellaneous in 1828, is included an expenditure of four hundred thousand dollars, for Revolutionary pensions, that is placed in 1838 under the military head of expenditure. This mode of contrast is erroneous, although, of course, it does not affect the grand total. I have, therefore, selected some items in the civil list, which has been referred to as being directly under the personal control of the heads of Departments, and set forth as evidence of Executive patronage, and opportunity for reward to adherents. I have before me a statement of the payments by the Treasurer of the United States in 1828 and 1838, for the clerks and messengers in the offices at Washington.

In the year 1838, there were paid for clerks and messengers in the offices of Secretary of the Treasury, First Comptroller, Second Comptroller, First Auditor, Second Auditor, Third Auditor, Fourth Auditor, Fifth Auditor, Treasurer of the United States, Secretary of War, Secretary of State, and Secretary of the Navy, two hundred and fifteen thousand three hundred and six dollars and seventy-eight cents; and in the same offices in 1828, there were paid for clerks and messengers one hundred and ninety-one thousand eight hundred and fifty-two dollars and ninety-four cents—an increase of between twelve and thirteen per cent. These do not include many of the bureaus, nor any new offices, and are taken for comparison only, because it was supposed the duties corresponded in the respective years of 1828 and 1838.

The expenses of the various Executive Departments have greatly increased in aggregate, because there have been many new duties, which cannot be compared with former expenses, as they were not then required. But I have endeavored to present a fair relative view, where it appeared to me the labor was similar.

No reference is made to the Pension Department, Land Office, or Post Office, although, for the quantity of labor performed, I have no doubt they will well compare with any Administration. But their increase of duty and extent is such, that no proper comparison can be made.

If the Executive be not extravagant, then, as I have said, it is contended the Administration party in Congress is. So far as it is for proper objects, and within the range of constitutional authority, I trust that the Administration party will always make such appropriations as the country needs, and the Executive will take care that the expenditures be economical, and with a strict regard to the public good. It is observable that with all the cry of profligacy, corruption and extravagance, no specific items are pointed out. The Opposition will not come to particulars, for there they are at fault. It is there only, they can impress the people unfavorably. There is no foundation for their charges. They well know that they could effect more by showing an unjustifiable expenditure of a few thousands, than by an undefined clamor about millions, which were necessary, or which were appropriated principally by their own instrumentality.

The different views of the two political parties in relation to the powers of the General Government under the Constitution, are a guarantee to the people, that the Administration party are the most safe against extravagant appropriations. It is a cardinal principle with the Democracy, that a strict and limited construction should be given to that instrument. On the other hand, the views of the Opposition are, that great latitude should be given to the constructive powers conferred by the Constitution; and in some of the cases referred to by my colleague, their votes show what party had been the principal supporters of the measures.

[Mr. CUSHING here remarked that in some of the appropriations named, he had admitted they would have been made, if only the Whigs had voted, and the bill would not have passed if the Administration members only had voted.]

Mr. PARMENTER resumed. There is one particular point connected with this view of the subject, which I will notice. It does does not appear from the record, how many unusual appropriations were prevented; for such as were discussed in Committee of the Whole and not reported, carried no evidence which party supported them; but it is my impression, and I think I shall be borne out by the recollection of the members of the last Congress, that the Administration party generally defeated them.

[Mr. CUSHING rose and adverted to a bill introduced by Mr. GILLET of New York, a friend of the Administration at the Twenty-fourth Congress, for the construction of custom-houses and other purposes, which, added to the ten and a half millions asked for at the same session by the Military Committee for fortifications and similar objects, would be greater than those proposed by the Whigs.]

Mr. PARMENTER. But these bills did not pass. I was not a member of the Twenty-fourth Congress, but I know that, at that time, there was great doubt what should be done with the forty millions of dollars in the Treasury. Many thought it unconstitutional and inexpedient to deposite the money with the States, but all agreed it ought to be disposed of in some way. The bills did not pass, but if they had, it might have been considered as arising from necessity as being the least evil. The state of the Treasury at that time placed the Twenty-fourth Congress in a peculiar position; and even if they had gone far, much farther than they did, in objects of expenditure, I should not consider it as evincing any views of general policy, or as a rule of action recognised by the friends of the Administration.

But I omit going more into detail, as I have said the Opposition avow, and act upon, a more latitudinarian construction of the Constitution, and therefore they have no constitutional obstacle to encounter, in spending the money of the nation. They are, and have been, with the exception of the year 1838, for several years past, in a minority, and without attributing to them a desire to make political capital, as it is called, to a greater extent than what belongs to a party out of power, which is striving to get into power, it is natural for them to fall into the support of sectional measures, the adoption of which, by their strength, would add to the popularity of their party, and the rejection of which, by the party in power, would sometimes lessen the popularity of the Administration. Their support, added to the votes of the members of both parties, whose constituents are immediately interested, will often make a majority. This, I think, has been the policy, generally, of the Opposition. I am certain, since I have been here, it is so. They feel that the responsibility is on the Administration, or party in power. If the measure be rejected, they are complained of. If adopted, they can cry aloud about the extravagance of the Administration. I attribute to no man, or party, corrupt or unconscientious motives; I only speak of the natural course of parties.

But the friends of the Administration have not been content with their votes and arguments on the floor, on these points. The whole subject had been pressed upon the attention of this House by the Committee of Ways and Means, through their chairman, (Mr. CAMBRELENG) from which I shall read a few extracts, for the purpose of refreshing our minds, of doing justice to the committee of the last Congress, and of explaining, in a condensed view, the grounds and causes of increased expenses of the Government—and show where the deviations have been made, and upon what grounds.

The Committee of Ways and Means say, in their report of January 24, 1829, by their chairman, Mr. Cambreleng, who, as the organ of the Democracy of the House, examined the whole subject of national expenditure very fully, and I have no doubt the important principles laid down have been instrumental in introducing a healthy feeling in relation to national expenses. In relation to our Indian concerns, the report says:

"Before noticing the permanent expenditures of the Government, it is proper to advert to those of an occasional or temporary character, which have very largely and unavoidably increased the amount of our annual appropriations for a few years past; these are in the Indian branch of the public service. The expenditures for Indian lands and wars have amounted, within a few years past, to about fifty milions of dollars. The purchase of their lands, and the removal of the Indians beyond the Mississippi, were unavoidably connected with the settlement of the country, however it might affect the various tribes. It is satisfactory to know that their condition has been ameliorated by removal. The addition of thirteen new States to the Union, embracing within their boundaries most of these tribes, made it necessary, especially in latter years, to purchase their lands in order to advance civilization; to remove obvious obstructions to the settlement and cultivation of the country; to prevent collision, and to preserve the lives and property of the inhabitants of our States and Territories from Indian depredations. These purchases have also been founded, almost exclusively, upon compacts formed with some States more than thirty years ago, on our implied obligation to other States; and on resolutions and appropriations by both Houses of Congress, extending through every Administration of the Government. They were, moreover, justifiable on mere financial grounds. By referring to the documents annexed, it will be seen that we have acquired by Indian treaties, since the 4th of March, 1829, about one hundred and ten millions of acres. There now remain, of unbought Indian lands, less than thirty-five millions of acres. No extraordinary expenditure can, therefore, be hereafter anticipated for this object; nor is it probable that there will be such extravagant demands upon the Treasury for Indian wars, owing to the removal of almost all the tribes, and to a change in the plan of operations in Florida, but principally to the recent increase of the army. One-half of the amount expended in these wars has undoubtedly arisen from the extraordinary expenses arising from suddenly calling into the field numerous bodies of militia and volunteers, which we were obliged to do in consequence of the inadequate force of the regular army. The increase of that force will enable Government, in some degree, to dispense with these calls in future; and many millions in our annual expenditures will be saved by preventing Indian depredations, and promptly suppressing them when they may occur."

Again, referring to the Judiciary and foreign intercourse, the necessary increase is explained in the report:

"The expenses of the Judiciary in the first ten years after specific appropriations were made, did not amount to more than about $61,000 annually; the appropriation for 1838 was $484,000. The increased expenses for the salaries of judges has not been beyond what might have been anticipated. The expense, however, of the courts of the United States has increased from about $30,000 to $342,000, which is the estimate for the present year."

I will now offer the remarks of the committee on another branch of national expenditure—pensions—where there has been a great increase, in some respects on erroneous principles, but where great justice is done to the claims of those who suffered from the war of the Revolution, and who sacrificed so much in obtaining our independence:

"For the first six-and-twenty years the average amount annually paid for pensions was less than $84,000. As late as 1814 it was about $90,000, and in 1815 less than $70,000. The late war added about $200,000 for invalids, and the widows or children of those who had died of wounds received in battle. The whole pension roll of the United States arising from the Revolutionary, Indian, and British wars, did not then exceed $300,000 annually. The appropriations for pensions in the present year amount to $2,500,000; to which are to be added the permanent appropriation of $1,000,000, and unexpended appropriations amounting to $741,000, making an aggregate for pensions in 1839 of $4,241,000; and we have now charged upon the public Treasury 42,500 pensioners. A bill was passed at the last session, without debate, and approved on the last day of the session, which draws from the Treasury in the present year $1,372,000; and there are three general pension bills now pending in the House, which would, if adopted, probably double the annual amount appropriated for pensions.

"This result, and in so short a period, could not have been anticipated by the framers of our Constitution. The claims of our Revolutionary soldiers rested on peculiar grounds. Their services and sufferings were of an extraordinary character, and we had from necessity been compelled to violate our contracts with them. In their case, we were warranted in departing from ordinary usage, when our means were ample to indemnify them. Pensions to invalids, and to the widows or children of those who are killed, or who die of wounds received in battle, form a part of the contract, where such laws exist, between the Government and the soldier. But in granting pensions, as we have done, in cases where the soldier was neither killed nor wounded in battle, we violated the pension principle, and charged the public Treasury with half pay to the representatives of all who enlist in the service of Government, whether in peace or in war, in addition to the compensation stipulated for their services. Prior to 1836, there was no departure from the ordinary pension rules except as to Revolutionary soldiers."

The report, in another part, takes up the subject of roads, canals, and harbors, showing, however useful for the part of country immediately benefited, that, if carried on in the manner which the Whig party contend the Constitution justifies, would lead to endless expenditure. The report goes back to the first legislation on that subject, which was during the administration of Mr. John Q. Adams, and says:

"For the first time in the history of our legislation, an act was passed on the 20th of May, 1826, 'for improving certain harbors, and the navigation of certain rivers and creeks; and for authorizing surveys to be made of certain bays, sounds, and rivers, therein mentioned.' On the 2d of March, 1827, this was followed by a regular annual bill, 'to authorize the improving of certain harbors, the building of piers, and for other purposes.' These expenditures immediately increased, in 1827, to $92 500; in 1828, to $121,000; and in 1829, to $505,000. In 1838, the appropriations were more than a million and a half, and the estimates for 1839 amount to $1,713,000.

"The aggregate amount already appropriated for these works is $8,919,043 66, besides canal stocks, and the debt assumed for the corporations of this District for investments in the same, amounting to $3,383,490; making an aggregate of $12,302,533 66. The estimates for completing some of these works amount to $4,650,842 21; but, judging by our experience as to former estimates, it will more probably require ten millions, besides the cost of some of the most expensive works, for which there are no estimates at all."

Further to show the character of these local appropriations, we were told that,

"After an experiment of thirteen years on the 103 works for which appropriations have been made, the following is the result:

Never commenced	3
Abandoned	1
Suspended	4
May perhaps be completed with existing appropriations	14
Completed	20
Not completed	61
Total	103

"Some of the works have been built over twice, and the twenty completed cost but $409,178 25; leaving all the expensive works yet to be finished, and at an expense which cannot even be estimated."

There cannot be a doubt that, in some instances, the appropriations referred to, have been for works of national concern, but they have been mostly for objects beneficial to small communities—particular sections. They are, also, very unequal, and lead to much dissatisfaction. They tend, also, to the neglect of the general and more important interests and defences of the whole country. And this is not the only instance in which efforts have been made by the Democracy to check these unequal and improper appropriations. Scarcely has the subject been discussed when Congress has not been warned by prominent members of the Democratic party against this unequal and unjust expenditure of the national treasure.

If any have been sustained by a portion of the friends of the Administration, they have always discriminated between those which they considered strictly of a national character, and those of a more limited interest; or, as in some cases of importance, they have viewed them with favor from an impression that it was the fulfilment of a compact, the payment of an obligation by which the United States were bound. This obligation is denied by some, and I only mention it to show that none of these local appropriations are defended by the Democracy on the ground of constitutional right to make local improvements, at the expense of the whole country.

Constitutionality of appropriation, economy in expenditure, and a simple and secure mode of managing the public moneys, are favorite points with the Democratic party. They wish no patronage for party or personal benefit. We have been, indeed, denominated the "spoils party," as a term of reproach; but what is the fact? In an examination last year by the gentleman from Ohio, it was found that, in fourteen offices in the Executive branch of this Government, out of 374 officers, 193 were Federalists, with an annual compensation of $269,065; and 181 Democrats, with $239,140.

I hold it to be a sound doctrine that the Administration should prefer its friends, not to the extent, however, of proscription. But so great has been the forbearance of the Executive with respect to these officers, it has by some of our own party been considered almost too liberal. It has been the uniform custom of the Federal party, when they have gained the ascendency, to make a thorough sweep. New York, Pennsylvania, and Maryland, have been particularly spoken of, for in some of these States hundreds, from the highest to the lowest, have been instantaneously removed. In Massachusetts, my own State, where the Federalists have been many years in power, appointments have always been from their own party, with scarcely an exception. I have here a list of office holders in Massachusetts, which is called the "Blue Book." It contains an account of 830 officers, with pay and emoluments amounting to $226,832, of which 497 are nominated by the Governor, and 243 subordinates. The remainder are chosen by the Legislature. Of the number appointed by the Executive, the Democrats will not exceed half a dozen. No, sir; the Democratic party do not seek "spoils." Their wish is to preserve the liberties and rights of the people, by a faithful attention to the administration of the public concerns, to sustain the Union, by carefully observing the powers and restrictions of the Constitution, to simplify the operations of the financial affairs of the Government, and secure fidelity in public officers by suitable restraint and direction. They disclaim unwarrantable interference with the concerns of the people, but wish to make all constitutional and wholesome laws for their benefit. They cannot, indeed, prevent the evils which arise from overaction in the trading community, from the unnatural state of things which arises from this and other causes, such as the sudden influx upon the capital of the nation, which arose from the borrowing by several of the States of nearly two hundred millions of dollars from foreign nations within a very few years, and which drew labor from its other employments for new enterprises; but want of more capital, and doubts of the productiveness of the various projects, have thrown back much labor, which, until it can find a new source of employment, as it certainly will in a country of as many resources as this, may cause a reduction in the value of labor, the effect of which will spread, to a certain extent, to all the employments of the country, upon the general principle that supply exceeds demand. Although some branches of industry are not affected, as I am informed, navigation, an interest of great importance at the North, is in a very prosperous state, and the high wages of seamen almost unexampled.

The effect of this unnatural state of things upon the revenue of the nation is referred to in the annual reference of the Secretary, as follows:

"Should the States not speedily suspend more of their undertakings, which are unproductive, but, by new loans or otherwise, find means to employ armies of laborers in consuming rather than raising crops, and should prices thus continue in many cases to be unnaturally inflated, as they have been of late years in the face of a contracting currency, the effect of it on our finances will be still more to lessen exports, and consequently the prosperity and revenue of our foreign trade. It will also impede the sale of the public lands by diverting labor from the soil to works which, for some time, must be wholly without profit. Circumstances like those, with the scarcity of money and high rate of interest abroad produced by them and other occurrences, not necessary to be now repeated, have already diminished the income in the present year below what it otherwise would have been, and will probably manifest their power much more in the year to come."

It is indeed idle to attribute to the operations of Government the effects in which itself, or rather its finances, are common sufferers. The evils are rapidly passing away. We shall soon have the gratification of witnessing industry properly rewarded, and with the assistance incidentally afforded to the soundness of the currency by the adoption of the policy of the Administration, we shall witness the nation going on in prosperous and healthy action.

The very great latitude which the debate on this bill has had, will be my apology, if any be necessary, for extending my remarks to some other political questions, as matters which have a bearing on the two great parties who are now contending in the country. If the unlimited scope of the remarks members of the Opposition, during the discussion, have been listened to, and sustained as being warrantable, on the ground that the whole concerns of the nation, past, present, and future, are legitimate subjects of debate at the present time, the comparatively small consumption of time occupied by the members in Congress favorable to the Administration, will not be considered out of place. And it is quite important to show that those opposed to us are not entitled to the claim of being more pure in their political views that we are, because it places in a proper light the authority of their character and influence, which has been, by their own assertion, insisted on as that to which the public should always look, and that upon which the people of the United States could safely rely. Since the adoption of the Constitution, and, indeed, prior to that important event, the people of this country have been divided into two great political parties; the one retaining, to a considerable extent, their British predilections, and doubting the capacity of the people for self government, and hence desirous of introducing aristocratic features into the Constitution and making it too powerful for the great body the people to enjoy political powers. The other in favor of a Government of the people, as we now have it, contending that they are the legitimate source of authority. The first have been long known as the Federal, the other as the Democratic, party.

The Federalists have always supposed the public could be amused by names. Knowing that the people of this country felt the importance of a new Constitution, they took the name of Federalists to indicate an attachment to the Constitution; but the Constitution they wanted, was one without its Democratic provisions, and it was owing to the efforts of the Democracy of that day, that the important modifications and amendments were made, securing religious toleration, preserving liberty of speech, and the press, with other essential privileges, for the great mass of the community; and without which, the Constitution would have been an instrument of oppression, instead of, as it now is, a shield of protection.

The character and principles of the Federal party are matters of history, and the name, notwithstanding its asserted origin, and the assumption that it simply meant a friend of the national compact, soon became odious, on account of the objectionable political tenets of the party which had taken it, and the name has been changed from time to time, until at the present day, the old Federalists call themselves Whigs, an appellation associated with the patriotism and self-devotedness of the heroes of the Revolution, but which has all ready, by its present use, become so undesirable, that it is, in many parts of the country, abandoned, and attemps are made to take the name of Democrat; which course, however objectionable in other respects, is an involuntary recognition of the correctness and popularity of the principles of our party.

But the Democracy of the country has not contented itself with maintaining the principle of equal rights, upon which our Government is based. It has not been satisfied with securing to the people all the benefits which flow from its institutions, in making our country, in practice as well as theory, one of free principles, for the enjoyment of our blessings at home, in the exercise of our political privileges; but it has always been ready to maintain our national rights, to assert the high character of the nation in its standing with foreign powers. Has the Federal party ever shown that determination? What was their course during the last war with Great Britain? Did they not throw every embarrassment in the way of the Government when it was contending to preserve the honor of our flag, and to defend the sacred rights of our seamen, who were thrown by thousands into the "floating dungeons" of England? There they were compelled to fight against nations in amity with their own, besides being torn from all that was dear to them—parents, wives, children, friends, and perhaps compelled, during the contest, to fight against their own countrymen. But more: I well remember the painful and heartrending accounts which were daily given of the butcheries of the then new settled West by the merciless savages; and yet the Federalists continued every effort to paralyze the Government by discouraging loans, dissuading from enlistments in our armies and navy, opposing in every manner, and interposing in every way, obstacles to a successful termination of the mighty contest. What was their motive? The leading men were, it is supposed, in part influenced by their attachment to the principles of another Government. Those who were opposed to the principles of our own, anticipated its downfall. They were willing to see their country humbled, if Democracy should fall. But, sir, the nation went through the struggle triumphantly. The foreign enemy was beaten, the domestic foe retired to his lair to await another opportunity for attack, and for demonstration that a Democratic Government contains within itself the seeds of dissolution, and that the great mass of the people have not the intelligence and virtue requisite for their own government. I make not these remarks for mere declamation. I ask every one to look calmly and soberly at the facts, and decide whether the Whigs of the present day are not, like the Federalists of former days, composed of those who want laws for their own benefit, or who fancy themselves superior to their fellow men, and the Democracy, on the other hand, composed of the independent, unambitious, and industrious portion of the country.

But the opposition to the Government existed, to a great degree, among those who called most loudly on the Government for interposition in their favor. Their language was urgent, and their calls loud on the Government. In the winter of 1805 and 1806, the merchants of all the principal seaports in the U. States—New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Boston, and many other places of extensive foreign commerce, memorialized Congress, and declared that Great Britain was endeavoring to establish principles that would totally prostrate the trade of the United States; that if her pretensions were recognised, it would be an abandonment of our rights, and a desertion of the great commercial interests of our country; and that reason, justice, and patriotism required that the United States should oppose these pretensions, as unsound in principle, and offensive in practice, and that the Government should take immediate and prompt measures to force our commerce, assert our rights, and vindicate the honor and dignity of the country. It would consume too much of the time of the committee if I should read these various memorials, or even extracts from them. They are signed by many men who were afterwards among the most bitter enemies of the administration of Mr. Madison.

But, sir, in addition to the general hostility of the Federal party to the National Government, there was a strongly marked proceeding in the section of the country from which I come; and, as we are called upon to renounce our attachment to the present National Executive, who is represented, untruly, as hostile to the interests of the nation, it is proper to endeavor to ascertain what claims those have upon us who urge this course. I will call the attention of the committee to some of the acts of the Federal party of that day, which I consider, and shall say a few words to prove, was the same which has come down, through its various names, to the Whig party of the present day; and if I should have occasion to allude to any gentleman, I desire it to be understood, my intention is to avoid every thing personal, and that I speak only in reference to the political views and course of any one to whom I may refer.

A few days since, I saw in the public prints a copy of a circular, signed by one of my colleagues, [Mr. SALTONSTALL,] in conjunction with some other gentlemen. It it addressed to individual members of the Whig party, and is as follows:

"WASHINGTON, January 24, 1840.

"SIR: The undersigned, an Executive Committee, appointed by the Opposition members of Congress, have taken the liberty of appointing you an executive and corresponding committee for your county, and we have the honor of enclosing a prospectus for the Madisonian. We recommned that paper to the confidence and support of the opponents of the Administration throughout the country. The committee attach much importance to a general circulation of the Madisonian, and other political pamphlets, calculated to enlighten the public mind. The subscribers which you may procure (and we doubt not, considering the cheapness and ability of the paper, they will be many) will be entitled, gratis, to all such pamphlets.

We have confidence that it will afford you pleasure to aid us in our efforts to rescue the Administration of the Government from the hands of the present imbecile and corrupt incumbents. With the aid of an honest and fearless press, these efforts, we trust, will be successful. We are aware that the acceptance of this appointment may subject you to some sacrifice: your patriotism is a sufficient guarantee that it will be borne with cheerfulness. The consideration that we are in the service of an injured and crushed people, should animate us in the use of every honorable exertion to effect the common object in view—THE RESTORATION OF THE GOVERNMENT TO THE DAYS OF HER PATRIOT PRESIDENTS.

Your obedient servants,

R. Garland, La.	Leverett Saltonstall, Ms.
Jno. Bell, Tenn.	Truman Smith, Conn.
J. M. Botts, Va.	Chas. Naylor, Penn.
Thos. Corwin, Ohio,	J. C. Clarke, N. Y.
M. H. Grinnell, N. Y.	Committee."

The people of the country are called upon, by my colleague, to restore the Government to the days of her "patriot Presidents."

I should be pleased to know whom my colleague considers "her patriot Presidents" I do not suppose he is so far advanced in life as to have taken an active part in the early, and perhaps not in the latter, part of Mr. Jefferson's administration. If so, he belonged to a party opposed to him. So far as Mr. Monroe was opposed by party, I believe him to have been in the Opposition. He has certainly been opposed to General Jackson and Mr. Van Buren, and I will endeavor to show his opposition to the administration of Mr. Madison; and for that purpose I will here read a memorandum I hold in my hand. It is this:

"At the extra session of the Massachusetts Legislature in October, 1814, Governor Strong's message was referred to a select committee, consisting of the following members: Messrs. OTIS, BEMIS, and WOOD, of the Senate; Messrs. SULLIVAN, SALTONSTALL, LINCOLN, and WHITMAN, of the House of Representatives; which committee, on the 8th of October, reported in favor of calling the HARTFORD CONVENTION."

The majority of the committee, being Federalists, who were in favor, were Messrs. OTIS, WOOD, SULLIVAN, SALTONSTALL, and WHITMAN. The minority, being Democrats opposed to the convention, were Messrs. BEMIS and LINCOLN.

[Mr. SALTONSTALL here interrupted Mr. PARMENTER, and observed, as his name had been brought before the committee, he hoped his colleague would repeat what he had said in relation to him.]

Mr. PARMENTER repeated in substance, and then proceeded.

The character of this Convention is, I believe, well understood in the country, but as it is a quarter of a century since its occurrence, I shall offer a few authentic documents on the subject. I would however remark, that during the whole time of that war, although it bore heavily upon the great interests of New England, and Massachusetts in particular, and they were desirous of a termination of the war, yet they would never have tolerated treasonable action, or measures leading to a dissolution of the Union, if the avowal had been distinctly made. They were always sound, and contributed as many individuals to fill our armies and man our navy, as any State in the Union. The overheated partisans, and those who were ready to break down our institutions—those who who were blinded by their British attachments, were obliged to disavow bad intentions. I recollect well, sir, that great were the misgivings of many who sustained the Federal party, but they were lulled by outside appearances and positive assurances. But I will not comment myself—I lived on the spot and was old enough to be an observer, and knew my own impressions as they then existed. And although I could readily quote many expressions which escaped the violent of that time, I will offer only such official documents as may be proper to remind us of the event. The character of the Hartford Convention is marked with an indelible brand. And when one of its principal originators calls upon us to abandon our political partialities, and tells us about "the restoration of the Government to the days of her patriot Presidents," we have a right, however much may be our feeling of personal regard, to present his political character to view.

As I remarked, I shall only offer public documents. I will not quote the speeches of leading men, which might be offered in abundance. The report recommending a choice of delegates to a convention, which, being joined by other States, constituted the Hartford Convention, and is from the committee of which my colleague was a member, thus concludes:

"It is therefore with great concern that your committee are obliged to declare their conviction, that the Constitution of the United States, under the administration of the persons in power, has failed to secure to this Commonwealth, and, as they believe, to the Eastern section of this Union, those equal rights and benefits which were the great objects of its formation, and which they cannot relinquish, without ruin to themselves and posterity. These grievances justify and require vigorous, persevering, and peaceable exertions, to unite those who realize the sufferings, and foresee the dangers of the country, in some system of measures to obtain relief, FOR WHICH THE ORDINARY MODE OF PROCURING AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION, AFFORDS NO REASONABLE EXPECTATION, IN SEASON TO PREVENT THE COMPLETION OF ITS RUIN. THE PEOPLE, HOWEVER, POSSESS THE MEANS OF CERTAIN REDRESS; AND WHEN THEIR SAFETY, WHICH IS THE SUPREME LAW, IS IN QUESTION, THESE MEANS SHOULD BE PROMPTLY APPLIED. The framers of the Constitution made provisions to amend defects which were known to be incidental to every human institution, and the provision itself was not less liable to be found defective upon experiment, than other parts of the instrument. When this deficiency becomes apparent, no reason can preclude the right of the whole people who were parties to it to adopt another; and it is not a presumptuous expectation, that a spirit of equity and justice, enlightened by experience, would enable them to reconcile conflicting interests, and obviate the principal cause of those dissensions, which unfit Government for a state of peace and of war, and so to amend the Constitution, as to give vigor and duration to the union of the States. But as a proposition for such a convention from a single State, would probably be unsuccessful, and our danger admits not of delay, it is recommended by the committee, that in the first instance, a conference should be invited between those States, the affinity of whose interests is closest, and whose habits of intercourse, from their local situation and other causes, are most frequent, to the end that by a comparison of their sentiments and views, some mode of defence, suited to the circumstances and exigencies of those States, and measures for accelerating the return of public prosperity may be devised; and also to enable the delegates from those States, should they deem it expedient, to lay the foundation for a radical reform in the national compact, by inviting to a future convention a deputation from all the States in the Union."

This report concluded with several resolutions, breathing the same spirit, and recommending the choice of twelve delegates, who were chosen by 215 votes, in a convention of both Houses of the Massachusetts Legislature, which consisted of nearly 500 members. The Democrats declined voting, and probably some Federalists, who had not confidence in the patriotism of the project. For I deny that the great body of the Federal party among the people would have sustained disaffected and disloyal proceedings, leading to a severance of the Union, and a separate peace with the enemy, although they were ready to support their aristocratic views of Government, and were always ready to maintain the obnoxious political principles which have always been held by that party.

I need hardly dwell upon the point that, so far as treasonable views might exist—that so far as a wish to dissolve the Union might be entertained, they could have met with no response from a people around whose name clustered the most renowned reminiscenses of the Revolutionary contest. In that State are the battle grounds of Bunker Hill, Lexington, and Concord; all of them, I may be allowed to add, within the district I have the honor to represent on this floor. It was owing to the stubborn patriotism of the great body of the population of Massachusetts, in the opinion of many, that the schemes of those, whose fidelity to the Constitution and union of the States was doubted, were never carried into effect. The projectors of the Hartford Convention, and its kindred measures, were supported for their Federalism, as opposed to Democracy, not for their plots against the Union. They always declared their dread of a separation of the States, while they were recommending measures tending to bring about the dreadful event. A dissolution of the Union, if it came, was to come in disguise. Events were to be brought about indirectly, by which the sad result could not be controlled.

The Hartford Convention, under date of January 4, 1815, prepared a long report, from which it would be useful to present long extracts: but I will not offer them to the committee, but confine myself to the resolutions with which the report concludes:

Resolved, That it be, and hereby is, recommended to the Legislatures of the several States represented in this convention, to adopt all such measures as may be necessary effectually to protect the citizens of said States from the operation and effects of all acts which have been or may be passed by the Congress of the United States, which shall contain provisions, subjecting the militia or other citizens to forcible drafts, conscriptions, or impressments, not authorized by the Constitution of the United States.

"Resolved, That it be, and hereby is, recommended to the said Legislatures, to authorize an immediate and earnest application to be made to the Government of the United States, requesting their consent to some arrangement, whereby the said States may, separately or in concert, be empowered to assume upon themselves the defence of their territory against the enemy; and a reasonable portion of the taxes collected within said States, may be paid into the respective treasuries thereof, and appropriated to the payment of the balance due said States, and to the future defence of the same. The amount so paid into the said treasuries to be credited, and the disbursements made as aforesaid, to be charged to the United States.

"Resolved, That it be, and it hereby is, recommended to the Legislatures of the aforesaid States, to pass laws (where it has not already been done) authorising the Governors or Commanders in Chief of their militia to make detachments from the same, or to form voluntary corps, as shall be most convenient and conformable to their Constitutions, and to cause the same to be well armed, equipped and disciplined, and held in readiness for service; and upon the request of the Governor of either of the other States, to employ the whole of such detachment or corps, as well as the regular forces of the State, or such part thereof as may be required and can be spared consistently with the safety of the State, in assisting the State making such request, to repel any invasion thereof which shall be made or attempted by the public enemy.

"Resolved, That the following amendments of the Constitution of the United States, be recommended to the States represented as aforesaid, to be proposed by them for adoption by the State Legislatures, and, in such cases as may be deemed expedient, by a convention chosen by the people of each State.

"And it is further recommended that the said States shall persevere in their efforts to obtain such amendments, until the same be effected.

"First. Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned among the several States which may be included within this Union, according to their respective numbers of free persons, including those bound to serve for a term of years, and excluding Indians not taxed and all other persons.

"Second. No new State shall be admitted into the Union by Congress in virtue of the power granted by the Constitution, without the concurrence of two-thirds of both Houses.

"Third. Congress shall not have power to lay any embargo on the ships or vessels of the citizens of the United States, in the ports or harbors thereof, for more than 60 days.

"Fourth. Congress shall not have power, without the concurrence of two-thirds of both Houses, to interdict the commercial intercourse between the United States and any foreign nation or the dependencies thereof.

"Fifth. Congress shall not make or declare war, or authorize acts of hostility against any foreign nation, without the concurrence of two-thirds of both Houses, except such acts of hostility be in defence of the tereitories of the United States, when actually invaded.

"Sixth. No person who shall hereafter be naturalized, shall be eligible as a member of the Senate or House of Representatives of the United States, nor capable of holding any civil office under the authority of the United States.

"Seventh. The same person shall not be elected President of the United States a second time; nor shall the President be elected from the same State two terms in succession.

"Resolved, That if the application of these States to the Government of the United States, recommended in a foregoing resolution, should be unsuccessful, and peace should not be concluded, and the defence of these States should be neglected, as it has been since the war, it will, in the opinion of this convention, be expedient for the Legislatures of the several States TO APPOINT DELEGATES TO ANOTHER CONVENTION, TO MEET AT BOSTON, IN THE STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS, ON THE THIRD THURSDAY OF JUNE NEXT, WITH SUCH POWERS AND INSTRUCTIONS AS THE EXIGENCY OF A CRISIS SO MOMENTOUS MAY REQUIRE.

"Resolved, That the Hon. George Cabot, the Hon. Chauncey Goodrich, and the Hon. Daniel Lyman, or any two of them, be authorized to call another meeting of this convention, to be holden in Boston, at any time before new delegates shall be chosen, as recommended in the above resolution, if in their judgment the situation of the country shall urgently require it.

"HARTFORD, Jan. 4, 1815."

I will, however, read two short extracts from the report of the convention in relation to the two first proposed amendments:

"The first amendment proposed, relates to the apportionment of Representatives among the slave-holding States. This cannot be claimed as a right. These States are entitled to the slave representation, by a constitutional compact. It is therefore merely a subject of agreement, which should be conducted upon principles of mutual interest and accommodation, and upon which no sensibility on either side should be permitted to exist. It has proved unjust and unequal in its operation. Had this effect been foreseen, the privileges would probably not have been demanded, certainly not conceded. Its tendency in future will be adverse to that harmony and mutual confidence, which are more conducive to the happiness and prosperity of every confederated State, than a mere preponderance of power, the prolific source of jealousies and controversy, can be to any one of them. The time may therefore arrive, when a sense of magnanimity and justice will reconcile those States to acquiesce in a revision of this article, especially as a fair equivalent would result to them in the apportionment of taxes.

"The next amendment relates to the admission of new States into the Union.

"This amendment is deemed to be highly important, and in fact indispensable. In proposing it, it is not intended to recognise the right of Congress to admit new States without the original limits of the United States, nor is any idea entertained of disturbing the tranquillity of any State already admitted into the Union. The object is merely to restrain the constitutional power of Congress in admitting new States. At the adoption of the Constitution, a certain balance of power among the original parties was considered to exist; and there was at that time, and yet is, among these parties, a strong affinity between their great and general interests. By the admission of these States, that balance has been materially affected, and unless the practice be modified, must ultimately be destroyed. The Southern States will first avail themselves of their new confederates to govern the East; and finally the Western States, multiplied in number, and augmented in population, will control the interests of the whole. Thus, for the sake of present power, the Southern States will be common sufferers with the East, in the loss of permanent advantages. None of the old States can find an interest in creating prematurely an overwhelming Western influence, which may hereafter discern (as it has heretofore) benefits to be derived to them by wars and commercial restrictions."

If my colleague should consider these the views of former "patriot Presidents," I do not believe he will meet the assent of the people in any section of the country. It ought to be borne in mind that these proceedings were within a few months after the destruction, by the enemy, of the public buildings and property in the capital; of the attack upon our neighboring city of Baltimore; and when the cruelty and ravages of the enemy were at thei rheight.

To show how this convention was characterized, I must ask the attention of the committee to an extract from a protest, which was probably prepared by my colleague from the Worcester district, who sits directly before me, but who is now absent, [Mr. LINCOLN.*] Whether prepared by him or not, his name appears as the first signer, and at that day he stood high in the ranks of the Democratic party, and he and myself were of the same political school. One of us must have changed, as we are now opposed. I shall show in a few words, before I take my seat, that the change is with him, and most conclusively, so far as this Hartford Convention is concerned. The protest signed by Levi Lincoln and others, concludes thus:

"Against the resolution proposing a convention of delegates from the New England States, and the resolutions connected therewith, the undersigned feel bound, by every dictate of duty, and every suggestion of patriotism, most earnestly to remonstrate. To these resolutions they have opposed the utmost of their own reason, the language of the Constitution, and the solemn and warning admonitions of Washington. However disguised or designed, the obvious tendency of propositions for a partial conference by delegates from some States, without participation or consultation with other States, is to prepare the way for a separation and division of the Union. The suggestion of a peculiar interest in the States of New England, upon subjects of public grievance, is predicated upon the idea that this nation has not a community of objects, and is not connected by a similarity of obligations. The Constitution of the United States has prohibited, in express terms, 'one State from entering into any agreement or compact with another,' without the consent of Congress. If, as the result of the conference of delegates on the part of New England, a compact for any purpose is intended, the proposition for such conference is as gross an infringement of the Constitution as would be the compact, when made. It cannot be admissible to pursue means to an end which it is wrong and illegal to attain.

"Nor is there just pretence of necessity for this measure. The framers of the Constitution wisely provided for its amendment. Should abuses exist, growing out of supposed defects of the instrument, the mode of reform is definitely prescribed; and if, in this way, they are not to be corrected, neither can they in any other, short of a change in the form of Government. It is not to be supposed that the States of the Union will yield to the dictates of a convention what they would refuse to the constitutional application of the Legislature. The undersigned, therefore, cannot disguise their apprehension that more must be designed than is distinctly avowed. The reasoning of the report is supported by the alarming assumption that the Constitution has failed in its objects, and the people of Massachusetts are absolved from their allegiance, and are at liberty to adopt another. In debate, it has been reiterated that the Constitution is no longer to be respected, and that revolution is not to be deprecated. The bond of our political union is thus attempted to be severed; and, in a state of war and common danger, we are advised to the mad expedient of abandoning that protection which the combined energies of the nation might afford, for the selfish enjoyment of our present, though partial, resources. The resolutions of our Legislature, it is to be feared, will be viewed by other States as productive of this consequence, that Massachusetts shall govern the Administration, or the Government shall not be administered in Massachusetts. Jealousy and contention will ensue. The Constitution, hitherto respected as the ark of our political safety, will be violated and destroyed, and in civil dissensions and convulsions, our independence will be annihilated, and our country reduced to the condition of vanquished and tributary colonies to a haughty and implacable foreign foe.'

In order to show that the Hartford Convention party of the days of the war were similar to the Whigs of the present, and that as a party they are the same in principle, I will mention the names of all of them; and I express my decided conviction, and state my firm belief, that every one who is now alive is of the Whig party, and every one who has deceased, died in that political faith, under some one of its numerous names. There are gentlemen here from all the New England States, who can correct me if I should be in error. They were, from

* Mr. LINCOLN has since informed me he was the author.

I regret alluding at all to my colleague, [Mr. LINCOLN,] but his connection with the documents I have offered made it indispensable; as he and my other colleague [Mr. SALTONSTALL] belong now to the same party, but were then opposed to each other. It is more to explain my own position, and that of the Democratic party, than to refer to my colleague, [Mr. LINCOLN,] that I have shown that the party with which he now acts are in principle the same which he opposed during the British war. I take no isolated cases, but the entire body who assembled at Hartford, without excepting an individual. I wish again to repeat, that the people of Massachusetts were sound in their attachment to the Union, and the cause of their country. The war bore heavily and severely, but they would never abandon their country. Had the projectors of the Hartford Convention openly avowed those intentions, which the judgment of the country has attributed to them, they would have been met in Massachusetts by the most stern rebuke. They never, in official acts, indicated a determination to proceed to extremities, yet many, even among their own party, saw danger. As we have seen by the documents, the whole Democratic party in New England denounced them. The Democracy of the nation was alarmed. The stain which the Senate had cast upon the State, by the resolution that it was unbecoming and immoral to rejoice at the victories of our own countrymen, aroused their feelings, and it has been indignantly blotted out and EXPUNGED. It was on the 15th of June, 1813, it adopted the following preamble and resolution, proposed by the Hon. JOSIAH QUINCY, a leading Federalist:

"Whereas, a proposition has been made to the Senate for the adoption of sundry resolutions, expressive of their sense of the gallantry and good conduct exhibited by James Lawrence, Commander of the United States ship of war Hornet, and the officers and crew of that ship in the destruction of his Britannic Majesty's ship the Peacock. And whereas it has been found that former resolutions of this kind passed on similar occasions relative to other officers engaged in a like service, have given great discontent to many of the good people of this Commonwealth, it being considered by them as an encouragement and excitement to the continuance of the present unjust, unnecessary, and iniquitous war; and on this account the Senate of Massachusetts have deemed it their duty to refrain from acting on the said proposition; and also, whereas this determination of the Senate may, without explanation, be misconstrued into an intentional slight of Captain Lawrence, and a denial of his particular merits, the Senate therefore deem it their duty to declare that they have a high sense of the naval skill and military and civil virtues of Capt. James Lawrence, and that they have been withheld from acting on said proposition solely from considerations relative to the nature and principle of the war, and to the end that all misapprehension on the subject may be obviated, Resolved, As the sense of the Senate of Massachusetts, that in a war like the present, waged without justifiable cause, and prosecuted in a manner which indicates that conquest and ambition are its real motive, IT IS NOT BECOMING A MORAL AND RELIGIOUS PEOPLE TO EXPRESS ANY APPROBATION OF MILITARY OR NAVAL EXPLOITS, WHICH ARE NOT IMMEDIATELY CONNECTED WITH THE DEFENCE OF OUR SEA COAST AND SOIL."

The popular branch of the Legislature did not concur in this resolution.

The people of Massachusetts never rested easy under this objectionable vote; and it was perhaps one of the most powerful inducements to the political change which took place in 1823, in which which year the Democrats triumphed, and one of their most important acts was the passage of the following preamble and resolution:

A resolution offered by the Hon. Mr. Sprague, the 17th instant, in the words following:

Whereas a certain resolve passed the Senate of this Commonwealth on the 15th day of June A. D. 1813, relating to the capture of his Britannic Majesty's ship Peacock by the United States ship Hornet, commanded by the late brave and patriotic Captain James Lawrence, in the words following, to wit: [Here follows the resolution.]

And whereas, said resolution adopted at a time of extraordinary political excitement, is predicated upon an erroneous estimate of the nature and character of the late war between the United States and Great Britain; and whereas the same involves and asserts principles unsound in policy, and dangerous and alarming in tendency, WHEREFORE, that it may not hereafter be considered as expressing the deliberate sense of the Senate and people of this Commonwealth, at this time of uncommon political tranquillity,

"RESOLVED, THAT THE RESOLVE AFORESAID OF THE FIFTEENTH DAY OF JUNE, A. D. 1813, AND THE PREAMBLE THEREOF, BE AND THE SAME ARE HEREBY EXPUNGED FROM THE JOURNALS OF THE SENATE.

"The yeas and nays having been required on the adoption of the above preamble and resolution, were as follows:

"YEAS—Hon. Messrs. Sprague, Ruggles, Austin, Hodges, Thaxter, Allen, Cranston, Fowler, Prince, Leland, Dimmick, Wade, Wingate, Parrott, Fiske, Mason, Hull, Keyes, Richardson, Winthrop, Noyes, Mills—22.

"NAYS—Hon. Messrs. Perkins, Brooks, Adams, Gardner, Hoyt, Longley, Tufts, Gorham, Jones, Starkweather, L. Strong, S. Strong, jr. Denny, Hubbard, Mitchell—15.

"So the resolution was accepted and passed."

I know it has been said that many who were Federalists in former years are friends of the Administration now; and that many who are Whigs now, were Democrats then. Undoubtedly. But that indicates merely a change of sentiment with individuals, not an alteration of the principles of a party. I have, in support of my position, that the Whigs now are what the Federalists were in 1812, given you the names of the prominent men who composed the Hartford Convention; I have taken the whole organized body as it then existed, and brought it to the test. No one has doubted or disputed the correctness of my statement. Changes in politics are often conspicuous and sudden. I have accidentally before me an evidence of this, which evinces some very rapid revolutions in sentiment among prominent politicians in my own State. I will read an extract or two from prominent Federal papers of different dates:

From the Northampton Courier.

"The Harrisburg Convention have nominated Gen. Harrison, rather than Mr. Webster, as the Whig candidate for the Presidency. Were it not matter of fact, we should think it a mere burlesque, a caricature, got up for a laugh. We can hardly believe that men of intelligence and discrimination, would act so preposterous, so ridiculously silly. Gen. Harrison, a man of no particular respectability of character, and wholly obscure as to talents, and decidedly insignificant so far as needed abilities are concerned, substituted for Daniel Webster! An individual from the remotest obscurity brought out to stand in the shadow of Jackson's military renown, to catch up a fictitious popularity, by throwing around his name the tinsel glow of military splendor! and Daniel Webster with his gigantic powers of mind and exhaustless attainments, and unimpeachable moral character, put down as an inferior to William Henry Harrison, the 'Hero of Tippecanoe!!' Why, what an insufferable insult to the Whigs! what a scandal and disgrace to our party! Why, literally, we feel ashamed to raise our voice or hold up our head, to meet the merited taunts and ridicule of our opponents. We are overwhelmed with shame at such an exhibition of superlative weakness and political pusillanimity.

"How can the Whigs consistently take up an individual who is put forth by his friends, not from any intrinsic powers of mind or strength of intellect he possesses, but merely because he has thrown around him that odious characteristic of an eminent statesman, military popularity—a feature which the Whigs, from the outset, have severely reprobated in General Jackson. The friend of Mr. Van Buren owe a debt of gratitude to the Pennsylvanians. In no possible way could they have done a more acceptable thing for them. In no way could they have so effectually secured his election, and disgraced and disgusted the Whig party."

[From the Boston Daily Advertiser.]

"If any other man than Henry Clay shall be nominated by the Whig National Convention, the electoral vote of Massachusetts will be given to Martin Van Buren."

"We confess we have some curiosity to learn which of the members of the delegation from this State can claim the honor of having given the vote of the State for a candidate (General Harrison) who, we are well assured, is far from being the choice of the State."

[From the Boston Atlas.]

"An idea has been thrown out by certain papers, which advocate the substitution of a second rate man, (General Harrison,) that Mr. Webster possesses qualifications of too exalted and intellectual an order to make a popular President."

[From the Boston Courier.]

"If General Harrison receives the nomination of the Harrisburg Convention, the electoral vote of Massachusetts will be given to Martin Van Buren."

"The book (Hildreth's Life of General Harrison) is worth reading, though the hero of the story should never be President of the United States."

"A second rate man (General Harrison.") And why do all the party prints from which these extracts are made support him now? Why not sustain Webster or Clay, or some other man of whose talents they boast? The answer is brief. However inefficient and unsuitable as a man, circumstances have made him the best material for the car of the political idol, Federalism, with which they think, vainly, I am sure, to ride over and crush the Democracy of the country. But I will not digress. My two points were to demonstrate, by authentic and indisputable documents in this branch of my remarks, the character of the Hartford Convention and its identity in principle with the Whigs of the present day; to sustain my position that Federalists are Whigs, and Whigs Federalists.

In connection with the Hartford Convention, was the appointment of three commissioners for the professed purpose of asking a separate arrangement for a portion of the States, by which the power of the General Government was to be surrendered, and a part of the national funds to be given up to the States referred to; and this was indeed objectionable, but it was not all that was suspected. An indiscreet partisan proposed to the Legislature "that a committee be appointed to confer with all the New England States, and see if they will agree to appoint a committee to join them and repair to the city of Washington immediately, then and there personally to make known to the President the general opinion of all the New England States, in regard to the present war, and the manner in which it has been conducted, and inform him that he must either resign his office as President, or remove those ministers and other officers of the General Government who have, by their nefarious plans, ruined the nation."

I charge this upon none but the individual who proposed it. I only quote it to show what feeling prevailed with a few. The commissioners appointed were those of the most talented and conspicuous men in the Federal party: Harrison Gray Otis, Thomas H. Perkins, and William Sullivan. Mr. Otis is known as an eminent politician through the whole country. He was a strong Federalist then, is a Whig now. Mr. Perkins is a Boston merchant, of princely fortune, obtained by his intelligence, enterprise, and industry. With a heart full of benevolence and philanthropy, he has contributed most munificently to many humane and haritable institutions; giving to the asylum for the blind his own mansion, worth thirty thousand dollars; an amount which would be considered, in most parts of the country, a large property. Many of that class of our sightless fellow beings will bless his memory long after his political offences are forgotten. He was, however, a strong Federalist then, and is a Whig now. Mr. Sullivan was an ardent politician, and has recently died. I know nothing of his private character, and would say nothing of his political, with any disrespect to his memory. His father was a Democrat, and when that party succeeded in Massachusetts, he was chosen Governor, after a most bitter and severe contest. I have heard an incident related, tending to show that it was supposed he took part in the contest against his father, to an extent beyond what might have been expected from the relation in which he stood.

The commissioners went to Washington, but what they did, I believe has never been a subject of much inquiry. They met, on their journey, the news of the victory at New Orleans, and tidings of peace, which blew up their schemes, whatever they were.

Mr. Chairman, I have extended my remarks much farther than I thought of. I have alluded to the politics of my colleague, not with any personal disrespect, but as he has been selected to be placed at the head of the party opposed to the Administration I support, and calls upon the people to abandon it, and aid in restoring "the Government to the days of former patriot Presidents," I have thought it due to myself, as well as the cause I advocate, coming from a section of the country where the measures I have referred to first sprang into existence, to examine the claims of a party, for whom my colleague is constituted a prominent organ, to be entitled to the right of directing us in our political course, or at least to see how far their own position would require us to yield our opinions to those they entertain.

SPEECH OF MR. JAMESON,

OF MISSOURI.

In the House of Representatives, April 21, 1840.—In Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, on the civil and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. JAMESON rose and said, that he had not intended to have made a speech during the pendency of this bill, until he was induced to do so by the personal remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] towards a Senator from Missouri, [Mr. BENTON.] The gentleman from Pennsylvania had indulged in epithets towards that Senator, which he dared not, nor would not, have done, had that Senator been here, or could he have been here, to have defended himself. And I mention it now, in the outset, as I see that gentleman in his seat, that he may have notice that I will attend to him, especially in relation to that matter, before I take my seat. And having determined, Mr. Chairman, to reply to that gentleman in relation to those personal allusions, in language that could not be misunderstood, I then also came to the conclusion to make some remarks on some of the subjects that had been lugged in the debate during the progress of this bill: and in doing that, Mr. Chairman, it need not be expected that I will touch on the merits of the bill; for that is so unusual, I might, by doing so, be almost considered out of order, as President-making speeches seem now to be the order of the day. For the Opposition seem sensitive about their candidate for the Presidency, and, as if sensible of his unfitness for the station, as he has given no evidence of his qualifications for the same, they attempt by speeches to puff him into a fit and qualified man for that office. But, Mr. Chairman, after all their long harangues here, to manufacture General Harrison into a statesman and a General, they will fail of deceiving and gulling the American people in relation to either; for they understand that matter too well.

The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. STUART,] Mr. Chairman, set out, as he said, to make a speech for home consumption, and to that end he attempted to show that Mr. Van Buren was opposed to the Cumberland road; and also repeated the old, worn out, stale stuff, which has been so often charged, and as often refuted, that Martin Van Buren was opposed to the late war, and a friend of Rufus King; and I will not take up the time of the committee now to reply to that part of the gentleman's speech. It has been again and again proclaimed from the stump, and from the Opposition press; it has been as often answered and refuted. The people understand it well; they have acted on it, and decided it in Mr. Van Buren's favor.

But to the Cumberland road. How does the gentleman undertake to show that Mr. Van Buren is opposed to the Cumberland road? Why, he is opposed to it because the Secretary of the Treasury did not, in his report at this session, make an estimate for an appropriation for that road, and had been in the habit of doing it heretofore. That is the argument, and that is the evidence adduced to show that Mr. Van Buren is opposed to the Cumberland road; and to sustain himself in this charge, the gentleman has referred to the letter of the honorable gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HOPKINS,] who has come to the same conclusion; and, as I presume, from the same facts. But in order to be certain whether the gentleman from Virginia had any more evidence or facts to found his conclusions on than the gentleman from Illinois had, I will ask that gentleman a question. Did you ever converse with Mr. Van Buren on the subject of the Cumberland road; and if so, did he inform you that he was opposed to it; or have you come to the conclusion that Mr. Van Buren was opposed to it, from the same circumstances and facts as those mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois?

[Here Mr. HOPKINS aswered and said that he had never heard Mr. Van Buren say any thing directly or indirectly in relation to the Cumberland road, and that he presumed that he had come to the conclusion that Mr. Van Buren was opposed to that road from the same circumstances and facts that the gentleman from Illinois had.]

Here, then, Mr. Chairman, are the circumstances and facts from which these gentlemen have come to the conclusion that Mr. Van Buren is opposed to the Cumberland road: that is, that the Secretary of the Treasury did not give any estimate, in his report at this session, for that road—and that he had done it heretofore. And that is the whole ground they have for that opinion. Sir, they have only taken a partial view of the facts, and it sometimes, in fact very often, happens that different men come to different conclusions from the same set of facts; then let us take a full view of all the facts connected with this road, so far as Mr. Van Buren has acted in relation to it. And it seems to me that you and I, and the people of the States interested, must come to the conclusion that he is not opposed to the road; as he has given no evidence that he is, but has given strong evidence that he is not. Sir, this same Secretary of the Treasury, under the direction of Mr. Van Buren, did, in his report to the first session of Congress after Mr. Van Buren came to the Presidency, give an estimate for this road; a law passed at that session making an appropriation for it, and was signed and approved by Mr. Van Buren. A similar estimate, by the same Secretary, was made and sent in at the next session, which was the last session of Congress; and Congress, for the first time since the road started, failed in making an appropriation for it; and thereby abandoned the road. Then, Mr. Chairman, who is to blame for the abandonment of this road? Where did it get its death blow? At the hands of the President or of Congress? Sir, it was not at the hands of the President, but of Congress. It was Congress for the first time, at the last session, failed in making an appropriation for it—abandoned it. How, then, could the President have acted in this matter to have escaped the denunciations of the Whig party? If he had recommended it again, by directing estimates to be reported for the same, by the Secretary of the Treasury, after this decisive expression against it by the Legislative department at the last session of Congress, he would have been denounced by the greater portion, if not all, of these same Whig gentlemen, as profligate and extravagant, and as aiming to dictate to Congress after it had decided against this road, rejected and abandoned it.

And although, Mr. Chairman, these Whig gentlemen profess that they have united in one common bond, to put down Executive dictation, power, and patronage, yet many of them, from States not immediately interested in this road, in order to pave the way out of which political capital could be made to operate against the President at the next Presidential election in the States interested in this road, have declared upon this floor that they could not vote to appropriate money to carry on this road, because it had not been recommended by the President; that is, because estimates had not been furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury; and the gentleman from Illinois, in order to follow this lead, and carry out this arrangement, has declared that the President was opposed to this road, and that that opposition was the cause of its failure. Away with such stratagems and artifices, such hollow professions; you cannot deceive the people in the West by attempting to throw such chaff and dust in their eyes; they understand you and your course too well; they will believe that you who have voted against it, would have done so if the Secretary had sent in the estimates; they will believe, and correctly too, that this pretence has been fitted out, and served up for the occasion; they know that you have been raising the "hue and cry" for the last eight or ten years against Executive dictation, and they will not believe you now when you come out and say that you cannot vote an appropriation, because the Executive did not dictate it; they will believe that you have sacrificed this road to electioneering purposes, and that the President has had no hand nor fault in it. The last session of Congress took the responsibility of giving this measure its death blow; and Mr. Van Buren pursued the course of his predecessors, and paid respect to that expression of opinion on the part of Congress: and as Congress took that responsibility, it was their duty to take the responsibility of resuscitating and reviving it. The Executive, then, as in duty bound, will pursue your lead. Then let it be revived by the same hands that killed it; and let us hear no more of this stuff, that we should do nothing, unless the President direct us to do it; this doctrine may suit Whigism, but it does not accord with Democratic principles. But, Mr. Chairman, there is another cause for the downfall of this road—it was first diseased by the action of the Legislature of the State from which the gentleman, [Mr. STUART] came. That body determined that the road should not pass through that State, unless it struck the Mississippi at Alton. It was the entering wedge to its destruction. The friends of it falling out among themselves about its location, weakened it. The enemies of it seized upon this circumstance, and worked its ruin—at least for the present, and I now have but little hopes of it being revived again until forty-three, after the new census is taken, and the apportionment thereon made. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois blew hot, and he blew cold in the same speech. First, that the Executive assumed too much power, and to much dictation; and secondly, that he did not assume enough of either; and in connection with the first branch of his argument, I am led to notice a political doctrine advanced by the gentleman who preceded him—the aged and learned gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL.] That gentleman said "that General Jackson was the first President who had ever advanced the idea that he was the immediate representative of the people, and was responsible to them for his acts, and not to this body." Now, Mr. Chairman, I must beg leave to differ from that gentleman. That doctrine is as old as the Constitution itself; yes, sir, as old as the opinions of Jefferson and Madison, in relation to our frame of government. I had always been taught to believe, that this was a Government of the people—that the people were the sovereigns—that all the officers of the Government were their servants, or agents, appointed to administer the Government and laws for their benefit—that they were responsible and accountable to the people for their acts—and that the three departments of Government, the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial, were created to form balances and checks on each other, and to that end were made independent of each other, but the officers of all three dependent on and responsible to the people for their acts—and that no one department was ever intended to be dependent on, or responsible to, either of the others for its acts, but precisely the reverse. Sir, it is that independence of each other, and responsibility of each to the people, that constitute the beauty and strength of the frame of our Government. It is the corner stone, the arch, the basement, upon which the superstructure is reared. It is that upon which the liberty and freedom of the people rest; and it is that upon which the principle is established, that all power in this Government emanates from, and concentrates in, the people; and this is Gen. Jackson's doctrine: yes; and I will inform the gentleman that it is now, and has been since the formation of the Constitution, the doctrine of the Democracy. He says that the doctrine of the old Federal party was, to add more and more power to the Executive, so, I presume, that it might be enabled to bring the other departments within its control, and thereby destroy the liberties of the people. But now, forsooth, the doctrine is as far on the other extreme: the Executive now must be responsible to the Legislature, instead of the people: any shifts, or new experiments, to overturn Democracy. But Democracy, and the principles of the Democratic party, have been one an ithe same thing, since the formation of the Constitution; that is, to carry out the principles of the Constitution, as intended by its framers; not to permit one Department to encroach, or be dependent, upon another, but to let each perform the duty assigned it by the Constitution, and law made in pursuance thereof, and to hold them all strictly accountable and responsible to the people for their acts.

But if the doctrine of the gentleman be correct, I hope he will no longer complain of the President for not making out an estimate for the Cumberland road. As he is to be responsible to this House for his acts, the House then, as a matter of course, whether the President told them to do it or not, should have taken the responsibility of making the appropriation for the road, and I am in hopes the gentleman from Illinois will also come to the same conclusion, when he looks back to that part of his speech complaining so much of Executive dictation, and not come to the conclusion (for if he does he will find himself mistaken) that the people of Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri, are so ignorant that they can be humbugged by such palpable inconsistencies.

Mr. Chirman, a few more words in relation to this road, and I will have done with it for the present. Sir, if the principle set forth by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. STUART,] in that part of his speech last alluded to, and by other Whig gentlemen upon this floor, be correct—that Congress should make no appropriation, or do any thing unless it is recommended or directed by the President—then Congress ought not to consume the people's money, by investigating, discussing, debating and originating measures; but meet, ascertain the President's will, do it, adjourn, and go home. But such are not the principles of the Democratic party; nor have those gentlemen pretended that it was theirs in relation to any thing else but this road, except where the Constitution or law required it. Hence I am irresistibly brought to the conclusion that their object is to gull the people in the States interested, by trying to make them believe that it was the fault of the President, and not of Congress, that this road has failed at this session. In relation to this road, the President was not required by the Constitution, or any law, to furnish estimates; and I repeat again, that he has given evidence that he was in favor of the road, by furnishing estimates for the road every session of Congress since he has been President, until Congress abandoned it, and by signing the only bill that passed since he came into the Presidency, making an appropriation for it. Nor has he said one word against it in his message, or any other writing, or verbally. There is not, therefore, one particle of evidence or foundation for the assertion that he is opposed to it. Sir, he knew, as every unbiassed, intelligent man must know, that as Congress first took the responsibility to abandon it, it was their duty first to take the responsibility of reviving it; and when that is done, if it be before his next Presidential term expires, my word for it, he will continue to furnish estimates again for it, until it is again abandoned by Congress.

I now, Mr. Chairman, come to the opposing candidate for the Presidency, Gen. Harrison, and will inquire into his principles and qualifications. And I will first show that he is either an Abolitionist, or that he is favoring their schemes; or if he is opposed to the Abolitionists and their schemes, he is aiming to get their votes, and will then deceive them, and his friends may take either horn of the dilemma. Second, that he is a high protective tariff man. Third, that he is in favor of the United States Bank. And fourth, that he was identified with the Federalists during the administration of the elder Adams, and that there is no proof of his having changed his principles since. And first, as to Abolition.

Mr. Chairman, I presume that it cannot, and will not be denied that Gen. Harrison will receive the votes of the Abolitionists, and that it was through and by their united influence and exertions that he received the nomination for the Presidency, by the Harrisburg Convention, over Henry Clay. And, sir, a "man is known by his company;" and if we have no other evidence, it is a safe rule to presume that a man is of the same principles as those through whose influence he is nominated, or succeeds to office, for it is almost universally true that he will serve those who promote him to office. Then, if elected, Gen. Harrison will owe that election to the Abolitionists; he will be under the greate t possible obligation to them, and will, as a matter of course, favor their schemes. But, sir, I will show, by a train of evidence and circumstances, that it was through the influence of the Abolitionists that Gen. Harrison received his nomination. I hold in my hand a circular, issued from Albany, New York, accompanied by a letter of a Mr. Bloodgood, and circulated through the Northern States just preceding the meeting of the Harrisburg Convention, in order to make way and prepare the minds of that convention to nominate Harrison over Clay; and one of the main reasons assigned is, that the Abolitionists would not support Clay, and, as a matter of course, would support Harrison.

Here is the letter and circular; let them speak for themselves. The CLERK will read them:

"ALBANY, Oct. 23, 1839.

"To the Editor of the Sangamo Journal:

"DEAR SIR: I send you (confidentially) a circular which is circulating here, and is producing great effect. Mr. Clay cannot possibly get this State, or New England. Our only hope is in General Harrison, who is perfectly unexceptionable, and has no serious opposition to him on any possible ground. The leaders do not feel, perhaps, as sure of getting paid for their services with him as with other candidates who have impliedly come into their views. But we can make a glorious rally under his banner, and reach the hearts of the people with his services and virtues. General Scott has been pushed by a few anti-Clay men, but it is all nonsense. I send you a pamphlet which is also circulating here, and which shows that no Jackson men, or Clintonians, can or will support him. The great point now is to have the public voice indicate a preference, or there may be fatal mistakes made at Harrisburg. I am the chairman of the State Central Committee of Young Men, but do not speak officially. I should like to forward some papers and letters to your delegates, but their residence is not mentioned. Will you publish their residence and send me a paper?

Yours truly,
S. DEWITT BLOODGOOD."

"(CONFIDENTIAL.)

"DEAR SIR: The peculiar crisis in which the Whig party is placed, and the circumstance of my connection by means of an extensive political correspondence, with many of the purest and most patriotic of our fellow-citizens in other States, induce me to address you at this time, in relation to the Presidential question. And first let me avow myself as the warm, devoted, personal friend of Mr. Clay, and an unqualified admirer of his talents and services. I believe he deserves to be President of the United States, above all our other candidates, and yet, with all these admissions, I cannot but consider his prospect at present a hopeless one. We have lost three years in contests about men, and the tide of victory carrying us no where, except into the eddies formed by opposing sections, or upon the barren beach of useless controversy, seems ebbing to leave us there. The Whig party being an intelligent and intellectual class, must necessarily do its own thinking, and with thought come variety of opinions, and with variety, want of unity and concord. This is our predicament and our danger. If we were united, we should be formidable to the enemies of our country; but, alas, we are beaten in detail. Let us apply this fact to the choice of candidates. Mr. Clay's political course, and long conflicts with portions of his fellow-citizens, have rendered him liable to warm opposition, personal hatred, and unjust prejudice. Is it the part of sagacious men to venture against such odds? With a majority of the States against us, is it prudent to risk every thing left us? Our party leaders want sagacity, or, as I prefer styling it, philosophy. They act as if mankind were always actuated by the best motives, and that the holding up an abstract truth, is the pledge of victory. Not so. Nations, like individuals, often rush blindly to ruin, from passion, prejudice, ambition, and many other causes. It is vain to oppose their will when they take a particular bias. They who attempt it are sacrificed, and thus history tells us with its monitory page, of the downfall of patriots vainly struggling against their erring countrymen, and finally of the downfall of the masses themselves. This is the law of nature and the will of Providence. Let us also apply this fact to politics. We cannot expect perfection in the people at large; we can only rely on their general good intentions, sustained by a consciousness, that their own interests individually, are at stake with those of the mass. When they are right in the main, it is as much as we should expect. We cannot hope that they will cease to be men in order to please us. In this knowledge consists the tact of the Administration party. They studiously seek to know the public will, and they follow it long enough to profit by its force and power. How adroitly they availed themselves of the popularity of Jackson! By bad measures they have lost much of its advantage, and by prosecuting such a scheme as the Sub-Treasury, they will lose more. But still they are strongly entrenched, and we must carry their entrenchments, or be doomed to political slavery. How can this be done? Only by uniting on the man who has less opposition to him than another. Superior or splendid talents or exalted claims are not the questions to be considered. What is any man compared to the cause? What have we to do with political rewards when our country is on the brink of ruin?

"Herein the friends of Mr. Clay have made a fatal mistake. In their love for him they forget that a battle is to be fought. Enthusiasm will not always overpower superiority of numbers. If it could, Mr. Clay would have been President long ago.

"If Mr. Clay runs, he will meet with opposition from old party antagonists, whose heads have grown grey in political iniquity.

"The old JACKSON MEN will oppose him.

"The ABOLITIONISTS generally will oppose him.

"The violent Antimasons will oppose him.

"The Irishmen, who have already denounced him for his attack on O'Connell, will oppose him.

"The enemies of the United States Bank will oppose him.

"The WESTERN SQUATTERS will oppose him.

"The Southern State Rights men will oppose him. (So say several leading papers in Georgia.)

"Now, in the name of Heaven, shall we run the risk of this opposition, or even of the show of it? Can we go headlong into a fight, with these adverse elements actively at work against us? Are we strong enough to venture so much? It seems to me that some men must have taken leave of their senses, to advocate any candidate against whom any portion of this opposition may be brought. Nothing but a strong and decided course on the part of our editorial friends, and an appeal without delay to the good sense of the party, will save us from utter ruin.

"To whom shall we then look for aid? Where is the man sufficiently popular to be our candidate, and one free from these objections?

"I answer, we have him, and have had him for three years; and if good policy had prevailed, we would by this time have looked down all opposition.

"Among the 'people' of this State, he is at this moment vastly more popular than any other candidate; and the reasons for it lie deep in the human heart.

"Since the reverses in the West, and South and North, men have begun to think, and thinking has produced wonderful changes under our own eyes. Our letters from the western counties assure us that the delegates to the National Convention will generally be Harrison men, and such they will be from this vicinity.

"The name of Gen. Scott has been brought out here by a few of our leading office holders. It is suspected that it was at first merely a scheme to get rid of Mr. Clay, and the implied obligation of his support. As it took a little better than was expected, a few have attempted to press it. But it is the idlest of all attempts, and even now signally fails. General Scott is not known as a Whig and not identified with us. A few ambitious men in New York, and in the army, doubtless hope to advance themselves by advancing him. But leaving all other objections out of view, two circumstances are fatal to him, growing out of a celebrated personal controversy. General Jackson's letter, and that of De Witt Clinton, will shortly make their appearance, by which all hopes of support from any of their friends will be entirely cut off. Read for yourselves from Niles's Register for 1818, and you will judge how much popularity will be left him in this struggle. But I forbear.

"I hope you will give this letter your serious attention, and if you agree with me, you will at once throw yourself into the front rank, for the purpose of producing 'union and harmony' IN TIME. Yours, with respect,

A FRIEND OF CLAY,
But a greater friend of the cause."

Here, sir, before the meeting of that convention, is the way paved by these Abolitionists who issued that circular for Harrison over Clay. It is true, as a mere blind, for the purpose of misleading, other reasons were assigned for their preference of Harrison over Clay. But, sir, let us examine these other reasons and see if there is a particle of truth in them. The first is, that "the old Jackson men would oppose Clay." And why, let me ask, would the "old Jackson men" be more likely to vote for Harrison than Clay? Has not Harrison been as bitter an enemy of Gen. Jackson and his principles as Clay? I answer that he has. The first opportunity he had after the late war, he showed his enmity and hatred towards Gen. Jackson. In 1818 he joined the Federalists in their violent and unwarranted attack against Gen. Jackson's military conduct in the Seminole war, and voted for the resolution disapproving the proceedings on the trial and execution of Arbuthnot and Ambrister; and declaring the seizure of the Spanish ports of Pensacola and St. Carlos de Barancos by the American army, to be contrary to the Constitution of the United States. He opposed Gen. Jackson for the Presidency in '24, '28, and '32, and opposed his administration throughout. Then, sir, where is the ground for that assertion? There is none. The next I will notice is the statement that "the enemies of the United States Bank would oppose Clay;" and why not Harrison? Has he not been as uniformly in favor of that Bank as Clay? and would he not, if elected, sign a charter for the same as soon as Clay? About that no one can have a doubt. But it states, too, that the "Western squatters would oppose Clay." As to that, Mr. Chairman, I will inform these Abolition gentlemen, in the first place, that there are very few of these "Western squatters," as they call them, at least so far as my own State is concerned, who would support either of them. Among them Federal Whigism cannot flourish; it has no charms for them. They are an honest, industrious, and intelligent people; they live by the "sweat of the brow;" they are independent; they are not tenants; dependent upon no landlord or rich nabob for their bread; and among such a people Democracy always finds a certain home; for such men will never consent to have saddled on them monopolies and privileged orders; but if there be any squatters who are Whigs, I will venture to say that they would as soon support Clay, with his talents, as to support a man in whose capacity and talents they have no confidence—and I will say that, so far as Missouri is concerned, Clay is more popular than Harrison—and I have the Whig Convention of that State and the Whig Delegates to the Harrisburg Convention to back me in that assertion—then that reason fails. And lastly, this circular states that the Antimasons and Irishmen would oppose Clay. Now, sir, how did the writer of this circular know that fact? Did the Antimasons and Irishmen, before the meeting of the Harrisburg Convention, indicate in any way their preference for Harrison over Clay? We have no proof of it—nor did the Old Jackson men, anti-Bank men, or Western squatters. Then, sir, according to the history of the times, and the truth of the facts, neither the Old Jackson men, anti-United States Bank men, Western squatters, Antimasons, nor the Irishmen, had, previous to the meeting of that Convention, indicated in any way, as parties, that they preferred Harrison to Clay. But the Abolitionists had—they had, sometime before the meeting of that Convention, shown their hands, through circulars and their leading organs; they had commenced a warm opposition to Clay on account of the speech he had made last Congress against their schemes, and had warned that Convention not to nominate Clay, that they would not support him. Then, Mr. Chairman, we are bound to presume that the other four classes or parties were as friendly to Clay as Harrison; and we know that the Abolitionists were not; and we are irresistibly brought to the conclusion that they were placed by the side of Abolitionists in this circular for the purpose of deceiving and practising a fraud upon the Whig party, in order to enable them to bend every influence to that of Abolition; and, sir, they succeeded; all the other parties that met in the convention, yielded to them, and Gen. Harrison may therefore be properly termed the Abolition candidate. Yes, sir, the Harrisburg Convention met, composed of men and parties as opposite in principles as the antipodes, agreeing but in one solitary thing, and that was, opposition to the Administration and Democracy. They were composed of Masons and Antimasons, of high protective tariff and anti-protective tariff men, of United States Bank and anti-United States Bank men, and of Abolitionists, and all these made up of lawyers, doctors, bank officers, merchants, speculators, and dismissed office holders, with some eight or ten planters; but no log cabin men were there, although they profess to have taken the log cabin men under their especial care; and nearly all of them were friendly to the administration of John Quincy Adams.

For the proof of these facts—I mean as to the principles and profession of the members of that convention—I refer to the collection of facts made by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WATTERSON,] who informs me that he has collected them from the most authentic sources within his power. He has set them forth, and they are published to the world in his printed speech. Yes, Mr. Chairman, these are the principles of the men who composed that convention. How different with the Democracy! Democracy is one and the same thing throughout the nation: its supporters have one and the same purpose in view—and that is to carry out and administer the Government according to the intent of its framers, and as laid down by Jefferson, pursued by Jackson, and thus far by Van Buren. It is of but one material, and cannot be alloyed by materials of opposite principles, properties, and qualities. Yes, Mr. Chairman, this convention pursued the track marked out by, and obeyed the command of, that Abolition circular. And what else did they do? Did they let us know their principles by an address to the people, so that the people could form an opinion of the principles upon which General Harrison, their nominee, would administer the Government, if elected? No, sir. It would not do to declare in favor of a United States Bank; for, if they had, the Southern anti-Bank Whigs would have showed their inconsistency by supporting the nominee. It would not do to declare in favor of a protective tariff, for, by so doing, they would have lost some of the Southern and Western anti-tariff Whigs. It would not do to declare in favor of the old Federal consolidation doctrine, for they would have lost some of the Whig State Rights men. Nor would it do to declare in favor of Abolition, for then they would have lost all the honest Southern Whigs. Then what could they do with this heterogeneous motley mass of opposite principles, thrown together in one convention? Why, they could only agree to write one thing to spread before the American people, and that was too short to come from so many great minds; that is, that they were opposed to the present Administration and Democracy, with a postscript at the end of it in these words: "But we cannot agree in the reasons why." Sir, it is the first political convention that has ever, in these United States, met and adjourned without setting forth to the public, in the form of an address, their political principles and their views on the leading questions of the day.

And now, Mr. Chairman, let us see by this course what this convention has done. Sir, they have impliedly, and by act and deed, said to the American people, that, as we lie in the shade, and don't have to work for our living, we have more time to study and attend to politics than you have; and, as we have the intelligence, and know how things should be done, do you never mind about our principles, or the principles of our candidate: you attend to your work; you have not time to attend to these things, and we will attend to your interests, and in the meantime, without knowing any thing about our views, or our candidate's views, do you vote as we tell you. But, sir, this shall not rest upon implication, strong as it is; I will show from positive testimony—from the hands of General Harrison's confidential and conscience-keeping committee—that he has pursued the implied order of this convention and positively refused to come out (although respectfully asked) and inform the people—the sovereigns of the nation—and whose suffrages he is asking for the highest office in their gift, what his principles and politics are. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand the correspondence showing this fact; the Clerk will read it.

"OSWEGO, Jan. 31, 1840.

"To the Hon. William H. Harrison:

"DEAR SIR: In accordance with a resolution of the Union Association of Oswego, I am instructed to propose three questions to you in relation to subjects that a large portion of this section of the country feel a deep interest in. The first is—

"Are you in favor of receiving and referring petitions for the immediate abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia?

"Second—Are you in favor of a United States Bank, or some institution similar to that, for the safe keeping and disbursing of the public moneys, and for giving a uniform currency throughout the United States.

"And lastly—Would you favor the passage of a general bankrupt law by Congress, so that its operations might be equal in all the States in the Union.

"I have only to say, sir, that the above inquiries are made in accordance with the unanimous wishes of this Association, the members of which, I am instructed to say, entertain the highest regard for your past services, and hope, should you be elected to the high office for which you are nominated, that nothing may occur to lessen you in the estimation of a great and free people.

I am sir, respectfully,
Your obedient servant,
MILES HOTCHKISS,
Corresponding Secretary.

"CINCINNATI, Feb. 29, 1840.

"Oswego Union Association:

GENTLEMEN: Your letter of the 31st ult. addressed to General Harrison, has been placed in our possession with a view to early attention. This is unavoidable, in consequence of the very numerous letters daily received by the General, and to which his reply in person is rendered absolutely impracticable. As from his confidential committee, you will look upon this response, and if the policy observed by the committee should not meet with your approbation, you will attribute the error rather to ourselves and his immediate advisers, than General Harrison. That policy is: THAT THE GENERAL MAKE NO FURTHER DECLARATION OF HIS PRINCIPLES, FOR THE PUBLIC EYE, WHILST OCCUPYING HIS PRESENT POSITION. Such a course has been adopted, not for purpose of concealment, nor to avoid all proper responsibility; but under the impression that the General's views, in regard to all the important and exciting questions of the day, have heretofore been given to the public, fully and explicitly; and that those views, whether connected with constitutional or other questions of very general interest, have undergone no change. The committee are strengthened in regard to the propriety of this policy; that no new issue be made to the public, from the consideration that the National Convention deemed it impolitic, at the then crisis, to publish any general declaration of the views of the great Opposition party, and certainly the policy at the present remains unaltered. In the mean time, we cannot help expressing the hope that our friends every where will receive the nomination of General Harrison with something akin to generous confidence. When we reflect upon the distinguished intelligence of the nominating convention—how ably all interests were represented in that body, we certainly have a high guarantee that should General Harrison be the successful candidate for the Presidency, that office will be happily and constitutionally administered, and under the guidance of the same principles which directed our Washington, Jefferson, and Madison. Believing you will concur with us in the propriety of the policy adopted, we have pleasure in subscribing ourselves,

"Your friends, DAVID GWYNNE,
J. C. WRIGHT,
O. M. SPENCER.

"H. E. SPENCER, Corresponding Secretary."

Here, Mr Chairman, is a principle, a precedent new to this Government, set, which, if it obtains, and is ratified by the American people, will become more dangerous to their liberties than any doctrine set forth, or promulgated by the Hartford Convention, and the Harrisburg Convention referred to as authority for it. Sir, has it come to this, that a man who is asking the suffrages of the people of this nation, for the highest office in their gift, refuses, when respectfully asked, to give his views upon the subject of Abolition; a subject, sir, of more vital importance to this Confederacy than any other that has been agitated since its formation; and which, if not checked in its career, will ere long dissolve this Union, after having first drenched it in blood, and destroyed its treasure?

Sir, that a man who asks the people for their suffrages for a high office, should, before they cast their votes, give that people his views on subjects and principles of great importance, is interwoven in, and forms a material part of, the machinery by which this Republic moves, and must be preserved. It is a fundamental principle of this, and must be of all Republics, or otherwise they cannot long exist.

Sir, Gen. Harrison, in refusing to give his views and opinions on the subject of Abolition, and on all the other important questions which agitate the nation, has ventured upon ground that no other candidate for the Presidency or any other high office has ventured upon from the days of Washington down. No, sir, not even did the Adamses venture upon it.

It is the doctrine of kings and emperors, who come to the throne by inheritance, and who are the masters of the people, and the people their servants. It will do for them to lock up their views and principles in their own bosoms, and refuse to inform the people how they intend to administer the Government. But does it suit a Republic, where the people are the masters and the officers the servant? Will the people of these United States permit a man to come into the highest office within their gift, uncommitted and unpledged, either one way or the other, upon the great questions in which the interests, the liberties, and the very union of the States are involved? Will they say yes, we will support Gen. Harrison; he is a good man; he knows what will be good for us, and what principles will suit us better than we do ourselves; as we are ignorant and incapable of self-government? No, sir, they will not support a man to come into power self-willed, to do his own will instead of theirs, even if he had a will of his own—much less will they support a man who has no will of his own—who has to employ a committee to dictate for him, act for him, and tell him what he must do—they know that in voting for General Harrison it would be but giving a formal vote—that substantially and in effect, it would be voting from the evidence they now have before them, for a committee to be made up, whose persons and principles they will know nothing about; whose duty it will be, like the present one, to keep his conscience, and direct in what manner he shall administer the Government, if he should be elected; and in that event they will come to the conclusion, from the evidence before them, that that committee will be made up of Abolitionists, Federalists, United States Bank men, and high protective tariff men, and such like materials; and they will further reason and say, that if General Harrison now, while but a candidate for the Presidency, has to employ a committee to keep his conscience, and tell him when to move, and when to stand still, that he would, as a matter of course, have one around him, if elected, to tell him what to do, as his responsibility and labor would be much greater then than now; and they will not doubt, sir, but that it will be composed of the materials above mentioned, whose only aim and object will be to control, through him, the Government in such a way as to enure to the benefit of the few, regardless of the interests of the many.

Sir, whoever before in this Government heard of a candidate for office with a committee around him to tell him what to do? It might well do for imbecile Kings, such as the Georges of England, to have a ministry around them to direct the administration of the Government. But, sir, I have always looked upon it here as a fundamental principle, in casting our suffrages, to select men for office for their merit and qualifications, who were capable of performing their duties without employing others to direct them. Sir, what would the people of Missouri think of me, if I, being a candidate even for a seat on this floor, or any other office of still less importance, should keep a committee around me to tell me what to answer, or to tell me whether to answer or not when called on to give my views on the great questions which agitate the nation? Why, sir, I should not expect to get a vote—particularly if my committee should refuse to let me answer at all. Sir, a man could not be elected constable in Missouri who would refuse to give his political views when called on. Sir, the people understand their rights and the principles of this Government too well to vote for a man to any office who will not let them know his politics.

But, Mr. Chairman, what excuses do this committee give for not letting Gen. Harrison answer the queries propounded by the Oswego association, for it appears, sir, that those who propounded them were his friends? Why, they say that the Harrisburg Convention thought it, at the then crisis, impolitic to declare the views of the Opposition, and therefore it was wrong for their nominee to do so; that is, that they had impliedly ordered Gen. Harrison to keep his mouth shut, and for fear he would not do it, we are his committee, arranged to see that it is done. And they also say, in excuse, that if there is any error in this concealment, blame us, and not Gen. Harrison.

I am informed, Mr. Chairman, that this committee is composed of lawyers, at least two of them, and Federalists at that; and, as a matter of course, they have read Blackstone's Commentaries, and have followed the doctrine laid down there; that is, that the King can do no wrong, and if any wrong is done on the part of the Government, the Ministry, and not the King, is responsible. This is the precise doctrine held out here, sir; the doctrine of a kingly Government.

But, sir, in this Republic, who do you hold responsible for the acts of the Executive branch of the Government? Is it a committee, appointed by the President to stand in the place of the ministry of England? No, sir; there never has been one yet; all the Presidents heretofore have had sense and firmness enough to do the business of the office, and take the responsibility. Then, sir, are his Secretaries and other officers which he appoints, responsible for the acts of the Executive Government? No, sir, we hold the President himself responsible for the acts of the entire Executive Department, and for the best reasons in the world, according to our frame of Government. The people elect the President, and the President appoints, and has the power to remove, all of his Executive officers. Then, if any of them fail in their duty, he is responsible to us for it, for he, and not us, has the power to remove him. But, sir, Gen. Harrison's political friends, while he is but a candidate for the Presidency, have put this English doctrine in force; and, sir, I venture to predict that they have showed their hands so plain as to what they would do if he is elected, that the people will never permit him to take that ministry or committee along with him to the Presidency, for the reason that they will not let him go there himself. What other excuse do they give? Why, General Harrison receives so many letters, that it is impossible for him to answer in person. Ah, indeed!—"guilt will out." Where are there so many letters, and where are there so many answers to them, that he could not answer three plain questions, that need not have taken more than a page of letter paper? When has he answered a solitary communication? Where is the answer? Show one since he has been a candidate. Sir, not one can be shown; for, as a matter of course, these numerous letters, if he received them, were in relation to his principles or politics; and if any of them had been answered, that answer would have been published. Then, sir, every man must see and know that this excuse is false, and, with the others, is rendered to keep out of view the true reasons, as I have before assigned, in order to practise a fraud on the credulity of the people. And this committee, (which is more palpable than all,) to cover the fraud intended to be practised on the community, wound up by saying: "We certainly have a high guarantee that, should General Harrison be the successful candidate for the Presidency, that office will be happily and constitutionally administered, and under the guidance of the same principles which directed our Washington, Jefferson, and Madison." What guarantee have we? None. If he had all at once become in love with the principles of Washington, Jefferson, and Madison, why did he not answer the letter written to him, and so state? It was easy done. No, sir, that would not do; and the very fact of his refusing to answer that he would, if elected, administer the Government according to the principles of those illustrious men, is conclusive evidence that he would not, but intended to administer it according to the principles of the Federalists and Abolitionists; and that their names were used by this committee for the purpose of misleading, gulling, and practising a fraud on the community. Sir, if he had just answered that he would have administered the Government as laid down by these three sages and patriots, and shown himself sound on the subject of Abolition, the people would have been satisfied. Sir, I have done with that correspondence for the present.

Mr. Chairman, I will go back again to that convention and the subject of Abolition, and inquire how the States voted in that convention. And what will we find? Why, sir, we find that every Southern State—I mean the slaveholding States that were represented there—voted for Clay. And why? Was Clay personally more popular in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and the other Southern States, generally, than Harrison? No; probably in none of them except Kentucky and Missouri. In fact, sir, Clay has always been very unpopular in Virginia, and the extreme South, probably on account of his bank and high tariff notions mainly. Then upon what ground did they support him in that convention, for they never did it before? Sir, the answer is easy; they looked upon this Abolition question as the paramount question of the land, and they did not believe that Harrison was sound upon it; they were jealous of him, and fearful that he was an Abolitionist. They knew (as I will show presently) that he had at one time declared himself in favor of it, and at another time against it; and what shoot he would take, if he had to decide a third time, they knew was doubtful. That is the whole secret, sir, and that is the answer; and now I call upon the Southern Whigs to say, as you call this the paramount question, and as you know and admit Van Buren is right on it, how it is possible that one of you, or one solitary Southern voter, except he be an Abolitionist, can support Harrison. You have not been informed by him of any thing in relation to this subject since that convention; and as you were fearful then that he was an Abolitionist, or would favor their schemes, and would not support him in the convention on that account, how can you be less so now. And, in fact, you have cause to be the more so, for the reason that he has been called on, and has peremptorily refused to come out, and let his views be known on this subject.

Sir, I do not believe, under the circumstances and facts already mentioned, that General Harrison, at any time since we have had an existence as a Government, except the present, could have got one solitary vote south of Mason's and Dixon's line, and very few, if any, north of it. But it seems that the Opposition have become desperate; that they are willing to forego any thing; plunge the Government into disunion and destruction, for the purpose of getting into power.

But, sir, let us trace this matter on and see what the leading organ of the Abolition party said immediately after the nomination. Here it is: the Clerk will read it:

"Well, the agony is over, and Henry Clay is—laid upon the shelf. And no man of ordinary intelligence can doubt or deny that it is the antislavery feeling of the North which has done it; in connection with his own ostentatious and infamous pro-slavery demonstrations in Congress. Praise to God for a great anti-slavery victory. A man of high talents, of great distinction, of long political services, of boundless personal popularity, has been openly rejected for the Presidency of this Republic, on account of his devotion to slavery. Set up a monument of progress there. Let the winds tell the tale. Let the slaveholders hear the news. Let foreign nations hear it. Let O'Connell hear it. Let the slaves hear it. A slaveholder is incapacitated for the Presidency of the United States. The reign of the slavocracy is hastening to a close. The rejection of Henry Clay by the Whig Convention, taken in connection with all the circumstances, is one of the heaviest blows the monster slavery has received in this country."

Yes, sir; here it is in words, and painted in colors that cannot be misunderstood: "The agony is over; Henry Clay laid on the shelf; anti-slavery feeling of the North that did it; praise to God for a great anti-slavery victory." What is their victory? Why, Harrison—our man, the friend of anti-slavery, the friend of the Abolitionists—is nominated over Clay. "Set up a monument of progress there—let the winds tell the tale—let the slave holders hear the news—let foreign nations hear it—let O'Connell hear it—let the slaves hear it, that a slave holder is incapacitated for the Presidency of the United States." Yes, and that Harrison, the Abolition candidate, is nominated. Sir, can the most credulous doubt, after looking at this, that my first proposition is true, that is, that Harrison is either an Abolitionist, or, if elected, will favor their schemes, or that he is aiming to get their votes, and will then deceive them. But the Whigs say that the editors of this paper have retracted a little since, and don't come out quite so rank since this first piece. Sir, don't every body understand that. Did you not see how uneasy the Whigs were here when that paper came out? Sir, they saw their cause was gone, unless something was done; they saw that the Abolitionists, in their over heat of joy, had "let the cat out of the wallet;" that Harrison was the Abolition candidate. This would not do; he would lose the Whigs of the South; and, sir, can any one doubt but that they were ordered, or persuaded, by the party, on that account, to retract a little from their rank hold? For, sir, has any thing come from Harrison since to weaken the confidence of the Abolitionists in him? Not a thing, for he has utterly refused to say a word on the subject since that time. But what has General Harrison said heretofore on this subject? Here is his own letter, signed by himself, published in the Philanthropist, on the 14th of February last, an Abolition paper, and friendly to the election of Harrison. I will read it:

"TO THE PUBLIC.

"FELLOW-CITIZENS: Being suddenly called home to attend to my sick family, I have but a moment to answer a few of the calumnies which are in circulation concerning me.

"I am accused of being friendly to slavery. From my earliest youth to the present moment, I have been the ardent friend of human liberty. At the age of eighteen I became a member of an Abolition society, established at Richmond, the object of which was to ameliorate the condition of slavery, and procure their freedom by every legal means. My venerable friend, Judge Gatch, of Clermont county, was also a member of this society, and has lately given me a certificate that I was one. The obligations I then came under I have faithfully performed. WM. H. HARRISON."

Here, then, Mr. Chairman, is his own letter, under his sign manual, published in Cincinnati, right under his nose, published in an Abolition paper, friendly to his election, and no doubt under his direction, or at least by his assent, to satisfy the Abolitionists that he was their friend, so that they might concentrate their forces on him. Sir, this is as strong a declaration in favor of Abolition as the Abolitionists desire. He says: "he has been accused of being friendly to slavery;" he denies it, and says that "he had been a member of an Abolition Society at Richmond." So anxious was he to satisfy the Abolitionists that he was one himself, he informs them that he had lately received a certificate from his venerable friend Judge Gatch, certifying that he had been a member of that Abolition society; and then he says, that the obligations he then had come under, he had faithfully performed; that is, that he had been, and then was, a good Abolitionist. It is true, he says, "that the object of this Abolition society" that he had been a member of, was "to ameliorate the condition of slavery, and procure their freedom by every legal means." But, sir, that is what every Abolition society and Abolitionist says: that their object is to abolish slavery by "legal means." But who does not know better? Who is it that does not believe, from their course, that this is a mere pretext to deceive and aid them in power; and that if they get the ascendency, and the power in their hands, they will not prostrate the Constitution, law, and every thing else, to effect their object? But his Whig friends on this floor say that he declared against Abolition in a speech delivered by him at Vincennes; agreed that he did, and the gentlemen may have the full benefit of it; and what does it prove? It proves that he has positively declared in one instance in favor of Abolition, and in another against it; and it shows the greater reason why he should come out now, and give us the best two in three declarations one way or the other—that we may know what he is now on this subject. For now is the time we want to know from his own mouth, or pen, that we may be able to put our fingers upon him and find him there. Yes, sir, now is the time we want to know, that there may be a stop put to this double game. For while the Abolition papers are publishing this letter to convince their brethren that Harrison is an Abolitionist, and that they should support him, the Whig anti-Abolitionists of the South are publishing his Vincennes speech to prove that he is not an Abolitionist. And, sir, let him no longer skulk behind a committee, and raise the fraudulent plea that he has not time to answer this question. For if he be so weak and feeble that he cannot answer a letter, which he could do in a dozen or twenty lines, how can he, if elected, perform the duties of the Presidency, for it is known by all to be the most laborious office in the nation? And yet Mr. Van Buren can attend to the duties of that office, and answer every letter that is addressed to him on this or any other subject. Sir, he does not refuse to answer and give his views on all the political questions that now agitate the nation; if he did, the Democracy would soon drop him. He answers full and broad against Abolition. Ah! but Gen. Harrison is so crowded with communications that he has not time to answer whether he is an Abolitionist or will favor their schemes or not; or, in other words, he receives so many letters that he has not time to answer any—although, no doubt, they are all on the same subject, and an answer to one would be answer to the whole. Well, I presume that Mr Van Buren receives as many letters as Gen. Harrison. Now, Mr. Chairman, how stands Gen. Harrison on this subject—he has declared both ways. While at Vincennes, where he knew there were no Abolitionists, (for Indiana has always been sound on this subject: her Legislature has, by a vote of ninety-nine to one, passed stronger resolutions against Abolition than have ever been passed here,) he came out strong against the Abolitionists; but when he was in a country where he was surrounded with Abolitionists, and was charged with being a friend to slavery, he denies the charge, calls it a calumny, and comes out strong in favor of Abolition. He is called upon, as he has declared both ways, to let us know now what he is, and refuses to answer them. Sir, what is the irresistible conclusion that the American people must come to. It is, sir, that my first proposition is true; for, sir, although owing to the lenity of the criminal law for a century and a half back, a man standing mute does not convict him of the crime he is charged with, yet, in all other proceedings, and in all our relations in life, if a man is charged with any thing that he knows is unpopular, and stands mute, refusing to answer when called on, it is taken for granted that he is guilty of the charge—law, reason, and common sense has established it as a principle.

Sir, I have said that Van Buren was sound on this subject, and what do the Abolitionists say? The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE] has repeated the statement on this floor that we have seen so often put forth in the Abolition papers; that is, that Mr. Van Buren was a Northern man with Southern principles—with this addition by that foul-mouthed gentleman, that he was a traitor to the North; and in what particular? let me ask this Abolitionist and his Abolition editors. Sir, they have only given us one reason for this declaration—they can give no other; and that is that Mr. Van Buren has publicly declared that Congress had no power under the Constitution to interfere with slavery in the States, and that, if they passed an act interfering with slavery in the District of Columbia, it would be against good faith; and he should feel himself bound to veto it. Yes, sir, this is the whole amount of the charge against him. Because he has shown himself to be the President of the entire nation, and not the President alone of these fanatic Abolitionists; and because he has determined to do every thing which in his power lies, according to the solemn oath which he has taken, to preserve the Constitution, the union of these States, and to prevent civil war and bloodshed, he is denounced by these Abolitionists as a traitor—a Northern man with Southern principles. Let the South look at this; it needs no further comment.

I will, Mr. Chairman, pass to the second proposition, and show that Gen. Harrison is is favor of a high protective tariff, or rather show that he has been heretofore, as far as he has acted and spoken, and we are bound to presume still is, as he also at present keeps silent on that subject. But to the proof. As late as 1831, in an address delivered before the Agricultural Society of Hamilton county, he said: "It may be asked whether, under any circumstances, I would be willing to abandon the tariff. I answer without hesitation in the affirmative. Whenever the streets of Norfolk and Charleston shall be covered with grass, and our Southern friends find no market for their produce; and this state of things can be directly traced to the tariff, I would then instantly give my voice for its modification, or entire repeal." How kind; yes, sir; how kind the General would be to you Southern people. After your land presents one wreck of ruin, your country depopulated, your cities decayed and grown up in grass; in a word, after you are entirely ruined, when it is too late to do you any good, this great statesman, as well as general, will then stop and put his mind upon the inquiry, and if he finds out that the tariff is the cause of it, he will go for its "modification, or entire repeal;" he would do it, too, "instantly, and without hesitation." These are his tariff notions; and, sir, the West, as well as the South, is deeply interested in this question. Sir, a great many of the leading politicians of the West have deceived themselves, as well as the people there, on this subject. The interest of the South and West is one and the same in relation to this question. As a high tariff affects one directly, so it affects the other indirectly; as in the first place it oppresses and strikes down the price of the staples in the South, so in the second it oppresses and strikes down the price of the stock, and all the products of the West. And how is it? Why, sir, the people of the West sell their beef, pork, horses, mules, and their surplus products, to the South. They buy from the East, and sell to the South. Then, sir, just in proportion as the Southern people get a high price for their main staple, which is cotton, (and in fact it may be said to be the staple of the nation,) just in the same proportion the Western farmers get a high price for their beef, pork, stock, and surplus products; and vice versa—for one follows the other. Then General Harrison's opinions on this question are directly against the interests of the West, as well as the South.

I need not take up the time of the committee in producing evidence to show that General Harrison is in favor of the United States Bank. The history of the country proves him to have been uniformly its advocate; and he declared himself to be in favor of it when a candidate for the Presidency, in 1836.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I will appeal to Virginia, and to the South generally, and ask them whether they are prepared to support a man who, they are bound to believe, from the evidence, is an Abolitionist, or at least is favoring their schemes—in favor of a high protective tariff—of the United States Bank—and who is now in the keeping of a Federal committee. And, sir, I will appeal to the North, and ask them, too, if they are prepared to support him, with all these facts staring them in the face; for I believe they, or at least a large majority of them, are sound upon all of these questions. But, if this is not sufficient, I will presently show that he was identified with the Federalists in 1798 and 1800, and that we have no evidence of any change in his principles since.

As to the generalship of General Harrison, Mr. Chairman, I have but little to say; for I know, sir, if, by any deeds in arms, he has acquired for himself the fame of a brave man and a General, that any thing I might say here would not detract from that fame. The people, in forming their opinions in relation to it, will be governed by the history and records of the country, made at the time, and shortly after he was in the field, commanding an army of his country, and the opinions of living witnesses, who served with him and under him, for, sir, you can scarcely go to a neighborhood in the West, but what you will find some person who served under General Harrison in the late war; and those who have grown up since, or who were now with him in the late war, had rather, and very properly, too, taken their opinions as to his generalship and bravery, than ours, proclaimed from this hall; and, on the other hand, I will inform the Whig gentlemen on this floor that if the history, records of the country, and the living witnesses, do not prove him to be a general, all their talents, ingenuity, and long speeches here, cannot manufacture him into one. If he was not a general in the field, sirs, you cannot make him one on this floor. But, Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. STUART,] will cause me to make a few passing remarks under this head. He said that General Harrison had fought more battles than any general during the late war. Sir, I was astonished to hear a member on this floor, directly against the facts, as known by living witnesses, and recorded in the history of the country, make such a statement. What battles did he fight during the late war? Not one. He had a fight or a skirmish with a small band of Indians at Tippecanoe, previous to the late war, at which time the enemy selected his camping ground for him, as proved by his own report; surprised him before day, killed a great many of his gallant officers and men, fought him until day, and retired. That, sir, is the only battle he was ever in; and I cannot see that there was much generalship or heroism displayed by him there—nothing, sir, that would entitle him to the appellation of the hero of the battle. If the gentleman had cast his mind upon a Jackson, a Brown, a Scott, a Gaines, a Miller, a Johnson, and a Croghan, he would have found men who fought battles during the late war, in a manner, and with an effect, too, that justly entitles them to the appellation of "hero." But, sir, it is a slander, a reflection upon the character of the Western people, to say that General Harrison is a great General, or that he has achieved many victories, or rendered important military services for his country. For there is no people so grateful, and delight so much to honor men who have led them to victory and to glory, as the Western people. Why then, sir, have they not, long since, shown their gratitude, and rendered honor to this man, if he is so great a General, fought so many battles, gained so many victories, and covered himself and his country with so much glory, as is attempted to be manufactured on this floor? I call upon you, Representatives from Ohio and Kentucky, whose sons constituted the greater part of his army, why it is that you have been so ungrateful and forgetful of this man's great military services, as to let him lie dormant for twenty-six years after these services have been performed; confer no honors upon him all this time; and now, when he is seventy years of age, with one foot in the grave, and the other not far off, you call up these past, these noble, and great military services rendered, and say for that he ought to be made President of the United States. Why, gentlemen, you are too late in showing your gratitude and conferring your honors. Mr. Chairman, it is perfect humbugery—a perfect farce attempted to be played off on the American people.

Mr. Chairman, the Western people are not ungrateful; they would have long since conferred the highest honors on General Harrison within their gift, if he had deserved them. Sir, they are an indulgent, forbearing, and charitable people. Sir, they are a generous, brave, and noble, and warm hearted people. If they can say nothing in favor of a military commander, they will say nothing at all. Where they have no confidence in him, they will not scrutinize his conduct, but will throw the mantle of charity around him, and permit him to retire unmolested and untroubled from the bustles of public life. And this is the course, sir, they have pursued towards Gen. Harrison, for I need not state that there never was a General who commanded braver officers and men, and had a better opportunity of distinguishing himself, than General Harrison. But he failed in doing it. It was his own fault, and it is too late to make him a general now—the time has passed—he should have shown himself a general in the late war, when he was at the head of his brave and gallant army, and, having failed, he should not undertake to make himself a general now by certificates, and the long speeches of his talented friends on this floor. Sir, he is the only man who commanded in the late war, and the first I ever heard of who undertook to prove himself a general by certificates and speeches. They know that it is their acts in the field upon which an intelligent people will determine the fact. They would consider such an attempt the highest possible insult that could be offered them. But, sir, what did Gen. Harrison's cotemporaries say about him—the Senate of the United States, in 1816—immedately after the close of the war? That Senate, composed almost entirely of the same men who had acted in that body during the war—who were patriots, who were in favor of the war, who gave the illustrious Madison all the aid in their power to prosecute the war with effect, and to the success and glory of the American arms—who with deep interest watched close the course and conduct of each American commander, and who were ready, anxious to confer honor upon the officers, where honor was due—refused to authorize a medal to be struck for General Harrison, and to tender him their thanks in honor of his military services. His name in a resolution to that effect, was introduced by the side of Governor Shelby, was stricken from it, and Governor Shelby's retained. This needs no comments, it speaks volumes.

And, sir, to show that the people of the West are not in fault in this matter, it is only necessary to look at their course towards others who served and proved faithful in that war. Where is the man who distinguished himself in that war in the West, or who showed himself ready and willing to act, if a chance had been given him, who has not been rewarded by that people. Sir, you can scarcely find any man, from lieutenant up, who served with General Harrison, that has not been honored with any office that he asked for. Many who served with him are now upon this floor; and it is strange that they have neglected General Harrison alone, if he deserved their confidence and their gratitude. Sir, they have not done it. They have done ample justice by him, by throwing the mantle of charity over him, and permiting him to retire, without scrutinizing too closely his military conduct.

Mr. Chairman, it has been stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STUART] that the old Federal party has been long since disbanded, and that some of the old Federalists now belong to the Democratic party, and some of the old Republicans to the present Whig party; and that they, the present Whigs, are not identified with the old Federalists. Now, sir, it may be true, and I have no doubt but that it is true, that men have changed their principles, that some of the old Federalistsis have joined the Democratic party, and that some of the Republicans have joined the Whig party; and what does this prove? Why, it only proves what every man knows: that man is fallible, liable to change his opinions from the various causes that operate upon the human mind. But does all this prove that the principles of the two parties have changed? Sir, principles once established are fixed and eternal; men may change, but they cannot. Does not the Democratic party now pursue and maintain the same principles that were pursued and maintained by Jefferson and the Republicans of '98 and 1800? and are not the principles of the Whigs now the same as those of the Federalists then. Sir, we profess to be the followers of Jefferson: he is our captain and our head; he was opposed to the United States Bank, to monopolies, and in favor of a strict construction of the Constitution, and so are we. Hamilton was the leader of the Federalists in that day, and proposed, and was in favor of, the United States Bank, of monopolies, and of a latitudinarian construction of the Constitution, and so are the Whigs. I will tell you, Mr. Chairman, what that party has done since the days of Jefferson: they have, in order to gain favor with the people, disbanded their names at least a half a dozen times; but their principles remain the same. Sir, in my State, the Whigs do not attempt to identify the Democratic party with Federalism; but their whole effort on this subject is to defend themselves against it. But, Mr Chairman, I will show that the Whig party is now running a man for the Presidency who was identified with and sustained the Federal party in '98 and 1800. Here is the proof: the reference to records and the facts therein is correct, and its comments on the records and facts I endorse as my own. The Clerk will read it.

HARRISON'S FEDERALISM.

THE PROOFS—THE PROOFS.

That Wm. Henry Harrison was a Federalist, and supported the administration of John Adams during the reign of terror in 1798, '99, 1800, is affirmed without the fear of successful contradiction.

The incontestable proofs which we adduce are the Journals of Congress and his own admission of the fact.

The first office of any importance which he ever held wasf that of "Secretary of the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio," conferred upon him by John Adams, then President of the United States, on the 20th June, 1798—[See Executive Journal, vol. I. p. 282.]

It was at the session of Congress in 1798, it will be remembered, that the alien and sedition laws were passed by the Federal majority who supported Mr. Adams's administration; and it is well known that none but those agreeing in political sentiment with President Adams and his Federal majority in Congress were appointed to high public stations.

General Harrison was afterwards returned as a delegate to the House of Representatives in Congress from the Northwestern Territory, and served as a delegate during the session of 1799–1800, up to the 12th of May, 1800, on which day he was nominated to the Senate by John Adams, then President of the United States to be Governor of the Indiana Territory—[See Executive Journal, vol. I. p. 353.]

It will be remembered that it was during that year (1800) that the contest between the Federal and Republican parties, in the then pending Presidential election between John Adams and Thomas Jefferson, and which terminated in the election of the latter in the fall of that year, had reached its highest point of excitement, and raged with its greatest fury and violence. The black cockade was the insignia of distinction worn by the Federalists, and universal proscription from office of all who differed with them in political sentiment was the order of the day. It was at that time that General Harrison was a favorite which John Adams, and was appointed by him and a Federal Senate to be "Governor of the Indiana Territory."

Further: If the fact that in these high party times General Harrison was in favor with President John Adams, and was rewarded by him, first by the appointment of Secretary, and then of Governor of a Territory, were not of itself conclusive proof that General Harrison was a friend and supporter of his administration, his own admission, which we proceed to adduce, would remove all cavil or doubt in the minds of the most skeptical that he was so.

The charge. In the year 1826, Mr. John Randolph of Virginia and General Harrison, met in the Senate of the United States, and in a debate in that body on the 20th March, of that year (1826) Mr. Randolph charged the fact to be so, in the following plain language, reported in the National Intelligencer at the time, and preserved in Gales and Seaton's "Congressional Debates," vol. II, part 1, page 359, to wit: Mr. Randolph said:

"Now, sir, the only difference between the gentleman from Ohio [General Harrison] and myself is this—and it is vital—that gentlemen and myself differ fundamentally and totally, and did differ when we first took our seats in Congress—he as a delegate from the Territory Northwest of the river Ohio, I as a member of the other House from the State of Virginia; he was an open, zealous, frank supporter of the sedition law and black cockade Administration; and I was as zealous, frank, and open an opponent of the black cockade and sedition law Administration. We differ fundamentally and totally—we never can agree about measures or men—I do not mean to dictate to the gentleman—let us agree to differ as gentlemen ought to do, especially natives of the same State, who are antipodes to each other in politics. He, I acknowledge, just now, the ZENITH and I the NADIR, but unless there is something false in the philosophy of the school, in the course of time even these will change their places."

Mark! "Who are antipodes to each other in politics." Thus much for the charge.

Now for the admission. On the same day General Harrison replied to the charge of Mr. Randolph, and ADMITTED ITS TRUTH in the following language, reported in the National Intelligencer at the time, and preserved in Gales and Seaton's "Congressional Debates," vol. II, part 1, p. 364, 365—to wit:

"In the course of this debate, Mr. Harrison said that he could not refrain from making his acknowledgments to the gentleman from Virginia for the notice he had been pleased to take of him. He has been pleased to say, that in the administration of Mr. Adams, I was a Federalist, and he comes to that conclusion from the course pursued by me in 1799–1800. At that session, the gentleman and myself met for the first time; he in the station of Representative from Virginia, and I in the more humble one of Delegate from the Northwestern Territory. Having no vote, I did not think proper to take part in the discussion of any of the great political questions which divided the two parties. My business was to procure the passage of the bills which I had introduced for the benefit of the people I represented. The gentleman had no means of knowing my political principles, unless he obtained them from private conversation. As I was upon terms of intimacy with the gentleman, it is very probable that he might have heard me express sentiments favorable to the then Administration. I certainly felt them—so far, at least, as to the course pursued by it in relation to the Government of France. Nor, said Mr. H. was I unsupported in that opinion by those who had a right to control my actions, if not my opinions In no part of the country were those measures more decidedly approbated than by my immediate constituents—the Legislature of the Northwestern Territory—as the address of that body to the President, during that session, will show. For Mr. Adams, said Mr. H I entertained at that time, and have ever since entertained, the greatest respect. I believe him to be an honest man and a pure patriot, and his conduct during that session proved him to be such. This opinion I know, said Mr. H. was entertained by those two able and upright statesmen, John Marshall and James A. Bayard. To the question asked by Mr. Randolph, whether Mr. H. recollected a conversation between Mr. Nicholas and himself, in relation to the negroes and politics of Virginia, Mr. H. answered: I recollect it perfectly well, but can this be adduced as an evidence of my favoring the Sedition Law?"]

Mr. Randolph's charge was—and he spoke from his own personal knowledge of the fact—that "he (Harrison) was an open, zealous, frank supporter of the Sedition Law and Black Cockade Administration," "and I (Randolph) was as zealous, frank and open an opponent of the Black Cockade and Sedition Law Administration."

Does Gen. Harrison, in his reply, admit or deny the truth of Mr. Randolph's charge?

He admits its truth plainly and unequivocally. He says:

"As I was on terms of intimacy with the gentleman, (in 1799—1800) it is very probable that he might have heard me express sentiments favorable to the then Administration—I CERTAINLY FELT THEM."

And he further says:

"For Mr. Adams I entertained, at that time, and have ever since entertained, the greatest respect. I believe him to be an honest man and pure patriot, and his conduct during that session proved him to be such!"

What stronger ADMISSION of the charge that he (Harrison) was a Federalist, and a supporter of Adams's-administration, can the English language convey?

General Harrison, however, in 1826, when he was compelled to make this admission, because it was true, and the living witnesses were present to prove it, if denied, seems to have been sensible that President Adams and his administration had become unpopular, and attempted to bolster and sustain, if not excused himself for the opinions he entertained of him, by referring to the opinions of other distinguished Federalists. And to whom did he refer? "This opinion (of John Adams) I know (said Mr. H.) was entertained by those two able and upright statesmen, John Marshall and James A. Bayard!" The reference is a most important one; and, if possible, still more closely and indissolubly identifies General Harrison with the Federal men and party.

And who were Judge Marshall and James A. Bayard, but the distinguished leaders of the old Federal party? It is a matter of notorious history, never denied, and undeniable, that they were the two great champions of Federalism.

Judge Marshall was appointed by John Adams to be Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States on the 20th of January, 1801, an office which he held until the day of his death. In 1826, when General Harrison made the reference, and in all subsequent time of his life, Judge Marshall was regarded as the head of the Federal party in the United States.

Mr. Bayard was a member of the House of Representatives in Congress from the State of Delaware in 1798, AND VOTED FOR THE SEDITION LAW, (See journal of the House of Representatives, reprint vol. 3, p. 3791.) Mr. Bayard was a member of the House from Delaware, and voted for Aaron Burr against Thomas Jefferson to be President of the United States!

So much for the able and upright statesmen with whom General Harrison acted during the Reign of Terror.

Between the close of the administration of John Adams on the 3d of March, 1801, and the commencement of the administration of John Quincy Adams on the 4th of March, 1825, Gen. Harrison was not so actively engaged in political life as to make it necessary for him to make any public avowals of his political principles. That they remained unchanged, however, there cannot be a doubt.

At the commencement of the administration of John Quincy Adams we find Harrison in the Senate of the United States, "an open, zealous, and frank supporter" of his administration, as he had been in 1799-1800 of "the Sedition Law and Black Cockade administration of his father.

We will not willingly do General Harrison injustice. We have said that he is a Federalist, and we have adduced the proof of the fact.

I will now, Mr. Chairman, turn my attention awhile to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OGLE.] He has wantonly, and without cause, assailed the person and character of one of the Senators from Missouri [Mr. BENTON] in the most abusive manner that a blackguard could devise. I had heard gentlemen before on this floor make use of abusive epithets towards officers of the Government and leading politicians outside of this House; but, sir, I have heard nothing to come near up to those used by this gentleman. He has shown himself to be degraded beneath that of any other man who has any pretensions to reputation and honor. Sir, if he had spoken of Col. Benton's principles or inconsistency, if he could have shown any, I would have had nothing to say; but that would not do him; he must strike at his person. He stated, sir, in reference to the East room letter as he called it, (which I know nothing about, and it would be degrading to this House to undertake to make an inquiry into it) that Col. Benton had in that letter "stated a wilful and base falsehood, and that the villain should not escape his denunciation." These are the epithets used towards that Senator—a man who had the confidence of the people of Tennessee, and by them was put in the councils of their State before he removed to Missouri, and who, ever since he has been there, has stood high in the confidence of the people of that State. They have by large majorities sent him to the Senate of the United States for twenty successive years, and still they keep him there. They are as virtuous and as intelligent a people as live upon the globe, and have endorsed his character for that length of time, and still continue to endorse it. A direct thrust therefore at his character and person, is an indirect thrust at the character of the people of Missouri, who, too, I have the honor in part to represent. Sir, Col. Benton's public life needs no eulogy from me; if I were to attempt it, I should fall short of doing him justice. He has been in the service of his country, either in the field or in the cabinet, all his life, and his acts are interwoven into, and form a bright page in, the history of the country; and, suffice it to say, that his untiring and unceasing efforts, and his masterly talents, have all been used in behalf of liberty—of Democracy—of the people—of the working people of this nation. Sir, this is the man towards whom this little fellow, who never was heard of outside of his district until he came here, has used these epithets—epithets, sir, that no man would make use of towards a member of the other House, who had that sense of honor and propriety calculated to distinguish him from the blackguard of a brothel, or the bully of a muster field. It was a mean and cowardly act.

[Here the Chairman called Mr. JAMESON to order.]

Mr. JAMESON said he was done.

SPEECH OF MR. WALL, OF NEW JERSEY,

In Senate, May 12, 1840—On the bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy. The question being on the adoption of the substitute submitted by Mr. WALL, from the minority of the committee—

Mr. WALL addressed the Senate as follows:

Mr. PRESIDENT: In submitting the substitute which I propose for the bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy, &c. reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary, it becomes my duty to explain the features and principles of it. In doing so, I shall endeavor to avoid every thing extraneous, or which can draw off the attention of the Senate from what properly belongs to the subject.

I am not accustomed to deal in professions, or to make myself prominent in any way; but as my course in relation to this matter has been commented on, in the public papers, with harshness mingled with misrepresentation, it is proper to remove unfounded accusations, by defining my position. I am in favor of passing a constitutional law upon the subject of bankruptcy, of such a character as is demanded by the state of the country—one that will relieve the unfortunate debtor who is borne down by the depressing load of the perpetual bondage of debt, and restore to him the invigorating stimulus of hope, and the natural impulses, without which, energy, active enterprise, and useful industry, languish or perish; and, at the same time, do justice to the claims of the creditor.

In my judgment, the time has arrived when the state of the country imperiously demands that Congress should exercise their constitutional power of passing an uniform law on the subject of bankruptcy. It is demanded as well for the relief of the debtor as the interest of the creditor—for the interest of the public, as of individuals. The interest of the public requires that the productive energies of the many ardent, enterprising, and meritorious, but unfortunate men, which have been paralyzed by the vicissitudes of trade, the fluctuations of the currency, or the disastrous results of rashness, imprudence, or inexperience, should be resuscitated, and restored to the community.

We cannot shut our eyes to the melancholy fact, that the whole country is suffering from one of those revulsions, which, of late, have periodically cast their wrecks upon the shores of trade and business. This is not the proper occasion to inquire into the causes of this revulsion, or to measure out censure or condemnation upon any. The country demands that relief of Congress which they suppose they can constitutionally apply. They have, in numerous petitions, clearly and explicitly made known the remedy which they suppose can and ought to be granted. It is the passage of "an uniform law upon the subject of bankruptcy." No petitioner has asked for a partial, special, or particular law upon that subject, which restricts and confines the remedy to the voluntary and exclusive act of the debtor; leaving the creditor remediless, and debarred of its benefits, save what may be incidentally gleaned from the voluntary proceedings instituted by the debtor. The idea of a bankrupt law, designed and framed for the exclusive benefit of the bankrupt, so far as I know, originated in the chamber of the Judiciary Committee, and is ushered into the world under their auspices alone. No precedent of such a bill is to be found, either in the legislation of Congress, the Parliament of England, or of any other country. It is a new and untried experiment.

The first movement on the subject of a bankrupt law, made during the present session, proceeded from my honorable friend from Michigan, [Mr. NORVELL] who, on the 14th January last, submitted a resolution, instructing the Judiciary Committee "to inquire into the expediency of passing a general bankrupt law." He is entitled to the merit, whatever it may be, of first presenting the subject for the consideration of this body. It seems to have awakened the attention of the whole country, from one extremity to the other. There were soon on the files of the Judiciary Committee, fifty one petitions, praying for the passage of an uniform law on the subject of bankruptcy, twenty-nine of which are from New York, five from Michigan, five from New Jersey, two from Indiana, two from Massachusetts, three from Ohio, and one from each of the States of Tennessee and Mississippi. There are thirty-five other petitions, praying for the passage of a general bankrupt law, or using some equivalent expression to uniform or general; fifteen of which are from New York, eight from Pennsylvania, four from Illinois, one from each of the States of Ohio, Maine, and New Hampshire, three from Mississippi, and two from Alabama. Resolutions, also, have been passed by the Legislatures of Maine and Michigan, in favor of the same measure. These latter petitions are not uniform in their language or object—some of them ask that banks and corporations should be included in the operations of any law passed on the subject.

Such, then, is the want of the public; such the prayer of the people which has reached the committee. No one has been found expressly to ask for a bankrupt law restricting its operations exclusively to the voluntary act of the debtor. However they may differ as to the persons upon which it shall act, all desire that the law should be uniform in its action upon debtor and creditor, and uniform in the manner of its action, by affording its remedies and its benefits alike to the debtor and creditor, as far as consists with the general principles and policy inherent in, and peculiar to, such a system. What then is the constitutional power of Congress over the subject of bankruptcy? It is a delegated power, and we must look to the terms of the Constitution for it, or it does not exist. There the power is expressly to be found. It is "to pass uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcy."

The power is not to pass a law of bankruptcy, or relating to bankruptcies, but "laws upon the subject of bankruptcy;" thus giving a latitudinous power as broad and comprehensive as the whole subject of bankruptcy; limited and restrained only by the qualification that, in its action upon the distinct classes of bankrupts, and on the several cases, which are subjects of bankruptcy, it should be uniform.

I shall assume it as an undeniable position, established by the decisions of our Supreme Court, and the opinions of all jurists, who have treated upon the subject, that we are to look to the legislation and the decisions of England, to ascertain the true meaning of the clause of the Constitution in question. The framers of the Constitution well understood that law; and what were the subjects upon which the bankrupt system of that country operated? They have withdrawn from the legislation of the States all power to pass any law to impair the obligations of contracts; and they certainly did not, by so doing, vest Congress with a a general and uncontrolled power to pass laws to impair the obligations of contracts in all cases whatever. Any power which Congress can exercise over the contracts of the citizens of the States, as such, must be sought and found in the clause authorizing them to pass a law upon the subject of bankruptcy.

Let us look, then, to the legislation and decisions of England for the true interpretation of a law on the subject of bankruptcy. Bankruptcy is the state of being a bankrupt. What is a bankrupt? The word is of foreign origin, compounded either from the Italian words, banco rotto, or the Latin, bancus ruptus. The literal meaning is a bank or bench broken, and is plainly symbolical; comprehending in its metaphor, a trader in money or goods, the emblem of his occupation, and his failure, or that such emblem was broken. Lord Coke says, "that we have fetched as well the name as the wickedness of bankrupts from foreign nations. Some say it should be derived from Banque and rompue, as he that hath broken his bank or state." "In former times, as the name of a bankrupt, so was the offence itself, (as hath been said,) a stranger to an Englishman, who, of all nations, was freest of bankruptcy."

Whatever may have been the origin of the word, it has been naturalized in the English language, and has now not only a technical but a popular signification, perfectly well understood. The meaning of a bankrupt, in the law of England, is a debtor who is a trader, and unwilling or unable to pay his debts, or meet his engagements. Such a debtor only can be made liable to the operations of a bankrupt law, or be legitimately brought within its scope. Bankrupt differs in its technical sense from an insolvent debtor, with which it is frequently confounded. Any debtor, whether a trader or not, may be an insolvent, and the only test of insolvency, is the inability to pay his debts, not his unwillingness. No debtor can be an insolvent who has the ability, but not the will, to pay his debts. A debtor trader may be a bankrupt, if he has the means, but not the will, to pay his debts. Such, then, is the description or class of persons who may be bankrupts, or the subjects of a law of bankruptcy. What, then, is the subject upon which a law of bankruptcy may operate? Here again we must have recourse to the legislation and judicial decisions of England, as they existed at the time of the forming of the Constitution. I do not mean by this that we must legislate in the same manner, on the subject of bankruptcy, or adopt the same provisions as are found in the acts of Parliament in relation thereto, but that our constitutional legislation must be confined to the same classes of persons, and the same subject matters. Whether the word bankrupt traces its origin to the custom of traders on the Rialto of St. Marks, or of the traders in any other country, for its symbolical meaning, or to the code of the civil law, at the time of the framing of the Constitution of the United States, the principle of the system or the subject of such a law, was the creature of the Parliament of England, and such principles only were in the contemplation of its framers, when this clause was inserted in the Constitution. The law upon the subject of bankruptcy, which the Constitution means, is confined to the subject of bankruptcy and the classes of persons as understood in England at the time of its adoption. The cessio bonorum of the civil law, was simply an insolvent law, which did not discharge the debtor from the contract, but only that part of the remedy relative to imprisonment, differing substantially only from the English insolvent law, which gave the relief only on the application of the debtor, in permitting either the debtor or creditor to become the actor, in originating the proceedings. I believe that there was not at that time any law of bankruptcy on the continent of Europe, which discharged the debtor from the contract, without the consent of the creditor. As far as they went on that subject, the discharge was conferred by the voluntary or enforced consent of the creditors, and in the nature of a composition. The English bankrupt law was the only one which discharged the debtor from the contract. This, too, furnishes one of the marked distinctions between a law on the subject of insolvency and of bankruptcy. The latter discharged the debtor from the contract itself, provided such debtor was a trader; the former, from the remedies founded on the contract, as related to the imprisonment of the person, or the remedy allowed by the lex loci, to enforce the fulfilment of the contract.

To elucidate this distinction, I must ask your attention, sir, to a brief review of the most important epochs in the history of the English law on the subject of bankruptcy.

The first law on the subject of bankruptcy, was passed in the reign of Henry VIII, 1542, when, as Lord Coke tells us, "the English merchant had reveled in three kinds of costliness, viz: costly buildings, costly diet, and costly apparel, accompanied with a neglect of his trade and servants, and thereby consumed his wealth." It was entitled "an act against such persons as do make bankrupt;" and the preamble sets forth, that whereas divers and sundry persons, craftily obtaining into their hands great substance of other men's goods, do suddenly flee to parts unknown, or keep their houses, not minding to pay or restore to any of their creditors their duties, but at their own will and pleasures, consume debts and substances obtained by credit of other men, for their own pleasure and delicate living, against all equity and good conscience."

It is manifest, although this act is not confined, in terms, to merchants and bankers, yet that the mischiefs intended to be remedied, were such only as could be committed by that class of persons. In fact, the histories of the day inform us that it was levelled against the Lombards, who were the principal merchants and bankers of the time. This is the first of the laws on the subject of bankruptcy in England; and the fact that no decision is to be found in the English books upon this law, which continued in existence for near thirty years, shows that there could have been no difference of opinion as to the description of persons liable to it. It was merchants and bankers only. This construction is fortified by the title: "An act against such persons as do make bankrupt;" thereby, ex vi termini, restricting it to merchants and bankers.

The provisions of this law partook of the cruel and bloody character of the monarch in whose reign it was enacted.

1. The body, if it could be found, and all the property of the debtor, were to be seized by the commissioners, and the latter was distributed for the use of the creditors equally.

2. The whole property of the debtor was, ipso facto, by the mere force of the statute, vested in the commissioners, as also all his future acquisitions.

3. The debtor was outlawed if he did not surrender himself within a limited time; and, of course, in that event, his life was at the mercy of every one.

4. Two acts of bankruptcy only were specified: suddenly fleeing to parts unknown, or keeping house, not minding to pay their creditors.

5. It operated only on the subject of debtor and creditor, growing out of contracts.

6. The remedy was summary and extraordinary, confined to the creditor without trial, or judgment, or execution, and, upon the simple order of the commissioners, vested all the property and future acquisitions of the debtor in themselves, and gave them a right to take the body also.

These two latter provisions, together with the equal distribution of the assets, with such modification as the experience or necessities of the case might, from time to time, require, have continued fundamental principles of every law upon the subject of bankruptcy.

In the thirteenht year of the reign of Elizabeth, (1570,) this law underwent many modifications. The preamble of that statute recites, that notwithstanding the statute before mentioned, against bankrupts, "those persons have, and still do, increase into great and excessive numbers, and are like more to do, if some better provision be not made for the repression of them;" and declares that all merchants, &c. and persons seeking his or her trade or living by buying and selling, shall be liable to be declared bankrupts. The repression of bankrupts was the object of this statute; and to effect this object, the operation of the law of bankruptcy was extended to traders, as well as merchants and bankers, to which the former statute seems to have been restrained by construction, if not by its language. It is difficult to understand how a mischief could be repressed by restraining the operation of an efficacious and approved remedy to a fewer description or class of persons. The remedy was designed to act beneficially, by enlarging, not circumscribing, the sphere of its action.

This statute authorized the Lord Chancellor, by commission, to vest the estate of the bankrupt in commissioners, with power to arrest his body. It makes but little alteration in the provisions of the former statute, to which I have adverted, pertinent to our present inquiry.

Up to this time, the discharge of the debtor from the contract, formed no part of the subject of a bankrupt law. That principle was first introduced in the statute, 4 and 5 Anne, (1705.) That statute first introduced the punishment of death against the bankrupt; and the policy of discharging the bankrupt from his contract; and allowing a per centage to the bankrupt, whose assets should pay a certain per centage.

Since that time the subject of the bankrupt law in England has been confined uniformly to merchants, bankers, and traders, or those who, from time to time, have been declared traders by Parliament; and in the case of the occurrence of bankruptcy, it operates upon the contract of such debtor and his creditors, by furnishing the creditor a summary and extraordinary remedy, and the debtor an extraordinary relief, a discharge from the contracts, not known or extended to other contracts, or classes of debtors and creditors. These features have always been retained in the subsequent English statutes; and by uniform legislation, have become the fundamental principles of the English law on the subject of bankrupicy, triumphing over all the modifications and alterations of subsequent legislation.

For a considerable period in the history of the legislation of England upon the subject of bankruptcy, the bankrupt was looked upon as an offender, a criminal; liable, in a given case, to forfeit his life; and the remedy was placed exclusively in the hands of the creditor. But at length the mild and benign principles of Christianity were infused into the system; and in the first year of the reign of George the Third, the stain of blood was effaced from it. Long before that, the humanity of creditors, and of courts and legislators, had practically moulded the system in such manner, that the honest debtor was deemed unfortunate merely, and there was doled out to him a pittance, from the wrecks of his misfortune, to support his family, and to begin the world anew, reinvigorated with hope. The policy, as well as the principles of the law of bankruptcy, were fundamentally restrained to contracts between debtor and creditor, where the debtor was a trader and failed. It mattered not whether he was a trader in money, credit, or goods. The law of bankruptcy sprung from the credit system, commerce, and trade, and was circumscribed in its operation to those who were gaining their livelihood by its means, and exposed to its hazards, vicissitudes, and revulsions But the remedy of the creditor, the relief of the debtor, the modes of its procedure, the machinery by which it acted, were always controllable by legislative wisdom, to be moulded to accommodate the progressive advancement of the age, the extension of trade and commerce, and the expansion of the credit system. It was a fixed and settled system only in those fundamental principles, that it operated on these contracts or relations between debtor and creditor only where the former was a merchant, banker, or trader, or declared to be such by law, and was unwilling or unable to pay his debts—that it gave to the creditors as a class, in case of the commission of an act of bankruptcy, a summary and extraordinary remedy, not afforded on other contracts, of arresting the body of the debtor, and seizing all his property, without trial, judgment, or execution, or any process known to the common law—that such property was to be appropriated for the equal benefit of the creditors, without preference, except such as the law should define; and in consideration of the exercise of this power by the creditor, and of his thus stripping his debtor of his property, the honest bankrupt was discharged from the contract. These, I believe, will be found to be the only fundamental principles of the law on the subject of bankruptcy, known and recognised as the English system at the time of the framing the Constitution of the United States. At that time such class of persons only, and such contracts only, and such relations of debtor and creditor only, were the subjects of the bankrupt law in England. Who should or should not be deemed merchants, bankers, or traders—what should be considered an act of bankruptcy— the manner of procedure in respect to the remedy— the preferences, the classes of persons who, falling within the general description of merchants, bankers, and traders, should be exempted from the law—the machinery of the system, and the extent and effect and mode of the discharge of the debtor from his contract—and all the details of the system, were plastic, to be moulded from time to time, according to legislative discretion and wisdom, to suit the varying operations of trade and commerce, and the credit system.

The dicta of the Supreme Court of the United States, "that the line of partition between bankrupt and insolvent laws, is not so distinctly marked as to enable any one to say with positive precision what regulations belong exclusively to one, and not to the other class of laws," admits that there is a distinction between the laws. There are some fundamental distinctions that separate them into classes.

1. Bankrupt laws are confined to merchants, bankers, and traders, and to contracts. Insolvent laws operate on all classes of persons, and upon torts, as well as contracts.

2. Insolvent laws cannot operate on the contract by dissolving it. Bankrupt laws may, and do. The former is confined to the remedy on the contract—the latter prostrates, at one blow, the contract, and all remedies founded on it. The former may operate by prescribing the circumstances which must precede the obligations of a contract, and on which its original validity shall be made to depend. An obligation must exist before it can be impaired; and the lex loci may prescribe those circumstances which shall create its obligation. Of this class is a law prescribing the mode of executing agreements, attesting them, recording them, and the statutes of frauds, &c. Insolvent laws of this character must be made previously to the contract between citizens of the same State and in the State where the contract was made, but cannot dissolve a previous contract, or one made out of its jurisdiction. They cannot reach an existing contract. A bankrupt law may and does act on the obligation of all contracts, prospectively or retrospectively, between a trading debtor and his creditors, in cases of bankruptcy. Insolvent laws act simply as to the remedy, or under the principle of the lex loci or lex fori.

There are other diversities, but perhaps not so distinctly marked as to constitute a line of partition. These distinctions are fundamental, and divide the two systems by boundaries that cannot be overleaped.

The powers of Congress, however, to pass laws on the subject of bankruptcy, is not arbitrary or unlimited. Such a law must be uniform; that is, it must act in the same manner upon the subject of bankruptcy, upon the contracts, or the relation of debtor and creditor, where the debtor is a trader, and failed. If it must operate alike on the same classes as to its benefits and remedies, it must conform to the same rule in its operation upon the classes, and upon the subjects upon which it acts. It stands opposed to a partial, particular, or special law upon the subject of bankruptcy, which acts only upon the subject so far as respects the interest of debtors, and for their relief and discharge only, placing the remedy in their hands only. How can it be contended that a law upon the subject of bankruptcy is uniform, which places the remedy and the benefits of it, wholly in the hands of the debtor, leaving the creditor without any remedy or benefit? Uniform refers to the subject-matter of a bankrupt law, and its operation on such subjects, and the classes liable to its scope, not to its locality. All laws of Congress, without any constitutional injunction, extend over the whole Union.

The bill reported by the majority of the Judiciary Committee appears to me to be unconstitutional.

1. It is simply an insolvent law, extending itself over all contracts between creditor and debtor, whether the debtor be a trader or not, and allows the debtor, at his own time and pleasure, to free himself from his obligations. It assumes the most latitudinous power ever claimed for the Federal Government—the power to free all debtors in the Union from their obligations—to create a general jubilee. It is an insolvent law in its inception, and as to the creditor; and a bankrupt law in its termination, and as to the debtor: it places all contracts under the control of the Federal Government.

2. It operates upon the whole subject of contracts, and the obligation and rights growing out of them between debtor and creditor; whereas Congress have no constitutional right to pass any law impairing contracts, except such as are made by a debtor who is a merchant, banker, or trader, and is unable or unwilling to pay his debts. "So exclusively have bankrupt laws operated on traders, that it may well be doubted whether any act of Congress to subject to such law every description of persons within the United States, would comport with the spirit of the powers vested in them in relation thereto," is the language of Judge Livingston, reported in Adams vs. Storrey—1 Paine, C. C. R. 79.

The bankrupt law proposed in 1827 was destroyed by incorporating in it a clause extending it beyond the classes of merchants, bankers, and traders; and the unconstitutionality of it, arising from that extension, was pressed strongly on the argument.

The bill proposed by the majority, it seems to me, is liable to radical and fundamental objections, even if it should be demed constitutional. It is impolitic. It holds out a temptation to every debtor to push his speculations to the brink of rashness and recklessness, by affording him a sure refuge, in case of wreck, at the sole hazard of the creditor—eat up his substance, squander the means furnished by his creditors, and, in the end, make his creditor, who is powerless to arrest his recklessness, extravagance, or spendthrift habits, to bear the whole burden, while he riots in the certainty of discharging the obligations of his contracts, at the end of his career.

It is unjust. Equality is equity, every where: if the debtor is allowed to select his own time to dissolve the contract, the creditor ought to have an equal privilege.

It is illusory. It professes to be an uniform law upon the subject of bankruptcy, while it is a special, partial, and particular law upon that subject, for the benefit of the bankrupt alone, and ought to be entitled "an act to destroy the obligation of contracts, whenever the debtor sees proper."

I will not enter into the details of the bill: I throw out these prominent objections in limine; and, if the bill should become the subject of the consideration of the Senate, I shall then enter more fully upon my objections to it. It appears to me, also, defective in its details, in many respects, which it would not be proper for me to obtrude upon the Senate at this time.

I have already intimated that I am in favor of a general and uniform law upon the subject of bankruptcy—acting in the same manner upon the constitutional subject of bankruptcy, alike upon debtors and creditors, and giving to them, alike, the benefits of it.

No such bill as that proposed by the majority of the committee, was ever passed, or, as far as my researches have extended, thought of, in England. This is the first time that it has ever been introduced in this country. It is a novel, untried experiment; and I much fear that it would, if adopted, prove a curse, instead of a blessing, to the honest bankrupt, and plunge him deeper in misery—the result of misfortunes, not of crime.

It would not pass the test of the constitutional ordeal to which it must be subjected. Does any man believe that honest creditors would submit to a law which disrobes them of the rights springing from the solemn obligations of contracts, without a struggle—which separates debtors and creditors into distinct classes, and makes the former the exclusive recipients of special privileges? I cannot think so. The bill, on the face of it, makes such classification, and, regardless of the obligations of contracts, deals with them only to dissolve them, and for that purpose ties up the hands of the creditors during the operation.

My object in submitting the substitute, is, not to prevent the passage of an uniform law upon the subject of bankruptcy, but to promote it, by giving it a constitutional character, and making it uniform. I have already stated my opinion as to the subject of a bankrupt law, and the class of debtors upon whom it can constitutionally operate. All contracts between debtor and creditor, where the debtor is a merchant, banker, or trader, and fails, are included, as well as the rights of the creditor, and the obligations of the debtor growing out of it. The right of the creditor is to obtain the whole property of the debtor, to satisfy the contract. The obligations of the debtor does not include the forfeiture of all the rights which belong to humanity. Honest misfortune has its penalties, which are grievous enough; but it is no part of such penalty to doom the debtor to the most odious slavery that the human imagination can conceive—a slavery a thousand times more deplorable than that of the Helotes of old, the villeins of feudality, or the serfs of modern despotism, the perpetual slavery of debt, which enervates and subdues the mind, at the same time that it condemns the body to a perpetual thraldom, which can look to no emancipation but the last refuge of suffering humanity—the grave. The imprisonment of the person is no part of the obligation of the contract.

The substitute is framed upon the assumption, that, under a law upon the subject of bankruptcy, when the indicia of insolvency have occurred in the conduct of the debtor trader, that the principles of a bankrupt law give to the creditor a right to seize upon the property of such debtor, in a summary manner, for the purpose of distributing the same for the equal benefit of all the creditors. That while it affords to the debtor a right to anticipate such summary proceeding, by a voluntary surrender, it does not take away the right of the creditor by such proceeding, to put a stop to riotous and costly living, spendthrift habits, or rash, reckless, and gambling speculations, before the whole means furnished by the creditors are exhausted, and thus secure something of the wreck for distribution among honest creditors.

It proceeds upon the principle, that when the creditors have obtained all the property of the debtor by his own voluntary act, or their vigilance, and appropriated it their own use, that the debtor, thus deprived of the means of discharging the contract, should be released from its obligation.

I have already declared that I am in favor of passing an uniform law on the subject of bankruptcy. I do not, at present, intend to enter upon the argument in favor of the policy of the measure. I will content myself with remarking, that I consider it necessary for the public, as well as private, interest. An uniform law upon the subject of bankruptcy would be a salutary limitation upon the injudicious extension of the credit system, by taking away from the creditor the alluring temptation to administer to the wild spirit of speculation, and furnish the means for the purpose with too great facility, arising from a reliance upon his superior vigilance, to gain a preference under the general laws regulating the rights of creditors and debtors. It promotes the productive energies of the country, by emancipating the honest debtor from the hopelessness of that most depressing, demoralizing and paralyzing bondage, resulting from the failure attending the disastrous exercise of those energies. It restores to the honest, but unfortunate debtor, hope, and the activity, perseverance, and enterprise which it inspires. It restrains the extravagance of speculation, by subjecting the whole conduct of the debtor to the watchful supervision of the argus eyes of the creditor, and the caution taught, by knowing that the rights of the creditor may be summarily exercised. Thus it exercises silently, but efficiently, a control over the rashness of enterprise, and represses gambling speculations which the natural eagerness of "hastening to grow rich" is too apt to engender. I am inclined to think that the creditor is frequently as much to blame in giving credit, as the debtor in receiving it; and I think that there is much truth in Dr. Johnson's remark: "He that once owes more than he can pay, is often obliged to bribe his creditor to patience by increasing the debt. Worse and worse commodities, at higher and higher prices, are forced upon him. He, impoverished by compulsive traffic, is at last overwhelmed in the common receptacle of misery, by debts which, without his own consent, were accumulated upon his head."

Such bankrupt law as would open the remedies and the benefits under its provisions, alike, or uniformly, to the debtor and the creditor—to both classes—would be mutually advantageous to the honest debtor and to the honest creditor. In case of misfortune, it affords the latter the only chance of ultimate payment, by enabling the former to acquire, by renewed exertions, the means for the purpose. It restores the mutuality of interest between creditor and debtor, severed by bankruptcy.

The bill which I have had the honor of submitting as a substitute for that of the majority, is designed to be an uniform system of bankruptcy. It is no new experiment, but confines itself to the classes of persons, and the subject of bankruptcy, which form the distinctive principles of the English law; it is intended to operate uniformly, or alike, upon the relationships of debtor and creditor, distributing to each the appropriate benefits of the system, and allowing to each the right to invoke its remedies. Its object is to combine simplicity and economy, the promptitude of a summary remedy, with the claims of justice and humanity, and to guard, with equal care, the rights and interests of both debtor and crditor.

It is intended to act both retrospectively and prospectively.

It looks upon the past, not to condemn, but to relieve. The whole land is strewed with the wrecks of bankruptcy, and we cannot look in any direction, without perceiving the "jetsam et flotsam" of trade, cast upon its shores. All must admit the fact, however much they may disagree as to the causes, that this state of things has resulted from the contractions and expansions of the currency; and that the fluctuations growingout of it, have impaired to all business depending on prices, the hazards and vicissitudes incident to commerce and trade. The best energies of the country have been paralyzed; the brightest visions of gain have disappeared; and the wisest and most prudent schemes, uniting public improvement with individual interest, have perished as if by magic, in the universal revulsion that has desolated the country. This bill proposes to cast the mantle of oblivion over the past conduct of the debtor, over his acts which may have been compelled, or the preferences which may have have extorted, in his vain struggles to prolong his existence in the marts of trade. All that it demands from the debtor who seeks its benefits is, that he should honestly surrender what is left, however small, for the general benefit of his creditors. As to the future, it fixes a limitation upon speculation and rashness. It tells the debtor, that if he will go on in desperate recklessness, plunging from one depth to a greater, after prudence dictates its hopelessness, until all his means are squandered, he cannot become an actor in obtaining the benefits of the provisions of this law. He must retain something to distribute among his creditors, and not mock them with "a beggarly account of empty boxes."

This is not the proper time to explain the details of the proposed substitute: I shall content myself with explaining its principles.

The bill is founded upon two plain and equitable principles, applicable uniformly to both debtor and creditor: 1. That, when a debtor who has been engaged in the hazards and casualties, and exposed to the vicissitudes, of trading, becomes unable to pay all his debts in full, his property that remains ought to be equally divided among all his creditors, without preference. 2. That if he has acted honestly, and his creditors wrest from him his property, by compulsory, summary proceedings, or he voluntarily surrenders it, he ought to be discharged from the contract, and to begin the world anew, unembarrassed by the effects of previous misfortune, or inexperience.

It proceeds upon the principle that the object of a law on the subject of bankruptcy is to enable the creditor, in a summary manner, to obtain from a bankrupt trader an equal distribution of his property; and of the debtor to anticipate such procedure by a voluntary surrender, and thereby to obtain a discharge from his contracts.

The bill makes the whole proceeding a judicial proceeding, placed under the jurisdiction of the district courts of the United States, in the States; the Circuit Court, in the District of Columbia; and the supreme or superior courts, in the Territories—to be regulated by the supervision of the courts, in the nature of summary proceedings in equity, or of a master in chancery, appointed by the court. The only officers appointed are, the receiver, to take care of the property until the creditors can meet and choose their agent an assignee. The order of bankruptcy, ipso facto, as in the statute of Henry VIII. vests all the property of the debtor in the assignee, except wearing apparel, implements of trade, and necessary household and kitchen furniture, two cows, and provender, and such other goods and implements as State laws have exempted from execution.

The distinct features of this bill are:

1. It allows both debtor and creditor to become actors in the judicial proceedings, and regulates the proceedings in such case.

This is a new feature in a bankrupt bill, but I conceive not a new principle. Time, which is not only the greatest, but the most enlightened and beneficent reformer, has been gradually moulding the forms of the procedure in cases of bankruptcy in England, to accommodate it them the progress and expansion of the credit system, the purposes of trade, and the spirit of the age. In the reign of the Tudors and the Stuarts, the bankrupt was considered an offender, a criminal. The penalty of death was held over his head, and the forms of procedure were framed almost exclusively for the benefit of the creditor. On the accession of the Hanover dynasty, it gradually assumed a more mild character, and the bankrupt came to be considered as an unfortunate man, entitled to the rights of humanity, and to Christian charities and sympathies. I have predicated this bill upon the assumption that, at the time of the framing of our Constitution, the bankrupt system was the offspring of commerce, and the credit system confined in its operations to the relation of debtor and creditor, where the debtor was a trader, and giving to the creditor a summary remedy to obtain an equal distribution of the property of the debtor, and relieving the honest debtor from his contract. Its design is to suppress fraud, protect the rights of the creditor, to treat the honest bankrupt as merely an unfortunate man, to extract from the procedure every thing of harshness or cruelty, to conform the mode of procedure to the mild and enlightened spirit of the age, to measure out equal justice to both the debtor and creditor class, by dispensing the remedies and benefits of it to each alike.

From the statute of Henry the Eighth down to the present time in England, although the right of the debtor to apply for the remedy has never been sanctioned, yet all the acts which originate the bankrupt proceedings, and give to the creditor the right to apply for the remedy, save one, proceed from the voluntary act of the debtor. The courts of England, previously to our Revolution, had determined that the simple confession of the debtor, that he had committed the act of bankruptcy charged in the commission, was sufficient to sustain the proceedings in bankruptcy against him. This bill carries the same principle only one step further, and allows the bankrupt himself to make such confession the foundation of the proceedings in bankruptcy.

2. The class of debtors who are liable to the compulsory proceedings, or who may resort to the voluntary proceedings, are restrained to merchants, bankers, and traders. I have not dared to extend the power beyond what I conceive was its limit at the time of the adoption of the Constitution. That Constitution takes away from the States any right whatever to impair the obligation of contracts. The Federal Government hath no express authority to do what is denied to the State Governments. It is implied only from the grant of authority to "pass uniform laws upon the subject of bankruptcy." Can the Federal Government, under this grant, assume a right to dissolve the contracts of all the citizens of all the States? Or must such right be restrained to the classes of persons and the kind of contracts and the kind of relationship which were the subjects of a law of bankruptcy in England at the framing of the Constitution? I have thought that the latter was the true limit of Federal power. The bill reported by the majority of the committee is founded upon the right of Congress to dissolve all contracts whatever, when the debtor becomes insolvent; and to correspond with its operation it ought to be entitled "A bill to free the debtor from the obligations of contracts whenever he conceives it for his interest to do so."

3. The compulsory remedies given to the creditor can only be resorted to against merchants, bankers, and those who are technically traders, while the voluntary remedy is given to every debtor who will allege and swear that he has been engaged in trading—and the act declares that every such person shall be deemed a trader liable to the bankrupt law within its purview. Trader is a technical term, well known in the law, and is confined to such persons as have been engaged in the business of buying and selling money or goods for a livelihood. He must both buy and sell. Trading is not a technical word, but has a popular meaning, which embraces all kinds of trafficking or dealing in goods, money, or land—buying or selling. Foreigners have reproached us with being a trafficking nation. The fact exists, but I do not consider it a reproach. There is none who could, upon any fair principle, claim the benefits of the bankrupt system, who could not conscientiously swear that he had been engaged in trading, or, what is equivalent, buying or selling money, commodities, or lands. Congress acting in conformity to all the bankrupt laws of England, have an undoubted discretion to stamp upon such a person the technical word "trader," for the purpose of extending to him its benefits.

It will be thus perceived that the law is designed to be uniform in its action upon debtor and creditor, where the debtor is a trader, and has failed—uniform in its procedure, and uniform in its operation upon the classes of persons who are, by its enactments, declared to be merchants, bankers, and traders.

4. The cumpulsory provisions of the bill are framed to act uniformly upon all such persons as are technically merchants, bankers, or traders. Hence it includes artificial as well as natural persons. It includes all corporations or associations for manufacturing, commercial, insurance, trading, or banking purposes. Corporations are included, because individuals, who are engaged in those matters, are included, so as to make the law uniform.

I am aware that this will give rise to a difference of opinion; and if the Senate should think that corporations ought not to be included, although it will make the bill less acceptable to me, it will not prevent my support, if it does not exclude all the provisions for the benefit of the creditor.

I do not propose to discuss the policy of including corporations. I shall confine myself to a brief explanation of the principles on which I found the right to include them.

Corporations are artificial persons, or legal entities, created in this country solely by the sovereign power, for the public good, as well as private interest. They are endowed with the faculty of limited or perpetual succession, of contracting and being contracted with, of assuming the relation of debtor and creditor, as natural persons; and, like them, they have given to them the power of suing and being sued, impleading and being impleaded, in all cases and courts whatever. Although persons only in a legal capacity, so far as relates to those faculties and powers, they are clothed with the rights and subjected to the responsibilities of natural persons. They are composed of individuals, and are not exempt from their frailties and imperfections, and may be led to deviate from the end of their creation, and may be plunged into bankruptcy like individuals. Does a charter possess the magic power of investing them ipso facto, with privileges which place them beyond the reach of laws which operate upon individuals engaged in the same business and hazards? Our law books tell us, that the charters creating corporations, and the laws made by them in conformity thereto, are "leges sub graviore lege." The decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, (4 Peters R. 514, Providence Bank vs. Billings and Pittman,) establishes, "That the great object of a corporation is, to bestow the character and properties of individuality on a collected and changing body of men. Any privileges which may exempt it from the burden common to individuals, do not flow necessarily from the charter, but must be expressed in it, or they do not exist."

I have endeavored to show that the subject of a bankrupt law is contracts, and the relation between debtor and creditor eminating from contracts; that the class of persons, upon whom it operates, are merchants, bankers, and traders. Corporations and associations of persons are merchants, bankers, and traders. If they become bankrupt, why should the law of bankruptcy fall impotent before them? Can that law be uniform which includes individuals, and leaves corporations, falling in the same category, free. The corporations have the same frailties, are exposed to the same hazards, are prostrated and rendered bankrupt, by the same rashness, imprudence, miscalculation, and vicissitudes, as individvals. Monopoly is the legitimate offspring of banking and trading corporations. Why then should they be shielded, by privilege, from the claims of creditors, while they are entitled to the remedies as creditors, given by the law? Establish a privileged sanctuary, where the general law becomes powerless, and will not corporations and associations of persons, become the asylum of fraud, the hiding place of dishonesty, and the rogue's last refuge? The country is shingled over with corporations already, and under such an immunity they will increase and multiply so as to exclude the natural man from all business.

Will it be said that we cannot bind the corporations created by States? Are they not subject to our general laws? Are they not bound by the general principles contained in the provisions of this bill against preferences, frauds, &c.? Cannot Congress bind them by their general laws, their revenue laws, &c.? To what would such a principle lead? Have gentlemen reflected upon it? The principle which I have assumed in the substitute, and which I believe to be the only sound one, is, that where Congress have a constitutional right to legislate, they may bind artificial persons, whether deriving their authority from themselves or any one of the States, as well as natural persons, by their laws. If they cannot bind artificial persons, it must be because they cannot bind natural persons.

It may be objected that sovereign States are members of the corporations which are included in the bill. It may be so. But this does not affect the question of constitutional power. It is a mere question of policy; and, as I have before intimated, I leave that to the judgment of the Senate. But who will contend that a State, by granting a charter to itself, or itself and its citizens, can put such corporation beyond the operation of the constitutional legislation of Congress—create an imperium in imperio? This question has been put at rest by the solemn decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, in 9 Wheat. 904, the Bank of the United States vs. the Planters' Bank of Georgia. That court decided that "whenever a Government becomes a partner in any trading company, it divests itself, so far as concerns the transactions of that company, of its sovereign character, and takes that of a private citizen. Instead of communicating to it its privileges and its prerogatives, it descends to a level with those with whom it associates itself, and takes the character which belongs to its associates, and to the business which is to be transacted. Thus many States who have an interest in banks, are not suable in their own courts, yet they never exempt the corporation from being sued."

It may also be objected that there is no precedent for including corporations in the operation of the bankrupt law. Perhaps it is so. But the very nature of a bankrupt system is so plastic as to the modus operandi, that it may be extended to include them. If this be not correct, the bill of the majority falls to the ground; for no distinct precedent can be found for allowing its benefits upon the act of the debtor alone, and to the debtor alone. If I have been successful in my efforts, I have shown that the classes of persons who shall be deemed technical merchants, bankers, or traders, belong to legislative wisdom, to determine from time to time, so as to render the bankrupt system an effectual adjunct of the commerce, trade, and credit system. So far from doubting the power of Congress to include corporations, it is more reasonable to doubt the policy of excluding them, when they are technically and really merchants, bankers, or traders. Such an exclusion has the appearance of breaking its uniformity, without sufficient cause.

Again: It will be contended that by excluding such corporations and associations as are exempted from the bankrupt law by their charters, or the express legislation of the States, the uniformity of the law is destroyed, and such exemption renders it unconstitutional. My answer is, that the law must be uniform upon the classes singled out for its action; you may exempt either persons or corporations, in certain categories, from its operation, although, without such exemption, they would fall within the general description The law of Congress, establishing an uniform system of bankruptcy, in 1800, as well as all the subsequent laws proposed in this body, and all laws on the subject of bankruptcy, show this.

The discussion, however, on all these matters belongs, to the policy and the details of the bill, and I shall be ready at the appropriate time to submit my views on these matters, more at large.

In conclusion, I have to remark, that I have endeavored to discharge my duty, as one of the members of the Judiciary Committee, in preparing and presenting an uniform law upon the subject of bankruptcy. I submit it as a substitute for that prepared by the majority. In doing so, I submit it to the wisdom of the Senate, for correction and amendment. I am not wedded to any of its provisions, or unwilling to adopt any alterations or amendments that may be suggested. I announce, however, that I cannot support any partial, particular or special law, which breaks up the uniformity of the law of bankruptcy, into separate laws for the debtor, creditor, and corporations.

I hope I may not be charged with enmity to banks by the advocates of the bill proposed by the majority, because I have included corporations in the compulsory clause. Was I actuated by such feelings, I would support the bill proposed by the majority. I believe no more effectual mode could be devised by human ingenuity to prostrate the banks, than to authorize their debtors to dissolve the obligation of their contracts with them without payment.

It is proper for me to observe, that in discussing this subject, I do not intend to be drawn off into any personal or political discussion, unless compelled by high and imperious necessity. Such discussions ought not to be mingled with the claims of suffering humanity, or grave questions of policy, naturally connected with the adoption of a measure which rises superior to the ephemeral politics of the day.

SPEECH OF MR. NORVELL, OF MICHIGAN.

In Senate, Wednesday, May 20, 1840—On the bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy, and on the substitute embracing voluntary and involuntary bankruptcy, and also corporations.

Mr. NORVELL said that his honorable friend from North Carolina, [Mr. STRANGE,] in the learned and able speech which he had yesterday delivered on the bill and the substitute before the Senate, had, towards its close, expressed doubts whether Congress had the constitutional power to pass a bankrupt law which would have a retrospective operation on pre-existing contracts.

[Mr. STRANGE explained, and said that his doubts had reference to the retrospective operation of such a law upon previous acts of bankruptcy.]

Mr. NORVELL resumed. He did not precisely comprehend the explanation; but it was sufficient for the purpose he had in view, to state that the power of Congress had been questioned to pass laws of bankruptcy which would operate on contracts existing prior to their passage. If this doctrine were correct; if the debts of individuals which are now due all over the country, and which they are unable to pay, could not be reached and extinguished by a bankrupt law, on the surrender of whatever property they at present possess, such a law would afford no relief to their sufferings and distresses. No benefit could accrue to the nation from a bankrupt law merely prospective in its operation on future contracts. He should vote for no such law. But, in his judgment, no doubt ought to exist as to the unqualified, unlimited, and express power of Congress over the whole subject of bankruptcy. The object of a bankrupt law was to apply the entire proceeds of the property of the debtor to the payment of his creditor, to relieve the debtor from all duress, to set him free, and to protect him in his future acquisitions of property. On this subject he should produce authorities of a very conclusive character. In 1827, when a bankrupt bill was under discussion in the Senate, Mr. REED of Mississippi moved an amendment to the first section, declaring that nothing contained in that section, nor any other provision of the bill, "should extend, or be construed to extend, to any contract made before the passage and promulgation of this act." In considering the question, "does Congress possess the power to provide, by a bankrupt law, for the discharge of contracts existing anterior to the passage of that law," Mr. Berrien said:

"That Congress possesses a power over this subject, which is co-extensive with the provisions of this bill, and which does not belong to the States; in direct terms, that it possesses the power to provide, by a bankrupt law for the discharge of pre-existing as well as future contracts, may be satisfactorily proved. It results from the express terms of the Constitution; and that both affirmatively and negatively; affirmatively by the grant of power to Congress to establish uniform laws on the subject of bankruptcies; and negatively, by the denial to the States of the right to pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts."

He goes on to observe:

"With a perfect knowledge that the effect and operation of statutes of bankruptcy, in other countries, were to discharge the debtor from pre-existing contracts; with the subject of the inviolability of contracts thus obviously presented to their minds, since they were engaged in restraining the power of the States in this very particular, is it possible to conceive that the framers of the Constitution would have given to Congress a general control over the subject of bankruptcy, unlimited, except in the requisition of uniformity, if they had intended to restrict its exercise in the manner contended for by the Senator from Mississippi? The power, now denied, was affirmed by both Houses of Congress in the bankrupt law of 1800; and, more than once since that period, has the same principle been asserted by the Senate."

The Supreme Court has also repeatedly decided, that the power to pass bankrupt laws retrospective in their operation, was constitutional; and Chief Justice Marshall has laid down the doctrine, that the power of Congress over the subject of bankruptcy was both unlimited and supreme, and had declared that this principle had never been questioned. But, sir, the Senate itself, at the close of the debate on the amendment of Mr. Reed, has given the most decisive judgment upon the subject. That amendment received but sixteen votes, while thirty-two votes were recorded against it. Among those who thus voted to reject the amendment, are found the names of Mr. Benton, Mr. Berrien, General Harrison, Mr. Hayne, the present Vice President, Mr. King, Mr. Van Buren, and Mr. Woodbury. The power of Congress to embrace pre-existing contracts in a bankrupt law was, therefore, in his judgment, conclusively established, and not hereafter to be drawn into question.

Mr President, continued Mr. N. my deep conviction is, that no legislation, no measure, no combination of measures that we can adopt, would afford one tenth part of the relief to the country which will be secured to it by the passage of a uniform law of bankruptcy. But after the able and eloquent speeches to which the Senate have listened, on this subject, I can hope to shed no new light upon it. The vicissitudes and disasters of business of all kinds have produced among all classes of men so much indebtedness, such extensive distress, a paralysis so universal, that it becomes every member alive to this state of things to contribute his efforts, however feeble they may prove, towards the removal of the evils under which the country is suffering. It has been often and truly said that thousands of our fellow-citizens have, by misfortune—by excess of overtrading—by the spirit of speculation—by miscarriages in business, become hopelessly embarrassed. They are unable to relieve themselves from the burdens under which they groan. Their energies are paralyzed—their hopes and hearts are crushed beneath the pressure. It is not an extravagant estimate to say that not fewer than two hundred thousand of our most active, intelligent, and enterprising citizens, from twenty-five to fifty years of age, are actual bankrupts at this moment. Upon their industry and exertions depend the subsistence and comfort of at least a million more of their connections. Wives and children, brothers and sisters, fathers and mothers, share in the mortification and distress. The class of citizens to whom I allude, if relieved from their present condition—if emancipated from the debts which chain them down to the earth, would not only be enabled to support and educate their families, but to contribute to the enhancement of the wealth and prosperity of the country. The desired relief can only be afforded by the passage of a general bankrupt law, embracing all, of whatever pursuit, who require to be restored to a free exercise of their industry and their business faculties.

Without a measure of this kind, the debtor, whose obligations are beyond his ability to pay, is left without means and without hope; an outcast and a reproach in the world; mortified, humiliated, shunned by others, and degraded in his own estimation; incapable of holding up his head; his wife and children participating in the desolation of his feelings; suffering for want of bread, and with no light beyond the horizon to brighten their future prospects.

Such a debtor is, indeed, doomed to drag out a miserable existence. The gloom of a despairing mind casts a cloud over his whole life. His condition stimulates to intemperance. It preys upon his health and spirits. He is broken down in constitution and mind, and brought to a premature grave, leaving a widowed and an orphan family in the depths of despondency.

The insolvent laws of the States afford no adequate relief. They not only take away all the existing property of the debtor, but subject all that he may acquire hereafter to the payment of his past debts. They afford freedom to his person only within the limits of his own State. If he has occasion to travel beyond its boundaries, he is liable to be pursued by the merciless creditor, aided by the harpies of the law; to be arrested and imprisoned among strangers; his family outraged in their feelings, and deprived of his services for their subsistence.

The process of voluntary bankruptcy affords an effective and lasting relief to the debtor, upon the honest surrender of his effects for the benefit of his creditors, and protects his future acquisitions of property. He can begin the world anew.

The process of involuntary bankruptcy, confined to the merchant and trader, enables the creditor to arrest the wasteful indiscretion and extravagance of the debtor, and strengthens the security of the contract between them. It secures a more certain and full discharge of the debt, and again leaves the debtor free to engage in his accustomed pursuits. Nor does this compulsory species of bankruptcy, as applied to merchants and traders, prevent that class of citizens from seeking the benefit of the voluntary provision. Both the bill and the substitute allow all persons to avail themselves of voluntary bankruptcy. The feature of involuntary bankruptcy is limited to merchants, for the mutual benefit of the creditor and debtor. The same reasons do not require the farmer to be subjected to this process from his creditor.

In relation to banks, no other measure than a bankrupt law can be adopted by this Government, to secure a sound currency in bank notes to the country. Of the perfect power of Congress on this point, and indeed over the whole subject of bankruptcy, he had never entertained the least doubt. The language of the Constitution is explicit and unqualified, leaving no loop to hang a question on. The excessive issues of banks, the evils of an irredeemable paper currency, the mischiefs of its ever varying value, can only be effectually restrained and corrected by a law of bankruptcy. He had the highest authorities to sustain his position on this subject—authorities which had never been questioned.

In answer to inquiries propounded to him by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. CALHOUN,] then chairman of the Committee on National Currency in the House of Representatives, Mr. Dallas, the Secretary of the Treasury, in a report dated March 19, 1816, recommended the adoption of measures to secure the payment of the dues to the Government in specie, Treasury notes, or the notes of such banks as redeemed their bills with gold or silver. In that report, he said that, "if it ever should become necessary to increase the force of the measures which he had suggested, provision might be made, under the constitutional power of Congress, to subject all banks and bankers, failing to pay their notes according to the terms of the contract, to a seizure of their estates and effects for the benefit of their creditors, as in a case of legal bankruptcy."

In a letter of Mr. Crawford, when Secretary of the Treasury, on the exportation of the coins of the United States, addressed to the Committee on Finance in the Senate, on the 29th of December, 1818, he says that, whatever may be the result of the experiment to preserve the convertibility of bank notes into current specie, until that experiment is tried,

"No legislative interference is conceived to be necessary, except for the enforcement of the obligation on the part of the banks to discharge their notes in specie when demanded. This can be most certainly effected, by considering and punishing, as an act of bankruptcy, any attempt on the part of a bank to circulate its notes whilst it refuses to discharge them in specie, or the notes of other banks in the same situation."

In a report made to the House of Representatives, on the currency, the 12th of February, 1820, Mr. Crawford again says, that

"Whenever the agency of banks should be employed in furnishing part of the circulation, a refusal or omission to discharge their notes, on demand, in the national currency, should be treated as an act of bankruptcy."

These distinguished statesmen entertained no doubt of the constitutionality of such a measure. They believed it to be the only efficient check upon the tendency of the local banks to issue and force a vicious currency upon the country.

These are not the only authorities in favor of applying the bankrupt principle to banks. In February, 1827, Mr. BRANCH, pending the bankrupt bill in this body, moved to include banking corporations as fit subjects for the coercive and restraining operation of the bill. He said that the banks of the South had given circulation to a depreciated paper currency, which subjected the people to great losses, and that measures ought to be adopted to enforce a just disposition of their effects for the benefit of their numerous creditors. Merchants and individual brokers had been brought within the pains and penalties of the bill; and why should not banking corporations, failing or refusing to redeem their debts, their worthless paper, be subjected to the same consequences? Should Congress legislate with a view to the weaker portions of the community, and leave its laws silent, or with the strength of the cobweb, as regarded the stronger portions? Banks had weighed down, with a merciless oppression, the community of which he was a member. Let the Senate lay the axe at the root of the evil, and pave the way to a cordial acceptance of a bankrupt law throughout the country, by making it instrumental in restraining those arbitrary and aristocratic moneyed institutions, which were now privileged beyond the pale of the law. If they were not checked, they would shake the fabric of our liberties, and bring down ruin upon some of the most meritorious classes of the country.

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said that the amendment was a rational plan for the relief of the people. Banks refuse to pay their bills with impunity. Why should they be exempted, any more than individual bankers, or merchants, from the consequences? There was no difficulty in applying the principle of bankruptcy to banks. Their presidents and directors, whenever they commit an act of bankruptcy, could as easily be subjected to the consequences as any other individuals. They are the responsible persons. More evils had sprung up from the conduct of the banks, than from the invasions of enemies, or from the commercial disasters of Europe. They were the destroying angels, which had passed over our country with terror and devastation.

Mr. BARTON coincided in the views which had been expressed in favor of the amendment. Banks were no more the objects of protection and care to the State Legislatures than were merchants and others. To bring banks under a bankrupt law, was no more an invasion of State sovereignty, than to bring the merchants and other citizens of the States under its operation. There was no difficulty in the case.

Mr. REED said, that to declare a bank to be bankrupt, did not forfeit its charter. The only effect of the amendment would be to compel the banks to pay their debts. It did not affect the rights of the States.

Mr. VAN BUREN and others opposed the amendment, on the ground that it was an interference with State sovereignty, and an indirect way of preventing the States from granting bank charters. They maintained that the penalty of bankruptcy, in the case of banks, could be brought to operate on no person, the directors and officers being only their hired agents, and properly exempt from the penalty of bankruptcy. The amendment was voted down; but it was sustained by the votes of such men as Mr. Macon, Mr. John Randolph, Mr. Benton, Mr. Smith of South Carolina, Judge White of Tennessee, and Mr. Branch, renowned in the political history of the country for their devotion to State rights and State sovereignty. Mr. Van Buren has changed his views upon this subject. Ten years' experience, the renewed suspension of specie payments by the banks in a state of profound peace, and the consequent derangement of all the pecuniary and financial affairs of the country, induced him, after he became President, to recommend to Congress the propriety and importance of a uniform law concerning bankruptcies of corporations and other bankers, as a salutary check on the issues of paper money, and an effectual remedy to the citizen, in a way at once equal in all parts of the Union, and fully authorized by the Constitution.

But, sir, I cannot concur in the idea, that the banks may be taken by the State Legislatures, in their discretion, from under the operation of the bankrupt law. Reflection has satisfied me that such a provision would not only, as has been justly said by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN,] destroy the uniformity of the law, but would defeat the end it has in view, so far as regards corporations. We have seen the influence exercised by banks over many of our State Legislatures. We have seen their repeated suspensions of specie payments, their acts of insolvency, their violations of all their charter obligations, sanctioned in the legislative halls of their respective States. We could not expect that the same influence would not be effective in inducing such similar State action as would take the banks from the operation of this law. It would then have failed to restrain excessive issues. It would have failed to prevent suspensions. It would have failed to secure to the people a solid paper currency. I would rather see the provision entirely stricken out, than that it should pass with a discretionary authority vested in the State Legislatures to relieve the banks from its operation.

In relation to the inclusion of farmers and mechanics in a bankrupt bill, he entertained no difficulty. He would not apply the compulsory principle to them. It was not necessary. The Constitution specified no particular class as entitled to the exclusive benefit of a law of bankruptcy; and it was only by a resort to professional and technical ingenuity, by a reference to the darker ages of Venice and England, that such a law was attempted to be limited to the merchant and trader. If a bill so restricted should pass, it would not reach the evils under which the country was suffering. It would be a partial law: it would be neither uniform nor equal in its effects. The vivifying principle of relief ought to be extended to all; to the cottage of the farmer and the humble dwelling of the mechanic, as well as to the princely palace of the merchant. In the origin of the insolvent and bankrupt principle, it was first applied to the mass of the people. "The first insolvent law that was ever passed," says an eloquent statesman, "was applied by the conscript fathers of Rome. When the people refused to fight the enemy, because they were laboring under oppressive debts, a law was passed to relieve them from their obligations. They returned to their ranks, beat the enemy, and saved Rome." The example of Republican Rome was entitled to more weight with us than that of either Venice or England.

After all, Mr. President, with the public voice, and the cries of distress, which have reached the bar of this Senate, vibrating on our ears; with the universal expression of public sentiment in my own State, and the unanimous vote of her Legislature on this subject, before me, I could not refrain from pressing the passage, before we adjourn, of some general bankrupt law, which will afford the relief to our suffering fellow-citizens, which their necessities, and the wants of the country, demand. No doubting the expediency of embracing both banks and the involuntary principle in the bill, and having no constitutional difficulties as to our power on the subject, I shall, in the first place, vote to include both. The essential and most valuable feature of any bankrupt act, is that which will enable the debtor to relieve himself, by a voluntary application for its benefit; and if I cannot obtain all that, in my judgment, a bill should embrace, I shall feel compelled to vote for the best that can be obtained, if it shall be such as to secure the relief due to a distressed and suffering people.

SPEECH OF MR. PIERCE,

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE,

In Senate, Friday, May 1, 1840—Upon claims for seven years' half pay, and five years' full pay, under certain resolutions of the old Congress. Several bills for the relief of Captain William Williams, and others, being the special order of the day—

Mr. PIERCE said: When these bills were postponed, and made the order for to-day, I hoped that I might be able to arrange, with somewhat more system than other pressing engagements, and the state of my health, have permitted me to do, the facts and views which I desired to present to the Senate. I have, however, examined the cases immediately under consideration, with such care, that I trust I shall be able to make my objections understood.

The few remarks, which I took occasion to submit when the bills were reported from the committee, may, I am sensible, have struck gentlemen as out of place, and somewhat too sweeping in their character. My first object (doubting whether I would be able to take any part in the debate) was to bring the claims, at that early stage, to the notice of other Senators, who, on former occasions, I knew had not been indifferent to the subject. How far facts, not controverted, and irresistible inferences, justify the remark then made—that among all claims of this class that have been allowed by Congress within the last thirty-four years, and those now pending in both Houses, hardly one can be found having any good foundation, either in law or in the broadest equity—I shall now attempt to show. The first case upon the calendar, or indeed all, are comparatively of little importance, although to liquidate them, will probably require not a less sum than from $25,000 to $40,000; but any one of them is of vast consequence, as establishing principles upon which we will legislate, and placing upon the statute book a precedent that will be followed by those who may come after us. It is a fact as notorious as it is remarkable, that precedents are of no weight, when produced in favor of the Government, but almost conclusive against it.

I have not, Mr. President, devoted my time to this question, without being fully aware of the great difficulty there is in gaining the attention of Senators to subjects of this nature. Out of this circumstance have unquestionably sprung some of the acknowledged and growing errors of our legislation. The truth is, (and it may as well be told,) we are so much engrossed in the discussion of certain leading abstract principles, or prominent political topics, which involve to no small extent the success of the two parties in this country, and consequently excite the prejudices and passions, and call into exercise the vigorous exertions of both, that we have been careless in our legislation in matters of less apparent magnitude. This was especially the case while the Treasury was overflowing, when the question was, where we could appropriate; not what, in a free Government, it always should be, how we could economize? While we have stood like gladiators in the arena, with foot advanced, and eye intent, whenever a subject having a political bearing has been moved, we have hardly turned a careless ear to the progress of private legislation, and often have poured out our treasure in profusion, scarcely caring to inquire why or wherefore.

In illustration of this, I will refer to the act of March 3d, 1837, bearing the captivating, but false title, of "An act for the more equitable administration of the navy pension fund;" an act, which I believe every man deplores; an act under which that noble fund, amounting to more than eleven hundred thousand dollars, has been, as it were in an instant, most shamefully dissipated, and nearly exhausted. Sir, I have never seen the first man in this chamber, who professed to know when that bill passed. This is an individual case, a strong case I admit; but who does not know of many similar cases of less magnitude?

To illustrate the importance of the general subject of the claims of the heirs of Revolutionary officers for seven years' half pay, and the commutation of five years' full pay, I state now in advance, a few striking facts, which I hope may have the effect to secure the attention of Senators for the little time that I propose to occupy the floor. From 1794 to 1828, the first thirty-four years after this class of cases ceased to be allowed, and adjusted at the Department, only four cases received the sanction of Congress——one in 1798, one in 1808, one in 1812, and one in 1816 From this last point of time the matter slumbered for twelve years. It is probable that no claims were presented; if they were, they were rejected, as they should have been. But now commenced a new order of things. The character of the evidence required to establish the rights was modified. The burden of proof, instead of being left upon the claimant, was cast upon the Government, and the consequence has been precisely what a sensible man would expect, under the circumstances. We took a new departure, and we have gone on in an unchecked career. The claims, instead of being diminished, have increased in almost an arithmetical progression. In 1828, three bills were passed; in 1830, five; in 1832, twelve; in 1833, eleven; in 1834, twenty-three; in 1836, eight; and in 1838, the last session when they were acted upon, twenty-four.

Thus, although but four bills of this character received the sanction of Congress during the thirty-four years immediately after the expiration of the last extension act, you have from 1828 to 1838 inclusive, passed eighty-six bills, and paid out of your Treasury under them the sum of three hundred and thirteen thousand eight hundred and three dollars and twenty-seven cents. These facts can hardly fail to strike Senators as extraordinary upon the face of them. Still, if the claims were well founded, and the bills have been passed upon competent and satisfactory evidence of the fact, we ought, I admit, not to halt, but to go forward; for the cases now before us are as good as those that have preceded them. All I ask is, that we pause here, and well ascertain the grounds upon which we are proceeding—that we pause now, before we can see the end of the beginning, and cast a glance forward to ascertain what must be the ending, if we require the parol evidence of the claimants, after this long lapse of time, to be rebutted by the record evidence of the Government.

I am not insensible, Mr. President, of the advantages with which claims of this character always come before Congress. They are supposed to be based upon services for which no man entertains a higher estimate than myself—services beyond all praise and above all price; but while warm and glowing with the glorious recollections which a recurrence to that period of our history can never fail to awaken, while we cherish with mingled emotions of pride and reverence, affection and gratitude, the memory of those brave men who are no longer with us; while we provide with a liberal hand for such as survive, and for the widows of those who are deceased; while we would accord to the heirs, whether in the second or third generation, every dollar to which they can establish a just claim, I trust we shall not, in the strong current of our sympathies, and in the full flow of generous feeling, forget what becomes us in our places here, as the descendants of such men. They would teach us to legislate upon our judgment, upon our sober sense of right, and not upon our impulses or our sympathies. No, sir; we may act in this way, if we choose, when dispensing our own means; but we are not at liberty to do it when dispensing the means of our constituuents.

If we were to legislate upon our sympathies—yet more I will admit—if we were to yield to that sense of just and grateful remuneration which presses itself upon every man's heart, there would be scarcely a limit for our bounty; the whole Exchequer could not answer the demand. To the patriotism, the courage, and the sacrifices, of the people of that day, we owe, under Providence, all that we now most highly prize, and what we shall transmit to our children as the richest legacy they can inherit. The war of the Revolution, it has been justly remarked, was not a war of armies merely—it was the war of nearly a whole people, and such a people as the world had never before seen, in a death struggle for liberty.

The losses, sacrifices, and sufferings of that period, were common to all classes and all conditions of life. Those who remained at home suffered hardly less than those who entered upon the active strife. In every part of the country, at the commencement of that struggle, and afterwards—

> ——"there were sudden partings, such as press
> The life from out young hearts."

The aged father and mother underwent not less than the son, who would have been the comfort and stay of their declining years, now called to perform a higher duty—to follow the standard of his bleeding country. The young mother, with her helpless children, excites not less deeply our sympathies, when we behold her contending with want, and dragging out years of weary and toilsome days and anxious nights, than the husband in the field following the fortunes of our arms, without the common habiliments to protect his person, or requisite sustenance to uphold his nature. Sir, I never think of that patient, enduring, self-sacrificing army, which crossed the Delaware in December, 1777, marching barefooted upon the frozen ground to encounter the foe, and leaving blood upon their foot prints for miles, or their sufferings during the terrible winter of 1777 and 1778, without involuntarily inquiring where were then their families? Who lit up the cheerful fire upon their hearths? Who spoke to them the word of comfort and encouragement? Nay, sir; who furnished protection from the rigors of winter, and brought to them the necessary means of subsistence?

The true and simple answer to these questions would disclose an amount of suffering and anguish, mental and physical, such as might not have been found in the ranks of our armies, even in the hour which most severely tried that fortitude, which never faltered, and the power of endurance, that seemed to know no limit. All this no man feels more deeply than I do; but they were common sacrifices in a common cause, ultimately crowned with the reward of liberty. They have an everlasting claim upon our gratitude, and are destined, as I trust, to exert an abiding influence, by the way of example, upon our latest posterity. They have, however, let it be remembered, nothing to do with our legislation on the present occasion.

The claims come from heirs, and assume to be grounded upon an equitable administration of resolutions now barred by acts of limitation. This assumtion, I trust, we shall be able calmly and fairly to examine

If the officer came here in indigence, I could hardly find it in my heart to withhold any bounty that might be necessary for the comfort of his declining years; but alas! sir, the men who performed the service, no longer present themselves at your door. And I desire here to protest against any special claim of their heirs to our sympathies. If they have rights, acknowledge them when substantiated; but I, for one, shall give them no preference from the mere circumstance that they are the children or descendants of Revolutionary officers. It would be against the genius of the Government for which those men expended their fortunes, their energies, and many of them their lives. They intended that no superiority should be acknowledged for the man, except that which he established for himself. If the heir has sustained the character of a gallant and worthy ancestor, he will reap his reward as other men reap theirs for like conduct. If, with all the influence of sound instruction and elevated example, he has disgraced a line of noble ancestry, so much the deeper the condemnation he will receive from a people, who acknowledge no claims to consideration but those based upon individual merit and virtuous conduct.

Mr. President, sixty-years have elapsed since the passage of the resolutions of the Continental Congress, which are the basis of these claims. The subject of making suitable provision for the officers of the army of the Revolution, was one of the deepest and most intense interest, not only to the officers themselves, but to the country generally, from 1778 down to the passage of the commutation resolution of 1783.

My observation at home, and still more my experience here, teaches me that individuals who have substantial claims against the Government, do not often remain long in ignorance of their rights. I desire to be informed how it has happened that these claims have slumbered through this long period; and I demand a full and satisfactory explanation of the delay. The noble men of that day understood perfectly the provision that had been made for them: it was made upon their own suggestion, and the earnest representations of General Washington in their behalf.

These claims are of two classes, one under the resolutions of May 15, 1778, and August 24, 1780, which provided that seven years' half pay should be given to the widows or orphan children of officers who had then died, or should thereafter die in the service, the other under the resolutions of October 21, 1780, and of March 22, 1783. To avoid confusion, I shall consider particularly that large class of claims arising under the last, although my general remarks will be equally applicable to both.

The resolution of October 21, 1780, at the second important change that took place in the arrangement of the army after its establishment, provided that the officers who were reduced by that arrangement, as well as the officers who continued to serve to the end of the war, should be entitled "to half pay during life." That this provision was made under very peculiar circumstances, is matter of history, to which it is unnecessary for me particularly to advert. How it was received in the country, is known to every Senator. It was regarded with jealousy and dissatisfaction, not only by the citizens, but by the soldiers, who, in their sphere, had endured equal hardships, made equal sacrifices, and encountered equal dangers. They looked upon it as establishing, prospectively, at that early period of the Republic, a privileged and pensioned order, inconsistent with the equal rights for which they had been contending, and at variance with the genius and spirit of such a Government as they hoped to see established and maintained.

Sir, the officers were neither insensible nor unmindful of this feeling; they had made every sacrifice for liberty; but there was a sacrifice they could not make; their fortunes, their lives, were comparatively nothing; but they could never think of forfeiting the good opinion of the people, with whom and for whom they had served, for, as I have before observed, it was a war of nearly a whole people; and this, as every body knows, was the secret of ultimate success—and this, as every nation will know, shall be the grand guarantee of our liberty in every future contest, and in all coming time, against foreign foes.

They perceived what was the public sentiment, and, gallant, patriotic men as they were, they yielded to it; a compromise was the consequence—a compromise satisfactory to all men in all stations. What was the moving cause of that compromise? A memorial from the officers themselves, which I feel bound to notice, out of a deep reverence to the noble spirits that prompted it; as worthy of being repeated not only here, but in the ear of every American citizen; as worthy of being contrasted with the memorials which, within the last ten years, have come here, complaining of distress, and asking for relief in the midst of peace and security, affluence and ease. This paper, with Gen. Knox as its first signer, breathes such sentiments as the following:

"Humbly sheweth, that we, the officers of the army of the United States, in behalf of ourselves and our brethren, the soldiers, beg leave, with all proper deference and respect, freely to state to Congress, the supreme power of the United States, the great distress under which we labor.

"At this period of the war, it is with peculiar pain we find ourselves constrained to address your august body on matters of a pecuniary nature. We have struggled with our difficulties year after year, under the hope that each would be the last; but we have been disappointed. We find our embarrassments thicken so fast, and have become so complex, that many of us are unable to go farther. In this exigence, we apply to Congress for relief, as our head and sovereign.

"We complain that shadows have been offered to us, while the substance has been gleaned by others.

"Our distresses are now brought to a point. We have borne all that men can bear. Our property is expended; our private resources are at an end; and our friends are wearied out and disgusted with our incessant applications. We, therefore, most seriously and earnestly beg that a supply of money may be forwarded to the army as soon as possible. The uneasiness of the soldiers, for want of pay, is great and dangerous, and further experiments on their patience may have fatal effects.

"We regard the act of Congress respecting half pay, as an honorable and just recompense for several years' hard service, in which the health and fortunes of the officers have been worn down and exhausted. We see with chagrin the odious point of view in which the citizens of too many of the States endeavor to place the men entitled to it. We hope, for the honor of human nature, that there are none so hardened in the sin of ingratitude as to deny the justice of the reward. We have reason to believe that the objection generally is against the mode only. To prevent, therefore, any altercations and distinctions which may tend to injure that harmony which we ardently desire may reign throughout the community, we are willing to commute the half pay pledged, for full pay for a certain number of years, or for a sum in gross, as shall be agreed to by the committee sent with this address. And in this we pray, that the disabled officers and soldiers, with the widows and orphans of those who have expended, or may expend, their lives in the service of their country, may be fully comprehended. We also beg that some mode may be pointed out for the eventual payment of those soldiers who are the subjects of the resolution of Congress of the 15th May, 1778."

This memorial was dated at Cantonment, Hudson river, 1782. No immediate action of Congress followed, and in the month of March both the army and the country was thrown into the highest state of excitement and alarm by four publications, addressed by one of the most able men and powerful writers of his time (himself an officer of rank) to his brethren. He commences his first article thus:

"A fellow soldier, whose interests and affections bind him strongly to you, whose past sufferings have been as great, and whose future fortune may be as desperate as yours, would beg leave to address you.

"Like many of you, he loved private life, and left it with regret. He left it, determined to retire from the field with the necessity that called him to it, and not till then—not till the enemies of his country, the slaves of power, and the hirelings of injustice, were compelled to abandon their schemes, and acknowledge America as terrible in arms as she had been humble in remonstrance. With this object in view, he has long shared in your toils and mingled in your dangers. He has felt the cold hand of poverty without a murmur, and has seen the insolence of wealth without a sigh. But, too much under the direction of his wishes, and sometimes weak enough to mistake desire for opinion, he has till lately, very lately, believed in the justice of his country. He hoped, that as the clouds of adversity scattered, and as the sunshine of peace and better fortune broke in upon us, the coldness and severity of Government would relax, and that, more than justice, that gratitude would blaze forth upon those hands which had upheld her in the darkest stages of her passage from impending servitude to acknowledged independence. But faith has its limits as well as temper, and there are points beyond which neither can be stretched, without sinking into cowardice, or plunging into credulity.

"Let it be represented in language that will neither dishonor you by its rudeness, nor betray you by its fears, what has been promised by Congress, and what has been performed—how long and how patiently you have suffered—how little you have asked, and how much of that little has been denied. Tell them that though you were the first, and would wish to be the last, to encounter danger; though despair itself can never drive you into dishonor, it may drive you from the field; that the wound, often irritated, and never healed, may at length become incurable; and that the slightest mark of indignity from Congress now must operate like the grave, and part you forever; that in any political event, the army has its alternative. If peace, that nothing shall separate you from your arms but death; if war, that courting the auspices, and inviting the direction of your illustrious leader, you will retire to some unsettled country, smile in your turn, and 'mock when their fear cometh on.'"

This was followed by other and yet more inflammatory appeals, urging the officers not to lay aside their swords until suitable provision should be made. Whether necessary or not, it is well known that all the energy and moral power of the Commander-in-chief was promptly put forth to silence murmurs and restore tranquillity. This is strikingly shown by his address, delivered to the officers assembled on the 15th March, 1783. At this meeting General Gates presided, and the resolutions which were unanimously adopted on the occasion justified the confidence that had been reposed in the most brave, chivalrous, high-toned, and devoted band of men, who ever drew swords in a common cause. The sixth resolution is in the following words:

"Resolved, unanimously, That the officers of the American army view with abhorrence, and reject with disdain, the infamous propositions contained in a late anonymous address to the officers of the army; and resent, with indignation, the secret attempts of some unknown persons to collect the officers together in a manner totally subversive of all discipline and good order."

I have been thus particular for two reasons: first, because it is well to be refreshed in this history, so honorable to the cause, and to the distinguished actors in that mighty drama; and secondly to show that it is not in the nature of things, that the provisions of the resolution of March, 1783, adopted in the midst of this high excitement and intense solicitude, could have escaped the notice of any officer embraced in its purview.

Now, sir, I pause here to inquire of the honorable Senator who reported these bills, what are the rules of evidence which have guided the action of the committee in deciding upon applications of this character?

[Mr. STURGEON replied, that when the officer, or the heirs of the officer, proved satisfactorily, by parol, or record evidence, that the officer was reduced by the arragement of 1780, or that he served to the close of the war, and the Government could not produce evidence of payment, the committee reported a bill.]

On these grounds, then, the committee presume non-payment; and it is to this presumption that I object, as both dangerous and unjust. So extremely probable is it that all claims founded in right have been adjusted, and so fallible and uncertain, at best, is all human testimony, after a lapse of sixty years, that I believe every gentleman will concur with me in saying, that we ought to require the cause of this long delay, especially when the claimant relies upon parol evidence, to be established by testimony clear, explicit, and satisfactory, and this without any reference to the peculiar and unfortunate condition of the Government, in consequence of the ravages of the elements.

To test more thoroughly the propriety of this presumption, which the committee assume, at the threshold, in favor of the claimants, let us consider, for a moment, not what would be the legal, for they come here for the very reason that they are without law,) but what is the natural and common sense presumption.

The first point to be noticed is, that ample provision was made, and the most convenient mode adopted, for the adjustment of the claims, under the resolution of March 22, 1783. At the close of the war, they were settled as the monthly pay of the officers was settled, and usually in the same account. The paymaster general was authorized and directed to adjust them by issuing certificates, which were to bear interest of six per cent. But, more than this: commissioners were appointed to go into the several States, and to give public notice of the times and places of their sitting, and the districts within which they settled accounts; and it was supposed that certificates were universally granted in 1784. Why should it not have been so? They were ready upon application, and the production of the requisite evidence—not ready at an uncertain time, and at remote points, but brought, as it were, to their very doors, and with public notice. That any officer within the limits of the United States, and in the possession of his faculties, could have been ignorant of the provisions of the resolution of 1783, and his rights accruing under it, no man can be so credulous as to believe. Whenever there has been any action upon pensions and kindred subjects in latter times, how long a period has elapsed before that action, whether favorable or unfavorable, has reached the dwelling of every survivor of that noble band? The commissioners to whom I have before referred, were furnished with the record evidence, and all the necessary papers relating to the lines of the several States to which they were respectively assigned. Further than this: to bring the matter to a close, and stimulate the officers, who still had unsettled claims, to a speedy adjustment, a resolution was passed by Congress declaring that all claims not presented before August 1, 1786, should be forever barred. But this is not all: upon the supposition that here and there an honest claimant might, by some casualty, have been precluded from obtaining his rights, in July, 1787, another term of one year was given for their presentation; and on the 27th March, 1792, an act was passed suspending the operation of the limitation acts for two years. Under this extension, remaining claims, or such as were presented, were adjusted at the Treasury Department by what was then termed certificates of registered debt. Is it within the bounds of probability—nay, is it possible—that any claims should have been withheld, after this period, if they were ever intended to be enforced? It is to be recollected, that during this eleven years, it was not as it unfortunately now is. There was not only the record evidence, but there were hosts of living witnesses to supply any deficiency, both among the officers with whom the claimants served, and the soldiers whom they commanded. Men engaged in the same noble cause, and serving in the same camp, were no strangers to each other. Never, perhaps, was there a band united by such ties of affection, and confidence, and intimacy. The links that bound men together then, exist not now. Their close relations and friendships were of a character which, perhaps, from our very natures, can only be formed and established amid the mutual dangers and privations of a camp, where, as in this case, genius and honor and unshaken valor, were pledged to the support of a nation's rights. Every important fact, and every incident of the eventful struggle through which they had just passed, must have been fresh and vivid in the recollection of all. Nothing could have been involved in doubt. Nothing need have been left to presumption.

Thus far in my argument I have not adverted particularly to the unfortunate and unprotected condition of the Government, in consequence of the destruction of that documentary evidence, which, forty years ago, might have been readily and triumphantly appealed to, to refute these claims. To show the extent of this loss, I read an extract from a letter of the Third Auditor, dated January 21, 1840, in answer to certain inquiries as to the mode of settlement, and the evidence of payment of the seven years, half pay, under the resolution of August 24, 1780.

"The claims for the seven years' half pay guarantied by the resolution of Congress of the 24th August, 1780, never were adjusted by the Paymaster General and Commissioner of Army Accounts, nor by the accountant of the War Department, the records of whose offices now form a part of the records of this office—that is, all that were saved from the burning of the War Office shortly after the removal of the Government to Washington, and the burning of the public buildings in August, in 1814. I mention this in order that it may be seen that the facts which I shall state in my report on the foregoing inquiries, have been derived from other sources than the records of this office. Having made this explanation, I have to state in respect to the first branch of the first of the foregoing inquiries, that I infer from a report, made to the House of Representatives of the United States by the Secretary of War, under date of the 21st of February, 1798, (See vol. Claims, American State Papers, page 70, doc. No. 35) that there was at that time on file in the War Department lists of the names of the officers, and the sums paid of their widows and orphans, which had been furnished by the several States to the old Congress or the present Government, of payment made by the States under that clause of the resolution of Congress of the 24th August, 1780, which recommended to the States to make provision for paying, on account of the United States, the seven years' half pay granted by said resolution. The lists or returns so made by the States have, it is supposed, been lost by the burning of the War office soon after the removal of the Government to Washington, or by the subsequent burning of the public buildings in August, 1814."

Thus it is manifest that with regard to one class of these claims—those for seven years' half pay—the Government is wholly unprotected, the evidence of payment having been destroyed, among other archives, by fire. In this state of things, what is there to prevent all the claims embraced in the resolution of August 24, 1780, from being again brought forward, and prosecuted with success under the rule adopted by the committee? With regard to the commutation claims, the Government is hardly in a better condition; for although there is evidence as to who were paid, there is little satisfactory evidence to show who were entitled to be paid; for we are informed by Mr. Gallatin as early as December, 1810, that "the original muster rolls and pay rolls of the Revolutionary army, together with the personal settlements of paymasters and pay-agents, were, with a few exceptions, destroyed by fire, for which reason, it is not perceived how it would be practicable, as it relates both to the sum which might have been originally due, and to the partial payments which may have been made, to devise efficient guards and checks, in case of the removal of the statute of limitations, as to unsettled claims for personal services rendered in the army of the United States during the Revolutionary war." If those pay rolls and muster rolls were now in existence, the Senate would not have been troubled with the remarks which I have thought it my duty to submit, because the claims would never have been here. With regard to suspending the operation of the limitation acts, subsequently to 1794, there seems to have been but one sentiment, and that pervades all the Executive and Congressional documents at that early day, when the whole matter was perfectly understood.

I take the liberty to refer to a very clear and satisfactory report upon the subject, made by Mr. Dwight Foster from the Committee on Claims, and communicated to the House of Representatives, February 24, 1797. After giving a succint history of the legislation upon the subject, the committee say:

"It was essential to the public administration that the extent of just demands upon the Government should be, within a reasonable period, definitely ascertained. It was essential to public safety and to right, in relation to the whole community, that all unsettled claims should be made known within a time when there were yet means of proper investigation, and after which the public responsibility should terminate, and the possibility of charging the Government by collusive and fictitious contracts should be at an end. The justice as well as policy of acts of limitation, under such circumstances, cannot be doubted. The situation of no country ever presented a more clear necessity for, or a more competent justification of, precautions of that nature. And all the reasons for adopting them operate to recommend unusual caution in departing from them, with the additional force of this circumstance, that the subsequent lapse of time has increased the difficulties of a due examination."

If, in 1797, before any of your records were destroyed, "unusual caution was considered necessary, because the "lapse of time had increased the difficulties of a due examination," what vigilance is demanded at our hands in 1840, with a large portion of your Revolutionary archives lost forever, and those which remain broken and unsatisfactory?*

We have nothing to do with the value of these certificates, which from time to time were received in payment by the officers. It is notorious that they were comparatively without value in the hands of the original holders; but this argument, if good for any thing, is good for the whole, and would demand a general law for the repayment of all the claims.

This subject was elaborately and satisfactorily discussed in speeches and reports at the 1st session, 21st Congress, when provision was made for those officers who were entitled to half pay for life, under the resolution of 1780, and for the non-commissioned officers and soldiers, who enlisted for and served to the close of the war. That discussion is far from affording support to this presumption, which has more recently found favor in both Houses of Congress. I cast no censure upon the heirs of Revolutionary officers whose claims are multiplying here to such an alarming extent. They undoubtedly come with an honest belief that they are prosecuting equitable claims. They are not apprised of the facts with which it is our duty to be acquainted; and they are called upon and urged forward by unscrupulous agents, who have had access to your Departments and understand the mutilated state of your records—agents, some of whom, I have reason to believe, first plunder the Government, and then plunder the heir. I well recollect, in the year 1833 or 1834, while passing some time at the house of a Revolutionary officer, to have been present when a letter was handed to him, which excited, manifestly, in his mind, no little astonishment: it was addressed to "Lieut.———, or his heirs or legal representatives," &c. The title was one which he had earned from the ranks, but with which he had not for many years been saluted. He broke the seal, and found that it was from one of these gentlemen agents, who informed him that he was entitled to commutation, and that he would undertake to procure it for him for the moderate compensation of twenty-five per cent. on the amount that should be obtained. "I (said the venerable man) know more about that matter than the writer of this letter. I received a certificate for my commutation and receipted for it—it was comparatively valueless to me, because my necessities compelled me to part with it for a trifle;" and he then adverted to the annuity which he was receiving under the act of 1828, and which he regarded as payment for what he should have received in 1784 in cash. I perfectly remember the opinion which he expressed at that time, that every officer who was entitled to the commutation and ever intended to avail himself of it, was settled with before 1794.

Much light has been thrown upon this subject, by records obtained from abroad, within the last few years; and a gentleman abundantly competent to the task, to whom I am indebted for very interesting and important information, (Hon. Hiland Hall, of Vermont,) has given to the Virginia claims of this character a patient and thorough investigation; and the remarkable result is, that he is now able to show, by documentary and other evidence, that not one of the twenty-nine cases from that State, provided for by acts of Congress, since 1828, have any good foundation.† The truth is, these claims from Virginia are like claims from other sections of the country—groundless.

So much for my general views upon this subject of commutation and seven years' half pay.

If I do not greatly err, these considerations, directed against the whole class, so far from being weakened, will be fortified, by a careful examination of every individual claim now pending in both Houses of Congress. I will examine, in as little time as possible, those which are the special order on the present occasion.

The first case is that of the heir of Captain William Williams, to which there are several objections; but I have troubled the Senate so long, that I ought in each case to notice but one or two, which to my mind are conclusive. It is hardly necessary for me to repeat that, in all these cases, after this lapse of time, (sixty years,) I regard a satisfactory explanation of the delay as the first step to be taken by the applicants. This the petitioner has failed to furnish; but the Third Auditor has, to my mind, done it in a most satisfactory manner. In his letter of February 17, 1838, addressed to my friend, the late lamented Judge White, he says:

"It now appearing, from the petition and commission granted by Congress, under date of the 13th July, 1779, that Captain William Williams was an officer 'in the corps of invalids,' the records in relation to that corps have been examined, and it is found that certificates were issued in favor of Captain William Williams, for his pay, to the 4th of November, 1783, (the end of the war;) but none appear to have been then issued for his commutation, which cannot be accounted for, as the Colonel and several other officers of the corps received theirs, unless he declined receiving them, with a view of having his name placed on the invalid roll, under the resolves of Congress of the 7th June, 1785. This latter course seems to have been pursued by Captain Leonard Cooper, who served as an officer of said corps to the end of the war, and was paid to the same period that Captain Williams was paid—say 4th November, 1783."

Now, sir, that Capt. Williams was entitled to five years' full pay, or to be placed upon the invalid roll under the resolution of 1785, I entertain no doubt; but which, at that period of his life, unembarrassed in his circumstances, would he, as a discreet and sensible man, have selected? Precisely that which was chosen by Captain Cooper, and undoubtedly by himself. Prior to 1789, there is no record evidence to show who were placed upon the pension roll, and I infer, from the papers, that Capt. Williams died prior to that period. Hence, sir, the presentation of this claim—the want of records. Captain Williams received his certificate for his pay in November, 1783, as the other officers of the regiment did, who also received at the same time their commutation. Why did he not receive his? Why has his commutation claim slumbered through fifty years, but for the reason that, like his companion, Capt. Cooper, he chose to be placed upon the invalid roll. All I have to say is, that the inference of the Auditor is natural and sensible, and there is no attempt to explain or rebut it.

The next claim in order is that of the heirs of Dr. John Ramsey, and is for the seven years' half pay promised under the resolve of Congress of August 24, 1780.

It would be easy to show, by the construction of the half-pay resolutions of October 3 and 21, 1780, that he was not entitled; but I prefer to answer this application by reading a report on a bill for the relief of Surgeon David Gould, made July 5, 1790; for I cannot believe that we have gained any special wisdom in this matter during the fifty years that have intervened:

"2d Sess. 1st Congress—Report of the committee on the bill—David Gould, July 5, 1790.

"The committee appointed to consider the bill to satisfy the claim of the representatives of David Gould, deceased, against the United States, report:

"That the resolution of Congress of May 15, 1778, granting half-pay for seven years to military officers commissioned by Congress, and the resolution of August, 1780, extending the preceding resolution to widows and orphan children of such military officers as shall die in the service, do not include the hos-

*Extract from the report of the Accountant of the War Department, to the Secretary of War, dated 6th of February, 1801.

The Accountant of the War Department reports, agreeably to the request of the Secretary of War, in conformity with the resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 2d February, 1801, as far as relates to loss ascertained in his office, in the house occupied by the War Department, destroyed by fire on the evening of the 8th November, 1800. That the papers destroyed were those only which had been lodged in the 3d story of the bilding, and consisted as follows, viz:

Relating to the Accounts of the Old Army.

Several cases containing muster and pay rolls, others containing accounts and vouchers of sundry Pay-Masters and Agents for paying troops, and one case containing individual settlements, made by the late Paymaster General and Commissioner of Army Accounts.

These papers could only be of use in the examination of claims, for services prior to the establishment of the present Government, which, if not already settled, are all barred and foreclosed, by acts of limitation. The loss will therefore not materially affect the unsettled account of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF WAR,
Accountant's Office, October 27, 1814.

SIR: In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 24th inst. this day transmitted to me from your office, directing the Secretaries of the several Departments, and the Postmaster General, to communicate to the House such information as may be in their power, in relation to the destruction of official books and papers in their respective Departments, in consequence of the incursions of the enemy in the month of August, 1814, &c. I have the honor to state, that the books and papers belonging to this office were removed at the time above mentioned, and are now in a state of safety, excepting a part of the papers and army accounts appertaining to the Revolutionary war, which had been saved from the flames, on the burning of the house occupied by the War Department in 1800. When the books and papers of this office were removed, as before mentioned, it was not practicable to obtain conveyance for all; it was, therefore, determined to leave the old papers and army accounts, as the loss of those (if any loss should happen) would be attended with less inconvenience than of any other papers.

They were in the fire proof room of the office, at the time of the incursion of the enemy, and when the building was burnt, they remained uninjured by the flames. But the room having been entered by some persons soon after the building was destroyed, the papers were deranged, and many of them undoubtedly destroyed or carried away at that time; but it is not possible to identify those which may have been thus destroyed. When the public papers were brought back to the city of Washington, the remainder of those papers (by far the larger part of the whole) were removed to the House now occupied as the Accountant's Office.

It is not probable that the loss of those papers can have any effect in the adjustment of the unsettled accounts of the United States, as the claims (if any) which might arise under them, have been barred by act of limitation.

With very great respect,
I have the honor to be, sir,
Your most obedient servant,
TOBIAS LEAR.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

†At this point, several cases were introduced, where large sums had been paid by the Government, under special acts of Congress, and in which incontestable record evidence was stated to show that they were without foundation, either in law or equity; but, as those and many more similar cases are present in the able and elaborate report of Mr. Hall, published with the debate, [House Doc. No. 436,] that is respectfully referred to.

pital departments of the army, nor the widows and orphans of that description of officers. And as the grant in this bill appears to be founded on those resolutions, the committee are of opinion, that to agree to this bill would be implicitly acknowledging a claim not founded in contract, and, by its precedents, might open the door for numerous applications for gratuities not stipulated by the resolves of Congress. Therefore that the bill ought to be disagreed to in Senate."

This report, as appears by the journal, was adopted by the Senate without a division.

I am sure I might well enough rest the objections to the claim of the heirs of Dr. Ramsey here; but I will now show that if "the hospital departments" were embraced in the provisions of the resolution of 1780, Dr. Ramsey was not of the number included. In a letter of April 24, 1840, the Third Auditor says:

"Since writing to you yesterday, I have had reference to a list of payments made by the State of Virginia, to the officers of her State line and navy, (which list is on file in the Pension Office,) and I find therefrom that John Rumsey was settled with on the 4th of July, 1783, as a Surgeon in the State line. It consequently follows that his widow was not entitled to the seven years' half pay granted by the resolution of Congress of the 24th August, 1780, to the widows and children of such officers of the Continental army as should die in the service."

Comment is unnecessary, when, as in this case, the claim is doubly refuted.

The next bill is that for the relief of the heirs of Dr. Frederick Seigle. They claim, as in the preceding case, seven years, half pay. The general objection stated in the case of Dr. Gould in 1790, obtains equally here. But I desire to notice one or two things in the printed report before me. After stating the general grounds of the claim, the committee adduce certain testimony, and they say:

"1st. A certified copy of papers filed in the Executive Department of Virginia, at Richmond, showing that it was proved in Frederick county court, in August, 1784, by a certificate of General Muhlenburg, that Frederick Seigle was Surgeon to the 8th Virginia regiment, and died in service; also, the certificate of Captain Thomas Barry, of the same regiment, to the same facts, dated March 29, 1797."

Sir, if I had no other ground for doubt, this first item of evidence would be sufficient to induce me to call for a full and satisfactory explanation. For what purpose was this testimony taken in 1784, but to establish this claim of Dr. Seigle to the seven years' half pay? And if taken for that purpose, why was it not successful? Again: the committee have, among the items of their testimony, the following:

"5th. A letter from the Third Auditor of the Treasury, showing that the seven years' half pay promised to the widow and orphans has not been paid, in the case of Dr. Seigle, by the United States."

Now, Mr. President, notice if you please what the Third Auditor does say; and I introduce it, not to meet this fifth item of testimony, but to show the reason why the testimony set forth in the first item taken in the Frederick county court cannot be availing. In his letter of the 17th January, 1837, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Revolutionary claims, the Third Auditor says:

"In reply, I have to state that I have carefully examined all the records in this office, including such of the original muster rols of the eighth Virginia regiment, as have been preserved, without finding any evidence that Dr. Frederick Seigle rendered any service in that regiment as a surgeon. I have also examined registers of payments on file in the pension office made by the State of Virginia to her Continental and State lines; but the name of Dr. Seigle does not appear on either of them. There is, therefore, no record evidence here either of the services or death of Dr. Seigle."

This is the letter of the Auditor referred to in the fifth item of testimony above cited; and I must be permitted to say, that it appears to me not to have been set forth in all fairness; but it shows one thing very clearly—the reason why this evidence taken in Frederick court, in 1784, was not deemed sufficient; but of this there is still more evidence in the letter of the Auditor, under date of January 31, 1837, in the following words:

"I have the honor to state, in reply to your letter of the 30th instant, that it appears from the records in this office, that Cornelius Baldwin was a Surgeon in the eighth Virginia regiment, from the 20th of May, 1777. There are no rolls of the eighth regiment on file in this office, subsequent to December, 1779, up to which time Dr. Baldwin appears to have been the surgeon of that regiment. Dr. Baldwin served to the end of the war, and received commutation, but the final settlement that was made with him does not show what regiment he was attached to when the war closed. The presumption, however, is, that he continued in the eighth regiment. The records do not show any other other surgeon to have belonged to that regiment at any time during the war."

A bill for the relief of Ensign James McCrory, of the 9th regiment North Carolina line, for commutation.

I have examined the papers in vain to find any satisfactory evidence that he was entitled under the resolves of 1780 and 1783. The only documentary evidence of his ever having been a continental officer, is furnished by the certificate of the Secretary of State of North Carolina, showing that he was appointed Ensign in the 9th regiment May 2d, 1777, and omitted from the roll of the regiment in January, 1778. The natural inference from this fact would be, that he left the service by resignation at that time. The explanation which he himself gives of his leaving the service is, that when the nine North Carolina regiments were reduced to three, he became a supernumerary. This was in the fall of 1778; and if he did become a supernumerary at that time, his claim is clearly unfounded, as none who left the service prior to the reduction of the army under the provisions of the resolutions of October, 1780, were entitled to that provision. The parol testimony, taken in 1820, and on which McCrory seems to have obtained his land allowance from North Carolina, appears insufficient to show a continuance of his service to the end of the war in the continental line. A portion of it is stated to have been in the nine months' service; the residue was probably in the militia. Experience has shown that little reliance is to be placed on parol testimony, taken forty years after the alleged service, especially when it is contradicted by the fact of the dropping of the name of the officer from the roll of the army long before the close of the war. It will be observed in this case that the claimant relies solely upon parol evidence, which is contradicted by documentary evidence, and that no reason whatever is assigned for the long delay.

The only remaining case to be considered on the present occasion, is that of the representatives of John Jordan, and I have only examined the papers so far as to ascertain, that he was a Captain in the corps of artillery artificers; because it appears from decisions as early as 1785, that the ancestor was not embraced in the provisions of what are familiarly denominated the commutation resolutions. The petition of Captain John Jordan was early referred to the commissioner for settling army accounts, and on the 9th of August, 1785, the commissioner reported, "That there are no existing resolutions of Congress, in his opinion, on which the petitioner can found a claim of the commutation, in lieu of the half pay for life, and therefore, if such a grant should be made, it will be necessary to adopt a new principle respecting the corps of artificers." An appeal, it seems, was taken from the commissioner to Congress, and on the 19th of October, 1785, a committee of the House of Representatives made a report confirming the decision of the commissioner. They declare, in the conclusion of their report, "That the officers in the late corps of artificers, in the service of the United States, are not entitled to half pay, or to commutation of half pay."

In 1788 the Secretary of the Department of War declares, "That this decision respecting artificers, was conformable to the several resolves of Congress, respecting the objects of the half pay."

In 1790, the subject was brought to the notice of General Knox, then Secretary of War, and on the 19th of March, in that year, he communicated a letter to the House of Representatives, in which he refers to the report of the Committee of the House, before adverted to, and says: "That the said decision appears to the Secretary of War to have been conformable to the several previous resolves of Congress, relative to the object of half pay; and that the same ought to be final" That among the eighty-six bills passed since 1828, a precedent may be found for each of the cases we have now considered, there is little doubt; but I trust the Senate will not deliberately reverse, in favor of representatives, decisions thus solemnly made, and again and again affirmed nearly sixty years since against the ancestor.

If any apology be necessary for the time I have occupied, it will be found in the importance of the question, both to the Government and the claimants, and in the fact that, at the last session, thirty-six claims of this character obtained favorable reports in the two Houses of Congress, but having received no final decision, will come up again before the adjournment to demand at least one hundred and fifty thousand dollars from your Treasury. I thank Senators for the patient attention with which they have listened to me upon a subject hitherto regarded with so much indifference, and I am the more gratified, because I cannot but regard the diligence and care given to the various reports made to this body during the present session, however unimportant in the amount involved, as a new era in the history of our private legislation; an era from which, as I trust, is to commence a system of just, but rigid economy. No men discourse so elaborately of extravagance and profusion as the members of the two Houses of Congress, and yet, as every intelligent citizen knows, the very thing complained of has its origin in this Capitol. Whether the event will show that I have been able, on this occasion, to contribute any thing in the way of arresting an increasing and unwarrantable drain upon the Treasury, is perhaps doubtful; but no result can deprive me of the consciousness of having discharged a duty due to the honest and tax paying people who sent me here.

SPEECH OF MR. CLIFFORD,

OF MAINE,

In the House of Representatives, April 24, 1840—In Committee of the Whole, on the General Appropriation bill.

Mr. CLIFFORD desired to make a few remarks chiefly in reply to what had been said by others, and consequently not immediately applicable to the subject before the committee. He then spoke in substance as follows: It would have been more gratifying to me, if this debate had been confined to the usual range of parliamentary discussion, embracing the various propositions contained in the bill under consideration, and excluding a great variety of party topics that have been introduced, well calculated to protract the session, and delay the public business, without producing any corresponding benefit. The history of this session alone is amply sufficient to satisfy every reflecting mind, that there must be some limitation to debate in a deliberative body, so numerous as the House of Representatives, to facilitate the progress of business, and to preserve order and decorum among its members; and that the only practicable mode of doing this, is by a careful observance of the rules of the House, which should always be enforced, when occasion requires, to promote these desirable objects. These remarks are not made in any spirit of complaint towards the Chair, for it is not unknown to me that every effort to restrain irregular debate has been met from certain quarters with a determined resistance or a chilling support, and the best reason I have heard assigned for it, is the one given by the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. WISE, that "latitude in debate is the life of the Opposition;" and if so, no one can feel less inclined than myself, especially after that frank avowal, to incur the charge of attempting or desiring to destroy the vital principle of a great and powerful party. If latitude in debate is desired, so let it be, with this understanding, that those who seek to introduce it shall have the responsibility. If the Democratic party cannot stand upon a full discussion, let it fall; but it cannot be expected that the discussion will be confined to one side. It is not my habit to wander from the question, unless it becomes necessary to do so as a matter of defence. If any apology is necessary on the present occasion, it will be found in the remarks of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SALTSONSTALL,] who went into an extended and ingenious argument, and, as I thought at the time, in defence of the Hartford Convention and of the principles and measures of the Federal party. Be that as it may, he now disclaims having done so. If his explanation is not now misapprehended, he then said, as a matter of expediency, he would not attempt their defence, though he admits that he participated in the proceedings which laid the foundation for the convention. His precise language is of no importance. I cheerfully accept the explanation. But, in other respects, I cannot be mistaken. The gentleman himself will not deny that he assured the House and the country that the members of that convention had been censured unjustly; that, during an angry contest for certain great constitutional principles, their designs had been misunderstood, and that their motives had been misrepresented, and that he repudiated the idea that the Federal party ever contemplated the dissolution of the Union. He seems to think it unkind on the part of his colleague to rake up these old affairs, and says he has scarcely thought of them for the last twenty years, which, to say the least of it, is a little remarkable; for if I am not greatly deceived, he has been intimately connected with the Federal party in Massachusetts from 1813 to the present time, advocating the same principles, and maintaining the same political associations. By the way of remembrance, in the course of my remarks, I will endeavor to refresh his recollection upon certain matters of history, which, to my mind, afford the most conclusive evidence that certain leaders of that party, during the last war with Great Britain, and for several years prior, covering the period from 1800 to the treaty of peace in 1814, were guilty of unceasing efforts to excite the people of New England to open rebellion and resistance of the Federal Government, and actually plotted a dissolution of the Union and the establishment of a Northern confederacy under the auspices of British protection; and that in all this they were actuated by that inordinate thirst for power and inveterate hatred of free principles, which are the essential elements of Federalism itself. But as I propose to speak of the principles and measures of the two great political parties which have existed in this country from the foundation of the Government to the present time, and which, from the very nature of our institutions and the structure of the social order itself, it is reasonable to believe, will ever continue to exist, at least till "the lion and the lamb shall lie down together," I will touch upon those matters in the order of events in which they occurred. The first organization of parties took place during the latter part of General Washington's administration, who had been twice elected to the Chief Magistracy of the nation by the spontaneous and unanimous suffrages of the people, and, in spite of the radical and irreconcileable differences of opinion, which are known to have existed among the leading minds of that eventful period, continued to enjoy, to the very close of his last term, the uninterrupted confidence of all classes of men. In their origin, these differences of opinion involved nearly opposite views as to the model and form of Government which the exigencies of the time demanded, with reference to its operation upon the frame and structure of society, and its tendency to promote the individual happiness and prosperity of the people, and, at the same time, to afford sufficient strength and efficiency to insure domestic tranquillity, and to provide for the common defence. The natural tendency of these conflicting views, after the adoption of the Constitution, led their respective adherents to widely different rules of interpretation of the instrument itself, in the application of it to the purposes for which it had been formed. This gave rise to party organization, which, with slight modifications and occasional interruptions, has continued to this day. Far be it from me to insinuate that there was any want of patriotic feeling, or of upright intention, in the conduct of any member of the convention that framed the Constitution; and candor will oblige me to admit, that it is by no means certain that much of the distrust of the virtue and intelligence of the people, which all must admit was evinced in that assembly by a portion of its most efficient members, may not be traced to causes long since removed by the light of experience, and yet while they existed, affording at least strong palliation for the misconceptions which they occasioned. However this may be, it is nevertheless true, that the master spirit and father of Federalism, Alexander Hamilton, was strongly inclined to the British system of Government, and indeed its open advocate for reasons entirely consistent with the purity of motive which has usually been ascribed to him; for it has been said that he verily believed it "to form the best model the world ever produced;" and if so, no one will censure his motives, though I imagine few among us can be found, that dare vindicate his principles, however similar their own may be in effect. He distrusted the capacity of the people for self-government, and believed in the necessity of a strong Executive power to control what he called "the turbulence of Democracy;" and it was the Executive feature of the British system, above all others, that excited his admiration, as being above the reach of improvement. Observe his remarks:

"See the excellence of the British Executive: he is placed above temptation. Nothing short of such an Executive (a King) can be efficient. I confess the plan of Government which I propose is very remote from the idea of the people. Nothing but a permanent body [of life legislators] can check the imprudence of the Democracy. The people are turbulent and changing; they seldom judge or determine right; and, again, all political communities ought to be divided into the few and the many; the first are the rich and well born, the other the mass of the people."

The same want of confidence in the sovereign voice of the people to institute and uphold the machinery of Government through the medium of their constituted agents, is discoverable throughout his public career. It is impossible to misunderstand the scope and bearing of his remarks against the weakness and instability of Republican institutions. Upon this point, as upon all others, he descanted with great freedom and boldness. He undertook to demonstrate from experience that their inevitable tendency would lead to anarchy and civil commotion, from which he argued their inefficiency to promote the durable happiness and prosperity of a great and rising people.

"I despair that any Republican form of Government can remove the difficulties that Greece and Rome encountered. I have well considered the subject, and am well convinced that no amendment of the articles of confederation can answer the purposes of a good Government, so long as the State Governments do in any shape exist."

The more recent publication of his speech varies the language, but does not change the sense. He is made to say, that—

"This view of the subject almost led him to despair that a Republican Government could be established over so great an extent. He was sensible, at the same time, that it would be unwise to propose one of any other form. In his private opinion, he had no scruple in declaring, supported as he was by so many of the wise and the good, that the British Government was the best in the world, and that he doubted whether any thing short of it would do in America. The House of Lords is a most noble institution. Having nothing to hope for by a change, and a sufficient interest, by means of their property, in being faithful to the national interest, they form a permanent barrier against every pernicious innovation, whether attempted on the part of the Crown or of the Commons. No temporary Senate will have firmness enough to answer the purpose."

Deriving his opinions from the study of the monarchies of Europe, and especially of England, where the voice of the people had been little considered, and, consequently, was greatly undervalued, he was thoroughly persuaded that nothing short of a President and Senate for life, or during good behavior, which, for all practical purposes, is the same thing, could ever obviate the defects, or, to any extent, supply the deficiencies which experience had demonstrated to be inherent in the articles of Confederation. His plan of Government, as it has been called, was the third in the order of time that was presented to the convention. It was on this occasion that he expressed his opinions with so much freedom, as well as with masterly ability; and throughout his life he evinced one characteristic which does not belong to Federalism of modern date: he spurned disguise, and always evinced a willingness to present to his opponents a clear and distinct issue. He despised truckling and hypocrisy, and never sought to change his name or conceal his principles. He was bitterly opposed to the State Governments, and he did not hesitate to avow that hostility on every suitable occasion. In speaking of the different propositions that had preceded his own, he remarked "that the States, by either, will have the means to counteract the General Government. They have their State judges and militia all combined to oppose a National Government."

"Either plan is, therefore, precarious. The National Government cannot long exist, when opposed by such a weighty rival." While it is no part of my intention to derogate, in the slightest degree, from the merit of the honorable dead, I beg leave to say, what few will deny who have any regard to truth; that the sentiments so freely advanced by Hamilton are known to have been entertained—in some instances, perhaps, with slight modifications—by very many of the leaders of the Federal party, at the period of the adoption of the Constitution; and that they were openly acknowledged by the more honest and candid, until their defeat, in 1800, in the election of Mr. Jefferson. If there was any concealment of their disbelief in the stability of a Republican form of Government, or of their want of confidence in the capacity of the people to govern themselves, before that time, it is unknown to me. It was not until it was ascertained that the views and feelings of a great majority of the people were averse to such principles, and that those who entertained them would be excluded from any participation in the public councils of the nation, that the subterfuges and disguises of the present time began to be introduced. Examine the speech of Mr. Morris: it is no less explicit, and equally candid and free of disguise. "The second branch of the Legislature ought to be composed of men of great and established property—an aristocracy! men who, from pride, support permanency. To make them completely independent, (of the people,) they must be chosen for life. Such an aristocratic body would keep down the turbulence of Democracy."

Similar views were taken by Mr. Read, another distinguished Federalist in that convention. He maintained that a State Government is incompatible with a General Government, and the elder Adams, though not in the convention, was subsequently supported by that party for the Presidency, "by his being likely to unite the votes of New England, by his favor with the English party, from his speculative views concerning the British constitution;" and the remark has been frequently ascribed to him, that it was the true policy of the common people to place the whole executive power in one man, though I have not been able to find the authority upon which the charge rests. The plan of Mr. Hamilton, to which I have adverted, will be found in the Madison Papers, recently published, from which I beg leave to read a few extracts:

"The Senate to consist of persons elected to serve during good behavior; their election to be made by electors, chosen for that purpose by the people."

"The supreme executive authority of the United States to be vested in a governor, to be elected to serve during good behavior; the election to be made by electors, chosen by the people in the election districts. The authority and functions of the executive to be as follows: to have a negative on all laws about to be passed, and the execution of all laws passed."

But it is useless to multiply extracts to prove what is very generally acknowledged by those who have taken the trouble to investigate, and have the honesty to admit, the truth, that very many of the old Federalists were openly in favor of a system of Government not very different from that of the mother country, which, to use the language of the elder Adams, they regarded as "the most stupendous fabric of human wisdom." In treating of the same subject, the late Matthew Carey remarks, "that the Federal party made every possible exertion to increase the energy and add to the authority of the General Government, and to endow it with powers at the expense of the State Governments and the people. Bearing strongly in mind the disorders and convulsions of some of the ill balanced Republics of Greece and Italy, their sole object of dread appeared to be the inroads of anarchy; and as mankind too generally find it difficult to steer the middle course, their apprehensions of the Scylla of anarchy effectually blinded them to the Charybdis of despotism. Had they possessed a complete ascendency in the convention, it is possible they would have fallen into the opposite extreme to that which decided the tenor of the Constitution. This party was divided among themselves; a small, but very active, division were monarchists, and utterly disbelieved in the efficacy or security of a Republican form of Government, especially in a territory so extensive as that of the United States, embracing so numerous a population as were to be taken into the account at no distant period."

It is a well-known fact that needs no confirmation, that the present Constitution was more the result of compromise, induced by the exigencies of the country at the period of its formation, and dictated by a spirit of conciliation and conscientious obedience to the will of the majority, which characterized the conduct of its framers at every stage of their proceedings, than the exponent of the views of either of the two parties that were represented in that convention. The mass of the people felt deeply the imperfections of the articles of confederation, and ardently wished for such alterations as would relieve them of the evils which they had experienced in consequence of them; but there was a wide diversity of opinion as to the character of the alterations necessary to be made to attain that object. On the 17th of September, 1787, the present draft was agreed to, and immediately transmitted to Congress "in a letter subscribed by the President, in which it was said to be the result of a spirit of amity and of that mutual deference and concession which the peculiarity of their political situation rendered indispensable." Immediately after its publication it was submitted by Congress to the several States for ratification. It is necessary to glance at the discussion that ensued, in order more fully to comprehend the aim and objects of parties, or the motive by which they were influenced at the time of its adoption. It is true that many of the Republicans opposed it, not because they were averse to a more perfect union of the States for certain specified purposes, to regulate the commerce of the country, and to insure the common defence, but because, in some respects, its internal powers were more ample, and in others, less cautiously restricted, as they believed, than were consistent with the sovereignty of the States, or the liberty of the people. They were jealous of the extent of power conferred upon the Executive, as conceding too much to the known partialities of their opponents, and they criticized, with great severity, the omission to provide a bill of rights for the security of the citizen. It was this last objection that weighed so heavily on the mind of Mr. Jefferson, and it is no discredit to the soundness of his judgment, that the good sense of the people so far appreciated his opinions, as to supply the deficiency. On this point Mr. Jefferson remarks:

"I approved as much of the Constitution as most persons, and more of it was disapproved by my accuser than by me, and of its parts most vitally Republican. My objection to the Constitution was the want of a bill of rights—Colonel Hamilton's, that it wanted a king and a house of lords. The sense of America has approved my objection, and added the bill of rights, and not the king and lords."

Again, he denies that he was opposed to the payment of the public debt, and says:

"He wishes it paid to-morrow—Colonel Hamilton never; but always to remain in existence, for him to manage and corrupt the Legislature."

It is undeniably true, that some of the features of the instrument, which most excited the fears and jealousy of those that desired as far as possible to preserve the authority of the States, afforded the strongest inducements to their opponents to espouse its adoption, which they did, for the reasons assigned, as well as from the conviction arising from the fact, then made evident in the discussion that immediately followed its publication, that no nearer approach to that system of national power to which all their efforts had been directed with earnest solicitude, could ever receive the sanction of the mass of the people. The development of public sentiment on this point was so clear, that the most barefaced advocates of monarchy yielded to the demonstrations of the voice of the people, and advocated the adoption of the Constitution; and whatever may be thought of their motives, it must be confessed they contributed to a praiseworthy result. It cannot be necessary or useful to pursue that branch of the inquiry further. My object is accomplished if I have said enough to draw attention to the incipient causes which led to party division at the period of which I am speaking; and, if I am not mistaken, all who have examined the subject with the care which it deserves, will feel obliged to acknowledge that it took its rise in a radical and theoretical difference of opinion as to the first principle of Government itself, with reference to its tendency to promote the happiness and prosperity of those for whose benefit it is instituted. Let that be as it may, of this I am certain, that ever since the adoption of the Constitution, it has been the policy of the Federal party to obtain by construction, in every shape and form which human ingenuity can suggest, what they failed to secure after repeated attempts, by express grant.

The vagrant power to incorporate, which has so many advocates at this time in the ranks of the Opposition, though scarcely any two of them can agree upon its locality, was directly and solemnly refused a place in the Constitution. It was several times considered, in one form or another; but, as often as it was proposed, it was promptly voted down by a large majority of the States. The reasons assigned for the refusal were, that the people in certain portions of the Confederacy were averse to a National Bank, and if the power to incorporate should be recommended, it would obviously include the right to charter a Bank, and that this would present an obstacle of a very dangerous character to the consummation of the general design. Thus it appears, at that early day, the people of this country were fully apprised of the dangerous influences and alarming tendency of a corporate institution in the bosom of a free Republic, to control its currency, and to mete out its favors or its curses as self-interest might render most expedient to its purpose. The people never dreamed, during the discussion that ensued, that any such power would be found lurking in the provisions of the instrument they were called upon to sanction by their suffrages. But no sooner was it adopted than the Federal party, true to their original design, claimed it by construction. The Democratic party denied it, and they deny it still. The opponents of this Administration, by whatever name they choose to call themselves, affirm it. This was the great point of division when party organization, in its more extended sense, took place at the close of Gen. Washington's administration with reference to the selection of his successor.

The objects of parties underwent no change, but the system of operation was necessarily varied to the altered circumstances with which they were surrounded; all acquiesced in the new Constitution, but their principles remained the same as before its adoption. It now became necessary to fix its interpretation. Here they divided. The one party desired to confine its application to the specified objects for which it had been created; the other was equally solicitous to extend its provisions by implication, to embrace the objects which they believed ought to have been included among its enumerated powers. The ostensible object of the latter, so far as any avowal of their intention was made, was to include the power to incorporate, with the view to the establishment of a National Bank. This has been a favorite object with the anti-Democratic party at every stage of our history, and through all the disguises of names and principles which have marked its career of wickedness and folly; and if I am not greatly deceived in the signs of the times, it is one of the leading motives to the desperate struggle for power and place now being made by a great and powerful party, under the assumed name of Whigs. On the 14th of December, 1790, the Secretary of the Treasury transmitted to Congress a letter, accompanying his report of a plan of a National Bank. The report is full and elaborate, but I will not weary attention by reading more than a single passage: "It is to be considered that such a bank is not a mere matter of private property, but a political machine of the greatest importance to the State." It is manifest that the author of that paper looked upon a bank as the natural ally of the Executive, and as a valuable and necessary appendage of national power, calculated to give strength and vigor to the Federal Administration, in all its internal operations and machinery. Undoubtedly it might be so, while its favor was conciliated, and the wishes of its owners and managers consulted. The principle of self interest would dictate so much of patriotism, and no more. The reason, however, that prompted its recommendation, was founded upon the expectation of its alliance with the Government. But experience has shown, beyond controversy, that, while such an institution may become a political machine, to sustain an administration of its choice, it is no less powerful in opposition to one that may incur its displeasure. That, in either event, it will be a political machine in the hands of its directors, and consequently irresponsible to the people of the country, needs no confirmation. But to mark the line of party division with more accuracy, it is necessary to pursue this subject further.

It soon became evident that the people, as well as the cabinet, were divided in opinion touching the constitutional power of Congress to charter such an institution. The President, in pursuance of a practice which then prevailed, required the members of his cabinet to submit their respective views in writing. As the opinions of Hamilton and Jefferson cover the whole ground, I will read from them. It is worthy of remark, that the former maintained the power to incorporate, in its broadest sense, without limitation, deriving it from every specified grant in the Constitution. Fearlessness was a prominent trait of his character, and, as I have already remarked, he spurned any disguise, and on this occasion broached the whole doctrine of construction, untinctured with the concealment of after times; and throughout his whole public life, I believe, he adhered to it, and gave it a steady and firm support. It will appear that he claimed the right as an attribute of sovereignty itself, and after premising that it is the clause of incorporation which gives rise to objection, he remarks:

"Now it appears to the Secretary of the Treasury that this general principle is inherent in the very definition of Government, and essential to every step of the progress to be made by that of the United States; namely, that every power vested in a Government is in its nature sovereign, and includes, by force of the term, a right to employ all the means requisite, and fairly applicable to the attainment of the ends of such power, and which are not precluded by restrictions and exceptions specified in the Constitution, or not immoral, or not contrary to the essential ends of political society. The circumstances that the powers of sovereignty are, in this country, divided between the National and State Government, does not afford the distinction required."

"The power which can create the supreme law of the land in any case, is doubtless sovereign as to such case. This general and indisputable principle puts at once an end to the abstract question whether the U. States have power to erect a corporation, that is to say, to give a legal and artificial capacity to one or more persons, distinct from the natural; for it is unquestionably incident to sovereign power to erect corporations, and, consequently, to that of the United States in relation to the objects entrusted to the management of the Government."

No one can fail to perceive that the opinion of Mr. Jefferson is equally explicit, and precisely the reverse, denying, in every respect, the premises and conclusions of the Secretary of the Treasury. He says: "I consider the foundation of the Constitution as laid on this ground, that all powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States or the people. To take a single step beyond the boundaries thus specially drawn around the powers of Congress is to take possession of a boundless field of power no longer susceptible of any definition. The incorporation of a bank and other powers assumed by this bill, have not, in my opinion, been delegated to the United States by the Constitution.

"I. They are not among the powers specially enumerated.

"II. Nor are they within either of the general phrases, which are the two following:

"1. To lay taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States; that is to say, to lay taxes for the purpose of providing for the general welfare; for the laying of taxes is the power, and the general welfare the purpose for which the power is to be exercised. They are not to lay taxes ad libitum for any purpose they please, but only to pay the debts or provide for the welfare of the Union.

"2. The second general phrase is to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the enumerated powers. But they can all be carried into execution without a bank. A bank therefore is not necessary, and consequently not authorized by this phrase."

To avoid being tedious, I must pass rapidly over the period that immediately followed the establishment of a National Bank. Suffice it to say, in the language of the historian of Washington, that "this measure made a deep impression on many members of the Legislature, and contributed not inconsiderably to the complete organization of those distinct and visible parties which, in their long and dubious conflict for power, have since shaken the United States to their centre." It has seemed to me proper to draw public attention to the source of party division; as, in the course of this debate, both sides have claimed to be Republicans, and all seem anxious to cast off the name of Federalist; and as names are subject to change at all times, the surest test is to look at the principles. The struggle that ensued, it must be admitted on all sides, was one for principle. The Bank, or Federal party, supported the elder Adams for reasons which I have before stated; the Democratic party supported Mr. Jefferson. The former succeeded by a majority of three votes. That Administration has been emphatically denominated "the reign of terror." The alien and sedition laws were among the tyrannical measures which served to awaken the people to a sense of the danger with which they were surrounded. The liberty of speech and the press was invaded, under the pretence of affording protection to public officers against the strictures of party, and the prevalent disposition to slander and decry the Government; rights heretofore held sacred were forgotten, like the dreams of the night, in the shameless prosecutions for alleged violations of this "gag law," and the most open and barefaced infractions of the social compact were perpetrated with impunity, until "all confidence was lost in the midst of fear and apprehension." Perhaps it is not going too far to say that these several measures were partly induced by, if not the necessary consequence of, the sympathies and attachments of the party that sustained them to a system of national power, in conformity with the Constitution and laws of Great Britain, which they had long desired to see established in this country, and which excited so much of their admiration. The sedition law was carried into effect, and enforced in some instances with great severity.

The case of Matthew Lyon was one of peculiar aggravation, and, as a sample of the bitter persecutions under that odious law, deserves to be more fully considered. From his account of the transaction, which is believed to be correct, he was indicted, among other things equally harmless, for publishing that, "as to the Executive, when I shall see the efforts of that power bent on the promotion of the comfort and happiness, and the accommodation of the people, that Executive shall have my zealous and uniform support; but whenever I shall, on the part of the Executive, see every consideration of the public welfare swallowed up in a continued grasp for power, and an unbounded thirst for ridiculous pomp, foolish adulation, and selfish avarice, &c. I shall not be their humble advocate." Upon this accusation, and others of no greater import in my estimation, a pliant, packed, political jury, selected for the purpose, under the direction of a party judge, inheriting the spirit of a Jeffries, and influenced with anglo-aristocratic zeal, brought in a verdict of "guilty." The author goes on to say, that in consequence of this unjustifiable verdict, and the subsequent cruel judgment, he was contumaciously dragged out of his own county, where a decent jail was at the disposal of the National Government, and in an ignominious manner carried fifty miles, and in a bad state of health, thrown into a dismal dungeon, the common receptacle of robbers, thieves, and murderers; and when three thousand citizens petitioned for his release, they were told by the President, that submission must precede pardon.

In 1800 the success of the Democratic party was complete. The voice of the people triumphed over the slanders and falsehoods which had been heaped upon the candidate of their choice. Thomas Jefferson was elected President. I will pass over the characteristic intrigue of the Federal party after their defeat in the attempt to elevate to that station an individual they had uniformly despised, and who had not received one vote of the people with the view to any such elevation, for the sole purpose of trampling under foot the solemnly expressed voice of the nation. It has become proverbial that traitors from the Democratic ranks find favor with our opponents, of which we have some high examples in modern times.

This glorious event was hailed with great joy by the friends of equal rights, in all parts of the country, as the harbinger of better days; and no one ever had occasion to say that his most sanguine expectations were not fully realized in the radical change of policy that ensued. The schemes for undermining the Constitution were defeated, and the Government restored to its primitive purity. But if it were desirable, it is not within the scope of my present design to speak very minutely of the great and salutary reform that immediately followed in the administration of public affairs. No Administration ever commenced under more favorable auspices, and none ever more fully lived up to the professions on which it was created, or contributed more largely to lay the lasting foundations of Republican freedom: it was praised at the time by its friends, and it has since been eulogized by its enemies; and now, after the lapse of forty years, it is matter of grave dispute among us who shall be considered its followers. On this last point I shall have something to remark before I sit down—at present I wish to deal further with its opponents. The next fourteen years, embracing the period of the embargo, non-intercourse, and the late war with Great Britain, is one of great interest and full of instruction as to the motives and designs of the Federal party; their whole course, without interruption, was marked by a reckless opposition to the Government of the people, and seems to have been dictated by two leading motives—thirst for power and implacable hatred of incumbents in office; and their principal weapons of attack were falsehood, deception, and calumny. All their efforts were directed to one object, which is sufficiently disclosed in their motto, which was very generally adopted, that "the Administration must come down." It was no less true at that time than it is now, that about two-thirds of the political journals published in New England were opposed to the Administration, as well as the great proportion of wealth. It has been said, and I doubt not with truth, that for years not a single number of the Boston Centinel, Repertory, &c. were published free from attacks of the most vilifying character on the Administration—every act of the President was misrepresented, and the most unholy and pernicious means were constantly employed to excite the prejudices of the people, against every public functionary, however elevated or humble. A large proportion of the wealthiest men in the community were combined in a flagitous effort to tear down the pillars of the Government, which had been erected at so great a sacrifice in the Revolutionary struggle for independence, not only by throwing every obstacle and embarrassment in their power in the way of its administration, but, as the sequel will show, by obstructing and harassing all its endeavors to protect and defend the national honor, and finally coalescing with its ancient and inveterate foe. Now, if this was patriotism, then these men were patriotic, and not otherwise.

This is not mere supposition—it is historical fact, and susceptible of the clearest demonstration; and I will freely acknowledge that it is not so much my object at this time to detain the committee with any remarks of my own, as to exhibit to the country anew the proofs of some of these allegations. This has become necessary, in consequence of the denial which has been made. Let us see whether this party has been misrepresented, and examine into their boasted patriotism. If I mistake not, it will be found to have consisted for a series of years in sympathy for the interests and designs of a foreign power, in opposition to the interests and honor of their own country. The conduct of England towards the United States had been one uninterrupted course of aggression and violation of national faith. Jealousy and ill will were the predominant features of her policy. She had on many occasions, and in the grossest manner, violated the treaty of peace. She had declined a treaty of commerce—she had impressed our seamen—she had instigated the savage tribes to tomahawk and scalp American citizens—she had stimulated the mercenary and piratical of all nations to prey upon our unprotected commerce—and, in a word, "she had insulted our flag, and pillaged our trade in every quarter of the world." Of the many violations of the laws of nations perpetrated by Great Britain, I will only glance at some of the most glaring, and those in an especial manner which had the most influence upon political parties at home, among which were the impressment of our seamen, under the pretence of right to search American vessels for deserters from the British navy, and the orders in council of the 16th of May, 1806, and the 11th of November, 1807.

The right of search had been claimed and wantonly exercised for many years, and had been repeatedly made the subject of remonstrance as far back as 1792. Both parties had complained of its injustice and of the iniquity of the practice, and had uniformly regarded it as a violation of the laws of nations. It is difficult to estimate the extent to which this outrage upon the rights and liberties of American seamen was carried. It has been estimated that, at the date of the declaration of war, on the 18th of June, 1812, not less than fourteen thousand persons had been seized upon the high seas and dragged from their lawful employment and homes. The British officer on board became at once the captor, accuser, witness, and judge, and yet one of the patriotic committees of the Massachusetts Legislature, for the double purpose of excusing Great Britain and casting reproach upon the Administration, reported that there were but eleven Massachusetts sailors on board the vessels of his Britannic Majesty in June, 1812.

The object of the orders in council, of the 16th of May, 1806, was to blockade the coast of Germany, Holland, and France, from Elbe to Brest, a distance of eight hundred miles. It was a mere paper blockade, in direct violation of the laws of nations, and a highhanded outrage of the neutral rights of the United States. The order in council, of the 11th of November, 1807, was issued professedly as a retaliation for the Berlin decree of France, whereby all neutral vessels, bound to France or her dependencies, or to any port from which British vessels were excluded, and all vessels furnished with French consular certificates, were declared liable to seizure and condemnation; but their real design was to compel the United States to declare war against our friend and ally in the Revolutionary struggle for independence; and in this design the Federal party concurred. These measures were destructive to the rights and interests of the United States, and especially to the commercial class, who were in a great measure driven from the ocean, and a lucrative trade, for no other purpose than to administer to the cupidity and malice of the "mistress of the sea;" and yet, strange as it may seem, many concurred in the general design, while at the same time they called loudly upon their own Government to relieve them from the embarrassments which it produced. Parties were divided as to the causes of their distress; but all demanded redress, and condemned the aggressions, and none were more clamorous than the very men that subsequently opposed every effort of the Government in the most treasonable manner, to rescue our national interests from the ruin which must have ensued if no counteracting remedies had been adopted. Before this, Mr. Jefferson had been opposed with the usual billingsgate of party warfare; he had been denounced as a Jacobin, as an enemy to social order and religion; he had been accused of immorality and infidelity, and all the usual accusations of that party; he was now charged with weakness and imbecility, and even cowardice; and every measure was resorted to, to goad his administration into resistance of the high-handed and oppressive pretensions and outrages of the parent country. Negotiation had failed. Three expedients only were left to be tried—embargo, non-intercourse, and war. The merchants preferred the former, or, at all events, were willing to leave the whole subject to the constituted authorities. To this effect they certainly expressed themselves in their various petitions for redress.

It is sufficient to know that they demanded redress, and admit, if you please—for I believe it is true—they professed to be willing to leave to the decision of Congress the remedy to be prescribed. Public meetings were held in all the principal cities, and memorials to Congress adopted, setting forth their grievances in glowing colors, and pledging their aid and support in the most solemn manner, to any measure of relief which the wisdom of that body might judge expedient. The Federal merchants of Boston were among the first to memorialize Congress, and demand redress. I ask leave to read a few passages from that paper.

"Unless the present disposition of the British admiralty courts and navy officers can be counteracted and removed, a widely dispersed and unprotected commerce, extending to every region of the globe, will only serve to invite depredation, to bankrupt ourselves and enrich others, until such commerce be swept from the face of the ocean."

They further state, "That a tacit submission to pretensions thus lofty, would be an abandonment of rights openly recognised, and a dereliction of the most important commercial interests of this country." And they add: "Reason, and the most powerful considerations of equity, enjoin it as a duty on the United States, to oppose these pretensions." And that "These pretensions are unsound in point of principle, offensive in practice, and nugatory in effect." They charge the British Government with "preying upon the unprotected property of a friendly power;" and call upon the Administration "promptly to adopt such measures as might disembarrass our commerce, assert our rights, and support the dignity of the United States."

The Newburyport memorial alleges that—

"In many cases our vessels and cargoes have been captured, tried, and condemned, under unusual and alarming pretenses, which, if permitted to continue, threaten the ruin of our commercial interests. So far from obtaining redress of our grievances by the ordinary modes and processes of law, we have in most cases been subject to heavy costs, and suffered embrrassing and distressing detention of property, even when no pretence could be found to authorize the seizure of it. Having sustained these losses and injuries in the prosecution of our lawful commerce, and in the exercise of our just rights, we rely with confidence on the wisdom, firmness, and justice of our Government, to obtain for us that protection which a regard to the honor of our country, no less than the rights of our citizens, must dictate and require."

The Salem memorial is even more explicit:

"These obstructions are of a very serious nature. When exercised in the mildest form, they produce oppressive searches and delays, expensive litigation, and often a total failure of an otherwise lucrative voyage."

They speak of the British policy,

"As letting loose the passions to prey on the miseries and plunder the property of the innocent. It would subject neutrals to hazards nearly as perilous as those of actual hostilities; and independent of its influence in stimulating to revenge and retaliation, it would transfer the benefits of peace to any victorious usurper of the ocean. Your memorialists wish to take no part in the contests which now convulse the world; but, acting with impartiality towards all nations, to reap the fruits of a just neutrality. If, however, conciliation cannot effect the purpose of justice, and an appeal to arms be the last and necessary protection of honor, they feel no disposition to decline the common danger, or shrink from the common contribution. Relying on the wisdom and firmness of the General Government in this behalf, they feel no hesitation to pledge their lives and properties in support of the measures which may be adopted to vindicate the public rights and redress the public wrongs."

Similar memorials emanated from New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and from almost every commercial city in the Union. The uniform tenor of the public press was in strict accordance with the prayers of these petitions. Press after press called upon the Government to redress the grievances of which the merchants, without distinction of party, complained, and in the most solemn manner, and in repeated instances, plighted their faith to the support of any measures to accomplish the object. On the 22d of June, 1807, the wanton attack was made on the Chesapeake by the Leopard, in consequence of the refusal of Commodore Barron to submit to the claimed right of search, and to deliver up four sailors on board the former, in pursuance of the iniquitous demand of the British officer. This raised the excitement to the highest pitch of indignation. All parties alike, the Federalists as much as the Democrats, clamored for reparation, with just abhorrence, of the insult offered to our national flag.

The excitement was so great it was deemed impolitic and unwise to convene Congress until sufficient time had elapsed for reflection, and for the resentments of the public mind to subside. In the mean time, to quiet the alarm which very generally prevailed, and to protect the interests and honor of the country from a repetition of such flagrant proceedings within our own jurisdiction, the President issued the proclamation of the second of July, forbidding British vessels of war in certain cases and under certain limitations to enter or remain in the ports or harbors of the United States. This was a mere precautionary step to guard against similar outrages until Congress could be convened. The whole subject of our relations with Great Britain was submitted to Congress at the extra session, on the 26th of October following; the embargo became a law on the 22d of December, 1807. No man dare risk his veracity, or his intelligence, by affirming that this measure was not adopted to meet the complaints of the Federal merchants, and to prepare the way for a redress of their grievances so vividly set forth in their memorials. It now becomes necessary to inquire how far these patriotic citizens, who have so much regard for the military reputation of their candidate for the Presidency, lived up to their professions—how far they redeemed their hollow and deceptive pledges to the country and the world, and with what sincerity they staked their lives and property in support of the measures which should be adopted to vindicate the public rights and redress the public wrongs. The truth is, they fulfilled no one of them, and never designed to do so when they were made. It was all a sham and pretence of patriotism which they never felt, and was put forth for the purpose of deceiving the people, and aiding their party to power and place, at the expense of the real friends of the country. It was a part of that system which has fastened upon them the name of "the war party in peace, and the peace party in war." One of the best informed writers of that day remarks that "the clear, indisputable, and melancholy fact is, that, after having impelled and goaded the Government into measures to procure redress, they not merely withheld their support from those measures, but actually, as far as depended on them, prevented their success." After they had formally resolved "that the suffering armed vessels to station themselves off our harbors, and there to stop, search and capture our vessels—to impress, wound, and murder our citizens—is a gross and criminal neglect of the highest duties of Government, and that an administration that patiently permits the same is not entitled to the confidence of the people"—when that Administration, in the mildest manner possible, attempted to seek redress of the very wrongs which they had so feelingly portrayed, the leaders of the Federal party, in spite of their boasted patriotism, turned round and denounced the Administration which they had just before reproached for its supineness, and, in the violence of their opposition, actually coalesced with the common foe, to defeat and paralyze every effort to redress the very grievances of which they had complained. But it is my principal object, as already stated, to prove what I allege; for which purpose, I shall be obliged to read sundry extracts from the leading newspapers of that period, which seem to me to afford strong evidence of the motives and designs of the Federal party, especially of its leaders; and also to refer to sundry letters and proceedings which appear to be equally corroborative of the same points.

"Every man will presume that he is not bound to regard it (the embargo,) but may send his produce or his merchandise to a foreign market in the same manner as if the Government had not undertaken to prohibit it."—Boston Centinel.

"We know if the embargo be not removed, our citizens will, ere long, set its penalties and restrictions at defiance. It behooves us to speak; for strike we must, if speaking does not answer."—Boston Repertory.

"It is better to suffer the amputation of a limb than to lose the whole body. We must prepare for the operation. Wherefore, then, is New England asleep? Wherefore does she submit to the oppression of enemies in the South? Have we no Moses, who is inspired by the God of our fathers, and will lead us out of the land of Egypt."—Boston Gazette.

"This perpetual embargo being unconstitutional, every man will perceive that he is not bound to regard it. If the petitions do not produce a relaxation, the people ought immediately to assume a higher tone. The Government of Massachusetts has also a duty to perform. This State is still sovereign and independent."—Boston Centinel.

"In my mind, the present crisis excites the most serious apprehension. A storm seems to be gathering, which portends, not a tempest on the ocean, but domestic convulsions. I feel myself bound in conscience to declare, lest the blood of those who should fall in the execution of this measure (the embargo) may lie on my head, that I consider this to be an act which directs a mortal blow at the liberties of my country; an act containing unconstitutional provisions to which the people are not bound to submit, and to which, in my opinion, they will not submit."—Speech of Mr Hillhouse.

This subject might be pursued much further; but the lateness of the hour admonishes me of the necessity of brevity. But I cannot forbear to give one more extract, to show the aim and object of all this clamor and complaint, without even proposing any substitute. It is characteristic of Federal policy to find fault with every thing, and propose nothing:

"The original embargo act had been openly and frequently violated. The public prints in Boston had audaciously and seditiously invited the citizens to set it at defiance. The British Government had also, as we have seen, added the allurement of its powerful invitation. Such an invitation was unnecessary. There are always to be found, in every community, men who will seek the shortest road to fortune, whether through the dark paths of smuggling or otherwise; and these men united their obstreperous brawlings with the clamor raised by those whose grand object was to harass the Government for the chance of regaining the power they had lost."—M. Carey.

This shows in very admirable colors the community of interest which then existed between the office seeker and the speculator, and evinces the venality of motive which governed their actions, and prompted their efforts to overthow the Government of the people. One more reference on this point, and I have done:

"You have reposed confidence in a coward [Jefferson] and leaned on a broken staff too long. The day of political probation is fast verging to a close, when the fate of America will be decided, and laurels, bought with the price of freemen's blood, will grace the brows of the Gallic tyrant. Let every man who holds the name of America dear to him, stretch out his hand and put this accursed thing [the embargo] forever from him. Be resolute—act like the sons of liberty, of God, and your country—nerve your arms with vengeance against the despot who would wrest the inestimable germ of your independence from you, and you shall be conquerors. Give ear no longer to the syren song of Democracy and Jeffersonian liberty; it is a cursed delusion, adopted by traitors and recommended by sycophants. Jefferson, the man who, with the dagger of popular confidence, first gave the stroke to your liberties."—Newburybort Circular.

It was during the period of these publications that the leaders of the Federal party in New England are believed to have plotted the dissolution of the Union, and the establishment of a Northern confederacy upon its ruins. The excitement was carried to the utmost pitch of exasperation. The press teemed with calumny and falsehood levelled at the President and his administration, the principal object of which was to prove a secret alliance with France, in her attempts to prostrate the power and influence of the British crown.

After the labored defence of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I hope I may be excused for detaining the committee for a few minutes, while I exhibit some of the proofs which have induced the opinion which he seems to think is so uncharitable. It is not necessary for me to remark that I have no other knowledge upon the subject, except what is available to all who will take the trouble to examine it. In the first place, I will refer to the mission of John Henry:

Mr. Ryland, Secretary to Sir James Craig, late Governor General of the British Provinces in North America, to Mr. Henry.

"QUEBEC, Jan. 26, 1809.

"MY DEAR SIR: The extraordinary state of things at this time in the Eastern States has suggested to the Governor in Chief the idea of employing you on a secret and confidential mission to Boston, provided an arrangement can be made to meet the important end in view, without throwing an absolute obstacle in the way of your professional pursuits. The information and political observations heretofore received from you, were transmitted by his Excellency to the Secretary of State, who has expressed his particular approbation of them," &c.

From the instructions of J. H. Craig to Mr. Henry.

("Most secret and confidential.)

"QUEBEC, 6th February, 1808.

"The principal object that I recommend to your attention is the endeavor to obtain the most accurate information of the true state of affairs in that part of the Union which, from its wealth, the number of its inhabitants, and the known intelligence of several of its leading men, must naturally possess a very considerable influence over, and will indeed probably lead the other Eastern States of America in the part they may take at this important crisis. I think it necessary to put you on your guard against the sanguineness of an aspiring party. The Federalists, as I understand, have at all times discovered a leaning to this disposition, and their being under its particular influence at this moment, is the more to be expected from their having no ill (well) founded ground for their hopes, of being nearer the attainment of their object, than they have been for some years past. It has been supposed that if the Federalists of the Eastern States should be successful in obtaining that decided influence which may enable them to direct public opinion, it is not improbable that, rather than submit to the continuance of the difficulties and distress to which they are now subject, they will exert that influence to bring about a separation from the general Union. The earliest information on this subject may be of great consequence to our Government, as it may also be that it should be informed how far, in such an event, they would look to England for assistance, or be disposed to enter into a connection with us."

Credential from Sir James Craig to Mr. Henry.

"The bearer, Mr. John Henry, is employed by me, and full confidence may be placed in him for any communication which any person may wish to make to me in the business committed to him. In faith of which, I have given him this under my hand and seal at Quebec, the 6th day of February, 1809.

"J. H. CRAIG."

In pursuance of this commission, Mr. Henry proceeded to the Eastern States, in prosecution of the design, which very clearly appears from the cautious and stealthy language of his letter of instructions. The following are extracts from his correspondence, which evinces, beyond controversy, the brilliant hopes he entertained of success, and the accuracy of his information as to the temper and disposition of parties in this country:

"I learn that the Governor of this State (Vermont) is now visiting the towns in the northern sections of it, and makes no secret of his determination, as commander-in-chief of the militia, to refuse obedience to any command from the General Government, which can tend to interrupt the good understanding that prevails between the citizens of Vermont and his Majesty's subjects in Canada."

Again, he says:

"Notwithstanding, while there is every reason to hope that the Northern States, in their distinct capacity, will unite, and resist by force a war with great Britain, great pains are taken by men of talents and intelligence to confirm the fears of the common people as to the concurrence of the Southern Democrats in the projects of France, and every thing tends to encourage the belief that the dissolution of the Confederacy will be accelerated by the spirit which now actuates both parties."

In another letter, he observes:

"The Federal party declare, that, in the event of a war, the State of Vermont will treat separately for itself with Great Britain, and support, to the utmost of the stipulations into which it may enter, without any regard to the policy of the General Government."

Under date of March 5, 1809, he says:

"I have sufficient means of information to enable me to judge of the proper period for offering the co operation of Great Britain, and opening a correspondence between the Governor-General of British America and those individuals who, from the part they take in the opposition to the National Government, or the influence they may possess in any new order of things that may grow out of the present difference, should be qualified to act in behalf of the Northern States."

Boston, March 7, he again writes:

"I have already given a decided opinion that a declaration of war is not to be expected; but, contrary to all reasonable calculations, should the Congress possess spirit and independence enough to place their popularity in jeopardy by so strange a measure, the Legislature of Massachusetts will give the tone to the neighboring States—will declare itself permanent until a new election of members—invite a Congress, to be composed of delegates from the Federal States, and effect a separate Government for their common defence and common interest. This Congress would probably begin by abrogating the offensive laws, and adopting a plan of Government for the maintenance of the power and authority assumed. They would, by such an act, be in a condition to make or receive proposals from Great Britain."

This letter discloses a very remarkable fact, which cannot be passed over without notice. Five years before the time of the Hartford Convention, this British agent informs his superior of the outline of the plan which was subsequently attempted, and partly carried into success, and which might have succeeded at the adjourned meeting which was to have been held in the following summer, but for the triumph of our arms at the battle of New Orleans, and the news of the treaty of peace that immediately succeeded. He states not only some of the important details of the convention, as it actually took place, several years after, but the motives that would induce it, and the general objects that were to be accomplished, one of which was a separate Government for their common defence and common interest.

It is unreasonable to believe that this information was manufactured for the purpose of deceiving his employer; and especially is it so, as the facts and speculations which he communicates have since become matters of history, at least to a very considerable extent, and doubtless would have been fully attempted, if not successfully carried into operation, but for the providential events of which I have spoken, that prevented their execution, and overwhelmed their projectors with eternal disgrace and infamy. But, sir, I have other testimony equally conclusive, if not of a higher nature, that I will submit to the committee, without remark or commentary:

Mr. Jefferson to Mr. Giles, Dec. 25, 1825.

"He (Mr. Adams) spoke then of the dissatisfaction of the Eastern portion of our confederacy with the restraints of the embargo then existing, and their restlessness under it. That there was nothing which might not be attempted to rid themselves of it. That he had information of the most unquestionable certainty, that certain citizens of the Eastern States (I think he named Massachusetts particularly) were in negotiation with the agents of the British Government. The object of which was an agreement that the New England States should take no further part in the war then going on; that without formally declaring their separation from the Union of the States, they should withdraw from all aid and obedience to them; that their navigation and commerce should be free from restraint or interruption by the British; that they should be considered and treated by them as neutrals, and, as such, might conduct themselves towards both parties; and, at the close of the war, be at liberty to rejoin the confederacy. He assured me that there was imminent danger that the convention would take place; that the temptations were such as might debauch many from their fidelity to the Union; and that, to enable its friends to made head against it, the repeal of the embargo was absolutely necessary. I expressed a just sense of the merit of the information, and of the importance of the disclosure to the safety, and even salvation, of our country; and, however reluctant I was to abandon the measure, (a measure which, persevered in a little longer, we had subsequent and satisfactory assurance, would have effected its object completely,) from that moment, and influenced by that information, I saw the necessity of abandoning it, and, instead of our effecting our purpose by this peaceful weapon, we must fight it out, or break the Union."

Extract of an authorized statement by Mr. Adams, in explanation, published in the National Intelligencer, October 21, 1828

"Mr. Giles, and several other members of Congress, during this session (1808) wrote to Mr. Adams confidential letters, informing him of the various measures proposed as reinforcements or substitutes for the embargo, and soliciting his opinions upon the subject. He answered those letters with frankness and in confidence. He earnestly recommended the substitution of the non-intercourse for the embargo; and, in giving his reasons for this preference, was necessarily led to enlarge upon the views and purposes of certain leaders of the party which had the management of the State Legislature in their hands. He urged that continuance of the embargo much longer would certainly be met by forcible resistance, supported by the Legislature, and probably by the Judiciary of the State.

"That to quell that resistance, if force should be resorted to by the Government, it would produce a civil war; and in that event, he had no doubt that the leaders of the party would secure the co-operation with them of Great Britain. That their object was, and had been for several years, a dissolution of the Union, and the establishment of a separate confederation, he knew from unequivocal evidence, although not proveable in a court of law; and that, in the case of a civil war, the aid of Great Britain to effect that purpose would be as surely resorted to, as it would be indispensably necessary to the design."

All who remember the period when this statement made its appearance, cannot have forgotten the excitement which it produced in New England, and especially among the Boston Federalists, who, at the time, were among the most devoted supporters of Mr. Adams. The press took up the subject, and demanded of the individuals whose situation was such, at the period alluded to, as to designate them among the persons included in the charge, to call upon Mr. Adams for some more specific statement of the accusation. A writer in the Boston Courier says:

"This we, the Federal party, the citizens of Massachusetts, the people of New England, require of them. We are all implicated in the accusation, and all feel its effects; nor can we rest satisfied until it is brought home to individuals, or scattered to the winds."

On the 26th of November, 1828, Harrison G. Otis and twelve others, all leading Federalists in Massachusetts, most of whom are still living and active members of the Whig party, addressed a communication to Mr. Adams, calling for the names of the persons charged, and the evidence upon which the charge rests. Among other things, they say:

"We were associated in politics with the party prevailing here at the period referred to in the statement above mentioned; some of us concurred in all the measures adopted by that party; and we all warmly approved and supported them. Many of our associates, who still survive, are dispersed throughout Massachusetts and Maine, and could not be easily convened, to join us on the present occasion."

Mr. Adams's reply, under date of the 26th of December, is very full and explicit; from which I beg leave to read a few extracts:

"It was in those letters of 1808 and 1809, that I mentioned the design of certain leaders of the Federal party, and the establishment of a Northern confederacy, &c.

"This plan was so far matured, that the proposal had been made to an individual, at the proper time, to be placed at the head of the military movement which, it was foreseen, would be necessary for carrying it into execution.

"The interposition of a kind Providence averted the most deplorable of catastrophes, and turning over to the receptacle of things lost upon earth, the adjourned convention from Hartford to Boston, extinguished (by the mercy of heaven, may it be forever!) the projected New England Confederacy."

In conclusion, he intimates very strongly, that at some future day, a sense of duty may induce him to disclose the evidence which he possesses, and for which they call, but says, the selection of the day must be left to his own judgment—that no array of numbers or power can induce him to make the disclosure prematurely, or to withhold it "when a sense of duty shall sound the alarm." It has already appeared that Mr. Jefferson and his party were obliged to abandon the embargo, to save the Union from the treasonable designs of the Federal party in the Eastern States. Non-intercourse was substituted, on the first of March, 1809. This act met with little or no better reception. It was, at once, denounced as having been dictated by French influence, and as a measure of hostility to England. The cry of French influence and Southern influence were the principal weapons of Federal warfare, in the North, throughout the period of which I am speaking. After the failure of Mr. Erskine's arrangement, the bitterness of party feeling was resumed, if it can be said to have subsided, while it was believed that the overtures he had made would be sanctioned by the British Cabinet. Upon this point, I desire to make one or two remarks, to show the disengenuousness and insincerity of Federal Opposition, and then I will pass on with as much rapidity as possible. While it was supposed that the arrangement had been made by authority, they openly charged that it was precisely what the British Government had always been willing to do; but the moment it was ascertained that it had been rejected upon the pretence that the Minister had transcended his powers, with characteristic regard for truth, they unblushingly asserted that Mr. Madison knew, at the time, that no such instructions had been given, and that he had fraudulently consented to the arrangement, to deceive the people, and gain popularity. The press made this charge, and the minions of party joined in the cry. It soon became evident that hostilities must ensue, as all peaceful efforts to obtain justice had been exhausted, without any success. All parties again demanded redress, and none were more clamorous than those that subsequently opposed the war with so much violence and rancor. It was said that the Administration wanted energy, and that all the difficulty was justly chargeable to its weakness and corruption, and no expression was more common with these patriotic citizens than the one ascribed to their leader in Congress, that the Administration "could not be kicked into a war." They urged the Government on to the brink of hostilities, by complaints and reproaches of the most vindictive character, until it was impossible to recede, without sacrifice both of the rights and honor of the nation; and when the issue was presented, and no alternative left but dishonor, they not only voted against the declaration of war, but immediately adopted an inflammatory address to excite the people to oppose it. Their opposition during the war is so well known, and so universally execrated, that it is not necessary to dwell upon it. The Federal party, in Massachusetts, were more rancorous and uncharitable in their opposition than in any State in the Union. They declared, in the form of a legislative declaration, that "the war was founded in falsehood, declared without necessity, and its real object was extent of territory, by unjust conquests, and to aid the late tyrant of Europe in his view of aggrandizement." Such declaratory resolutions were a very frequent occurrence, though, I believe, they did not require the sanction of both branches of the Legislature.

It would be an endless task, as well as useless labor, to recite all the evidences of the reckless opposition to the war. They withheld, as far as it was within their power, the means for supporting the army and navy; they discouraged enlistments; they prevented loans, and actually devised a regular system for exporting specie out of the country, to cripple the Government, by depriving it of the sinews of war; and, when victory crowned the efforts of the brave, they resolved that "it was unbecoming a moral and religious people to express any approbation of military or naval exploits." This relentless and heartless opposition was kept up, with unabated fury, down to the victory at New Orleans and the subsequent news of the treaty of peace. Peace was concluded on the 24th of December, 1814, but the news did not reach this country until after the battle at New Orleans. The Hartford Convention assembled on the 15th of December, 1814, and adjourned to meet at Boston in the following June, which meeting never took place, but was turned "over to the receptacle of things lost upon earth." The victory of New Orleans, and the treaty of peace, made the triumph of the Democratic party complete. No language can describe their joy. The Federalists were overwhelmed, as well by the successful termination of the conflict, as by the knowledge of the odium which would attach to their treasonable opposition. It is a little remarkable that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SALTONSTALL] should suppose that the overthrow of Napoleon, at the battle of Waterloo, induced the Federal party to disband. That battle did not take place until the following season. It was another great and glorious victory, on this side of the ocean, which seems to have escaped his recollection, that compelled the leaders of that party, at least for the time, to abandon their projects of ambition, and to acquiesce in the ascendency of the favorites of the people.

The next eight years succeeding the war, has been called the "era of good feeling," during which the Federal party endeavored to wipe off, by every species of obsequiousness, the disgrace of their past misdeeds, without any change of their cherished principles. Party organization was abandoned, and of course the animosity of feeling which had long prevailed, subsided. These "no party times," as they have been called, continued, at least in New England, until the election of John Q. Adams by the House of Representatives. The events which led to that result are familiar to all, and need not be recapitulated. Admit, if you please, for it is true, that Mr. Adams was supported by many of the old Republicans; and it is equally true that the body of the Federal party, aroused from their lethargy, rallied to his support. Shortly after his election, the declaration was made, with some appearance of authority, that those who fell with the first Adams should rise with the second; and the course of his administration was supposed to furnish ground for such belief. The old party feeling was aroused to a very high degree of excitement at the ensuing Presidential election; the mass of the Democratic party were embodied again under the banner of Jeffersonian principles, in opposition to an Administration which commanded the confidence and respect of the tariff and bank party in every quarter of the Union. It is impossible for me, at this time, to speak of the beneficial change in the administration of public affairs that was introduced by General Jackson. It is recorded in the grateful remembrance of the people, and constitutes one of the brightest and most enduring pages in the history of the country.

The calumnies and falsehoods that were heaped upon that distinguished individual, by the old opposers of Jefferson, have gone to the "tomb of the Capulets," and it only remains to complete the parallel, after he shall have been consigned to the grave, for his enemies to pronounce his eulogy. Professions of economy are becoming very fashionable, and a most deliberate attempt is made to fasten upon the present Administration the charge of extravagance in the expenditure of the public money. Let no one accuse me of undervaluing any just system of economy; on the contrary, I hold it to be indispensable, in a Republican form of Government, to secure it from corruption, and all the evil tendencies of monarchial institutions. But the appropriate inquiry is, who are the friends of economy, and whose principles, if adopted, will lead to extravagance? I will give one fact to illustrate my views on this subject, after remarking that the only security against improvident expenditure, is to raise no more money from the pockets of the people, than is necessary to meet the obligations of the country upon the strictest principles of frugality. If taxes are levied and collected, the money will be expended; and, indeed, there seems to be a necessity that it should be, for no one will pretend that it would be just or wise to hoard up the currency, or shut it out of circulation. Hence the impolicy of a high tariff; for, if money is collected it must be expended, and this engenders extravagance, and tends to corruption. The fact to which I wish to call your attention, is the veto of the Maysville road bill.

It has been said very justly, I believe, that, at the time when that measure was arrested by the moral courage of General Jackson, unconstitutional appropriations were contemplated to the vast amount of one hundred millions of dollars, by the advocates of the system of which that bill was the germ. Some of the friends of the President were alarmed when they learned his intention to veto it, and even went so far as to desire him to yield to the wishes of a majority of Congress. The result is known. The Democratic party sustained him with increased vigor; and, though a few deserted, the mass remained firm. This was a specimen of economy worth talking about, the influence of which will be felt, it is to be hoped, through all coming time. One would think that the advocates of this system of wasteful and unconstitutional expenditure would be restrained, by a sense of delicacy, from making charges of extravagance against those whom they have uniformly derided as the upholders of a niggardly policy of retrenchment. It is not denied, that, for a time, many honest Democrats were found in opposition to that Administration, through a feeling of distrust of the fitness or prudence of the incumbent, which had been engendered by the violence and wickedness of his opposers, and by the wide-spread calumnies which had been circulated for the purpose of blackening his character and blasting his reputation—a reputation which had been earned in the field of danger, through toil and peril, in defence of the honor and glory of his country. But as the policy of his Administration was developed, these ill-grounded fears were dissipated in the cheering exhibitions of wisdom, patriotism, and sound Republican principles, which characterized his course, and furnished the most gratifying assurance of that devotion to principle which so signally marked his public career. At his second election, the whole Democratic party in New England, with the exception of a few individuals, who became traitors to their own principles, were united, and gave to the hero of New Orleans a generous and hearty support. No one can oppose to this declaration a successful denial. Each party rallied under the respective banners of their long cherished principles, and entered into the contest with spirit and determination. With very few exceptions, the Federalists gave their support to Mr. Adams. It is a very common saying, that "one swallow does not make summer," or, as the legal maxim has it, that "a single instance does not make law:" so, the party association of a few individuals, after the lapse of many years, does not afford any evidence of the principles of the party with which they happen to be classed, with reference to a previous organization, or the position of the masses of which that organization was composed. I am willing to admit that a few Democrats remained in opposition, and that, generally speaking, they maintain, to this day, like all traitors, that every body has changed his principles and position, except themselves; that, while they have stood firm and inflexible, each of the two great political parties of the country has changed sides—that is, the Federalists have become Democrats, for their particular accommodation, and the Democrats have abandoned their cherished principles and joined their enemies, although, if the story be true, there was scarcely any one left for them to oin.

On the other hand, I am not disposed to deny that a small portion of the Federal party supported the election of General Jackson, most of whom have deserted and gone back to their old associates; and, without meaning any disrespect to individuals, it is my sincere desire that they may never return to make further trouble in the Democratic ranks. Those that remain, are believed to be sincere, in the change of principles which they profess. Generally speaking, they acknowledge their past errors, and avow their change of principle and position. This I believe to be the true state of the case. I can speak with the utmost confidence, when I say that within the limit of my own acquaintance, it is an undeniable fact, that the mass of the old Republicans then living, were the warm and zealous supporters of the second election of President Jackson, and continued throughout to approve of the principles and measures of his administration; the distinctive features of which were a strict construction of the Constitution, opposition to a National Bank, the reduction of the tariff and the receipts of the Treasury, as far as possible without injury to the great interests of the country, to the wants of the Government upon the strictest principles of accountability and economy, and an undeviating hostility to unconstitutional appropriations upon local objects of improvement. That the Federal party opposed this Administration, its principles and policy, with unrelenting and uncompromising hostility, is susceptible of the clearest demonstration, if the fact does not stand confessed. All the old Federal presses, including the Boston Centinel, teemed with abuse and misrepresentation of the same reckless character as had marked their opposition to Jefferson and Madison. But proof on this point would be a work of supererogation, and therefore I will desist. My confidence in the intelligence of the people, induces me to believe that they cannot be deceived in this matter, relating, as it does, to events which are fresh in their recollection. If these things be so, an inference will follow, when one other fact is established, about which I imagine there is still less dispute, of great importance in the inquiry which I am pursuing. The additional fact that I wish to establish, I presume no one will deny, and therefore does not require proof, but may be fairly assumed; and it is, that the supporters, principles, and policy, of the present Administration, are identical with the one that preceded it. It may be said that it is in contemplation to substitute the Independent Treasury system for the collection, safe keeping, and disbursement of the public money, in the place of the State banks; but this does not afford the distinction required. The State banks were selected as an experiment. It has signally failed, through the misconduct and bad faith of the banks themselves; and it is well known, that, after the suspension of specie payments in 1837, and the refusal of the banks to pay over nearly thirty millions of the public money, which had been collected from the people, and deposited with the banks for safe keeping, General Jackson, no less than Mr. Van Buren, became satisfied that no further confidence could be reposed in them as depositories of the public treasure, and both alike approved of the new recommendation that was made, and which, I trust, before this session terminates, will become the law of the land. One accusation of the Opposition is, therefore, fully sustained, and will be cheerfully admitted, that Mr. Van Buren is "treading in the footsteps of his illustrious predecessor." I hope gentlemen will not back out of this charge, because it may be convenient to do so to avoid the consequences of an issue they wish to escape. Will any one undertake to deny that the principles and measures of the two Administrations are the same in all the essential elements of national policy? Surely no one will attempt it; and that their supporters are the same in New England, with individual exceptions, I appeal to every city, district, and village in that section of country, for the confirmation of what I affirm; and I am willing to stand or fall before my constituents, upon the truth of the fact which I have now stated, confining its application, of course, to the limits of my acquaintance, which is not very limited, in two or three of those States. Every member of the Hartford Convention now living, is opposed to this Administration. The talented and distinguished committee that addressed Mr. Adams, and called upon him for the evidence to sustain the charge he had made against themselves, or their associates, who were "dispersed throughout Massachusetts and Maine," at least so many of them as are now living, are members of the Whig party; and the Boston Centinel, and other old Federal journals, constitute the leading organs of that party in the unparalleled and unheard of struggle to overthrow the present Democratic Administration; and if all these things be so, it remains for the people to determine, as they surely will, who are the followers of Jefferson, and who are Federalists. The principles of parties at the present time will now be considered with a little more particularity, but with as much brevity as possible. It has already appeared, that, throughout the period of party organization, they have been separated by an impassable gulf in their views and feelings, upon the construction of the Constitution. In the progress of events, other questions, temporary in their nature, have largely contributed to the bitterness and acrimony of party strife, which at times has threatened the existence of the Union itself; but as these temporary causes of irritation pass away, parties are seen to settle down upon the standard of principle, upon which the division first took place. Such is the case at the present time, in spite of all the efforts in certain quarters to conceal it. The present contest is one for principle, and its dividing line is bottomed upon the construction of the Constitution as leading to different measures of policy in the administration of public affairs. Of the many essential grounds of division between parties under the existing organization, I shall only be able to speak of some of those which have attracted the largest share of public attention under preceding Administrations. This Administration, and the party supporting it, are opposed to a National Bank, believing it to be both unconstitutional and inexpedient.

It is scarcely necessary to remark, that this question has lost nothing of the importance that was originally attached to it by its early opposers, from the lights of experience; but, on the contrary, its dangerous tendency has been fully demonstrated, in the fearful exhibitions of the powerful and despotic sway over the property and liberty of the citizens, which such an institution is capable of exerting, when placed under the control of corporate power, and subject to the direction of designing men. The conduct of the late Bank of the United States is fresh in the recollection of the people of this country, and need not be recapitulated. It is sufficient to say, that the worst fears and apprehensions of its opposers have been realized to their utmost extent, and so much so that it is my deliberate opinion that a great majority of the American people have become sick and tired of the periodical fluctuations in the currency, which are the inevitable consequence of a paper standard of value. The reasons of this opinion I will forbear to state, as it would be inconsistent with the general design of my remarks. It is more my object to ascertain what are the principles of the Democratic party, for the purpose of contrasting them with those of the other side, than to detain the committee by entering into a full explanation and defence of them. The soundest principles of economy, as well as of justice, are opposed to a high tariff. It is a perversion of the taxing power which was confided to Congress by the Constitution for the purpose of providing for the general welfare of the whole Union, and not for the benefit of a few individuals at the expense of the many. Any system, therefore, which imposes burdens upon the body of the people to confer favor upon a limited class of individuals or corporations, is a perversion and infraction of the grant to lay taxes, because it is not to provide for the general welfare of the whole, but to administer to the cupidity and avariee of the few; and, therefore, any exaction for the sole benefit of one branch of industry, at the expense of all others, is a germ of Federal construction, not authorized by the Constitution, the whole tendency of which is to pervert our Republican institutions from a state of purity and simplicy, into a splendid system of national power, in subversion of the rights of the States, and of the liberties of the people. A strict constitutional limitation of the taxing power, is the only safeguard against corruption and extravagance. Hence the sleepless vigilance of the Democratic party in their opposition to an unauthorized tariff. The aim and objects of its projectors will be hinted at hereafter. Again: no one pretends that there is any express grant to authorize the appropriation of the national treasure upon local objects of improvement. This, too, is based upon construction, and is claimed by implication. The Democratic party oppose it upon constitutional grounds, as well as on account of the injustice and inequality of its operation upon the different sections of the Union. It is a gambling, log-rolling system, calculated to corrupt the deliberations of Congress, and to foster division and heart burnings among the several States of the Confederacy.

On this point I desire to be distinctly understood. It is not the danger of exasperation of sectional feeling that constitutes the essential ground of the opposition of the Democratic party to this system, for that has reference to its expediency; but it is regarded as the exercise of an unauthorized power, contravening the Constitution and infringing upon the sovereignty of the States. There are very strong objections to it on the score of expediency. In addition to what has been said, it leads to unnecessary and exorbitant taxation, by creating new objects of appropriation, without number or bound, except in the discretion of Congress. It has been called the sluiceway of the tariff system, and I do not know of a more appropriate name. The friends of the tariff have uniformly supported it, for the reason, undoubtedly, that the drain from the Treasury, which it occasions, would further their designs. In all its consequences it is productive of evil, without any counterbalancing good. Again: the power to collect money to any amount from the people and to distribute it as a matter of favor to the States, or to corporations, is a species of despotism of the most odious character. The projected schemes of distribution find no favor with the Democratic party. They have resisted it, and will continue to resist it, in any and every shape and form in which it may be presented, whether under the pretence of donation or under the disguise of the assumption of the State debts.

The policy to be pursued in relation to the public domain demands the most solemn consideration of the community, and is likely to excite very much of public attention, for many years to come, both on account of its bearing upon the finances of the country, and the principles involved in the various schemes that have been projected to divert the accruing profit of the annual sales from the Nation Treasury. The distribution system is the most formidable and the most dangerous of any that has been presented, on account of the bait which it offers to the indebted States, no less than to the manufacturers, who see that, if it prevails, it must lay the foundation for a very great increase of taxation, and contribute very largely to their interests and designs. The mode of collecting, keeping, and disbursing the public money, is an important feature in every system of national policy. Taxes must be levied, in some way, and, to a greater or less extent, in all Governments; and the money must be collected and disbursed in one currency or another. The policy of the Democratic party, in this behalf, is well known, though it has been shamefully misrepresented in all its objects and effects. It is true that Government dues will be prospectively collected in gold and silver, and that the payments to the army and navy, and all the public creditors, will be made in the same currency, as they ought to be, and must be, if we are to have a Government of the people and not of the banks; but the States will be left to regulate their own institutions in their own way; and it should not be forgotten that the specie that the Government collects is immediately distributed among the people, and goes into the general circulation. The effect of this measure will be to infuse into the circulating medium of the country a larger proportion of the precious metals, and to contribute in no small degree the means to secure the convertibility of bank paper in the several States by preventing the exportation of specie, while the process of collection and payment will distribute it among the people, where it is less exposed to the grasp of the speculators and brokers at the moment of pecuniary distress, and, by the natural laws of trade, it will flow back to relieve the banks in the hour of peril, and enable them to maintain a specie basis. Another, and a very important consideration at this time, is the subject of Abolition. A sincere attachment to the union of the States is among the cardinal doctrines in the creed of Democratic Republicanism, and ever has been, from the foundation of the Government to the present time. It has already appeared that the cry of Southern influence was a prominent topic of Federal warfare in the North, in the days of Jefferson and Madison, to excite the prejudices of the North against the South, and the seeds of political abolition may be seen in the proceedings of the Hartford Convention, where they propose an amendment to the Constitution, "so that Representatives and direct taxes shall be apportioned according to their respective numbers of free persons, excluding Indians not taxed, and all other persons." The supporters of this Administration in the North, with a few exceptions, are utterly opposed to all the mean and incendiary schemes of political Abolitionists. They are determined to maintain inviolate the compromises of the Constitution, in good faith, and under all circumstances. I mean not to say that the Whig party are all Abolitionists, but most of the Abolitionists are Whigs; and some of their political leaders are incessant in their efforts to make political capital out of the natural prejudices of a free people against the institution of slavery, and also out of the past proceedings of Congress touching the disposition of Abolition petitions. The Abolitionists in the district I represent, almost to a man, vote the Whig ticket. If, at the time of my election, I received one vote from that quarter, it is unknown to me. I do not believe that any such case can be found. Having said thus much, I will only add on this point, that many of the Abolitionists are honest and upright men, and sincerely believe they are engaged in God's service, without the remotest intention of doing any thing to hazard the peace of the country, or the union of the States. It was my intention to have made a few remarks as to the right of the people to be informed of the views and principles of candidates for elective offices; but this ground has been so ably and fully occupied by those that have preceded me in the debate, that I despair of being able to offer any thing either new or useful, and therefore I will forbear.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I approach a more difficult inquiry. What are the principles of the party calling themselves Whigs? If we look at the present, we have no means to form any conclusion whatever; silence and secrecy reign throughout the land. Recent information discloses the fact that they have gone through the parade and form of a national convention, and presented candidates to the American people for the first two offices within their gift, but adjourned without "any general declaration of the views of the great Opposition party;" and we are since told, with the air of authority, that "it was deemed impolitic, at the then crisis," to make any such exposition—for the reason, undoubtedly, "that no new issue be made to the public." But the people were not satisfied to take these important matters on trust; and, when they found they were seriously called upon to discard their public servants, and give their places to others, the inquiry, as was natural, at once arose, wherein will the country be benefited by the change? It seems the people supposed they had a right to know what they were to expect, if they should consent to the change. They believed it was a matter in which they had some interest; and, as the convention had neglected to inform them, they thought they would apply to the General himself. Knowing that General Jackson was an honest, frank man, and never concealed his opinions, they could not doubt that General Harrison would take great pleasure in informing them upon matters of such vital interest, to enable them to determine what course they would adopt at the approaching election. But the only answer yet received is the one from his confidential committee, in which they say "that their policy is, that the General make no further declaration of his principles for the public eye, whilst occupying his present position." So that the people are still in the dark upon the subject of the inquiry, and likely to remain so, unless information can be had from other sources than General Harrison or his confidential committee. To prevent misrepresentation, I will say, once and for all, that it is no part of my intention to disparage General Harrison, or to speak disrespectfully of any man living, but it has been my object throughout to deal with the party opposed to this Administration with the freedom which the Constitution secures to every Representative of the people. The inquiry is still to be answered, what are the principles of the Opposition? One of the best definitions that I have seen, is to be found in a letter of J. Q. Adams to Dutee J. Pierce, dated 7th September 1835. Here Mr. C. read the letter, of which the following are extracts:

"I am yet convinced that the party which has been these two years struggling to break you down, the base compound of Hartford Convention Federalism and royal arch masonry, is so rotten with the corruption of both its elements that I hail with joy the victory which you have achieved over it."

Again he says:

"Of that party, treachery is so favorite an instrument, that I have heard Mr. Burgess complains that they have used it even with him. It is their nature and their vocation."

And again:

"They have no honest principle to keep them together; their only cement is a sympathy of hatred to every man of purer principles than themselves."

It is proper to remark, that Mr. Adams does not use the term Whig party, but he was speaking of the party opposed to Mr. Pierce, and every one knows which party that was. Now, it would not be parliamentary for me to say that any member of this committee was destitute of political principle, but I have a right to say, that the Whig party, as such, has no principles of national policy, which they dare avow. If this be a mistake, why is it not corrected? If it is not convenient for the hero to speak, why do not his friends speak for him? If one committee is not sufficient, give him more, but let us have an answer. The people want light—they demand it, and if their reasonable request is refused, does any one so far undervalue their intelligence as to suppose they will be deceived as to the reasons which dictate the refusal? It is impossible. What is the course of the Opposition press at this time? Absolutely filled with mere hurrah, and nothing but hurrah. When the inquiry is made of them, Is your candidate in favor of a national bank? we are met with the answer, Hurrah for Tippecanoe. Is he in favor of a high tariff? a similar answer is ready: hurrah for the "log cabin and hard cider;" and so on throughout the catalogue. What sort of an issue is this to present to a free and intelligent people, capable of governing themselves, and claiming the right to choose their own public agents to administer the affairs of a Government of their own creation, and which every motive of interest and patriotism prompts them to uphold? Do not be deceived, gentlemen; this shallow trickery will not avail you; it cannot succeed. You must come out from your hiding places, and avow your principles, and expose them to public scrutiny, or you will be overwhelmed in the result. The people of this country cannot be deceived by any such devices. Even in the midst of the torrent of abuse and complaint against this Administration, they will turn round to its revilers, and ask them—What do you propose, to remedy the evils of which you complain; and what does your candidate for the Presidency propose; and what authority have you to speak for him, after he has refused to speak for himself? Then gentlemen will find that all this talk about the poor man's candidate will not stand the test of the scrutiny and intelligence of the laboring man in the Northern States. I am sure that this class of my constituents would feel themselves insulted by any such flummery; they have too much good sense, and understand Federal treachery too well, sir, to be thus easily deceived; and let any party that does not believe it, make the attempt—I am willing to witness the result. But it is useless to pursue this matter further; for one, I am satisfied what the country must expect, if the Opposition should be successful in their efforts to overthrow this Administration, of which I do not believe there is the least danger; but if, contrary to all reasonable calculations, they succeed, then we must prepare ourselves for another reign of Federal misrule. A National Bank will be chartered, the tariff will be restored and increased, unconstitutional appropriations will follow, and the proceeds of the sales of the public lands will be divided among the States, and the State debts will be assumed, and, to complete the catalogue of mischief that will ensue, the North and the South will be arrayed against each other upon the subject of Abolition, the effect of which I will not undertake to predict, but the future will show. Now if, in all this, as a humble member of the Democratic party, I am mistaken, is it not true that thousands of the people of this country honestly believe that it is all likely to take place; and if there is any mistake about it, why does not the Whig candidate speak out and remove the impression?

SPEECH OF MR. JONES, OF VIRGINIA.

In the House of Representatives, April 11th, 1840—In Committee of the Whole, on the bill making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year 1840.

Mr. JONES of Virginia said: It is obviously the disposition of some gentlemen, in directing their attacks against this Administration, to deal almost entirely in vague generalities, and thus, for a time, frequently to create a state of doubt on the public mind; while they carefully avoid an investigation of the details which would remove their own difficulties. They indulge in indiscriminate condemnation of every measure, without examining the reasons which may have prompted their adoption. Instead of this general mode of attack, why is it that they do not put their fingers on the items which they consider objectionable? Why do they not venture on an examination of the details? Why not conduct the debate according to the direction of our rule, and, suffering the bill to be read section by section, level their arguments against each section as it comes up for consideration. If my colleague wishes to furnish information to the people, why does he not communicate it in a direct and tangible form, instead of leaving them to the uncertainty of inferences deduced from premises, the truth of which is disputable?

When he denounces what he terms extravagance, he neglects to deduct large sums, which cannot, in fairness, be included in the expenditures of the Government. Does he not know that the whole expense of the Post Office Department is derived exclusively from its own resources, and not drawn from the Treasury of the United States?

[Mr. WISE said he confessed the fact, that the item of the Post Office is not taken from the Treasury. But would his colleague tell the people that it is not as much an appropriation of the people's money as the other? He knew that, technically, we have a Treasury, and technically a treasury of the Post Office, but it is all public money.]

Mr. JONES. I meant to assert that the money applied for the purposes of the Post Office Department is derived from postages on letters alone, and not through the ordinary channels of taxation; and in point of fact is never carried into the Treasury of the United States. The receipts and expenditures of the Post Office Department are confined to its own operations; it is entirely separate and distinct from the Treasury; and all its funds are exclusively applied towards increasing the facilities afforded by the mails. Until within the last few years, the money of this department was never, in fact, entered on the books of the Treasury at all. Nominally it is now transferred to that general depository; but, in reality, it is never carried there. Under the act of 1836, to which my colleague has referred, ninety-nine hundreths, if not the whole, of the Post Office revenue, is applied and disbursed before it reaches the Treasury. The operations of this department of the Government, presents the strange anomaly of the application of five millions of dollars without superinducing any cost in its disbursement. The warrants are drawn upon the money in the hands of the postmasters scattered over the whole face of the country, and applied to the liquidation of the debts of the department.

Deducting the expenditures of the Post Office, which are not embraced in the expenditures prior to 1836, and cannot fairly be forced within the range of the argument, I proceed to examine the character of the expenses comprised within the three divisions of the civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous. My colleague has asserted that there has been a vast increase in these expenditures: but the reasoning by which he has reached his conclusions is wholly fallacious. When he examines the facts and the details, I am confident he will agree with me, when I assert that his deductions are not fairly derivable from the premises; and amid the numerous items which make up the aggregate of the bill, he has subjected but one to criticism. He denounces the enormous increase of the appropriations for defraying the expenses of the district courts. This year it reaches the sum of $300,000; last year it amounted to $128,000.

The objection made to the item under consideration, will be found, on examination, to be wholly untenable. Last year the appropriation was $128,000; this year it amounts to $300,000. The difference appears to my colleague enormous and inexplicable; one simple fact will furnish a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. At the commencement of the last session of Congress, there was in the Treasury, of former appropriations, an unexpended balance of $214,000, applicable to this branch of the service. By adding this balance to the sum appropriated last year, it is seen that $342,000 were deemed necessary to meet the expenditures of that year. The whole sum appropriated is now completely exhausted; and when $300,000 are asked for the present year, it must be obvious, that less is required than was actually expended the last. It is apparent, therefore, that the anticipated expenditure does not transcend what has been shown by experience to be absolutely requisite.

I feel confident that I shall be able to convince my colleague, and if not him, to satisfy the people of the country, that no appropriation is called for in this bill, which is not only just and reasonable in itself, but indispensable for the public service. I shall demonstrate that the amounts required, where the sums are not fixed by law, are proportionately less than the sums demanded for the same objects in previous years. Will he not grant that the aggregate amount of the appropriations asked for the service of the present year, is less by five millions of dollars than was appropriated last year?

[Mr. WISE. I shall forbear expressing an opinion until the end of the session.]

Mr. JONES. If I can obtain the co-operation of my colleague and his friends in a steady refusal to go beyond the estimates furnished by the Departments, I vouch for a clear reduction of five millions of dollars, even at the time he fixes for deciding the question. He prefers, however, to defer his answer till the end of the session. His objections have been urged against the bills reported as they now stand; my remarks apply to them in their present shape. He denounces the extravagance of the estimates; I maintain them to be less than in the preceding year. I ask his assent to an assertion, stating a plain matter of fact, and he evades an answer. The reason is obvious.

He has been unusually vehement in his denunciations against what he calls the reckless expenditures of the Administration. But why does he refuse to enter into an examination of the details? Let him scrutinize the items of the bill, and I defy him to substantiate the allegations he so boldly makes, when shooting his arrows from behind the broad shield of generalities. But if he will not dissect the subject, I will undertake the office for him. I will present the facts, and await the comments from him. Between my facts and his arguments, let the people decide.

The administration of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] is the model of economy which the enthusiasm of his friends has set up for our imitation. I am a friend of economy—I am an advocate of the strictest economy in the administration of the Government. My colleague, with an air of triumph, has put forward the Administration to which I have just referred, as furnishing an example which we should imitate. I will join issue with him. If that be the legitimate prototype, I shall prove our copy not inferior to it—I shall demonstrate, from the evidence before me, that the Administration of vaunted economy has nothing to boast of, when brought into comparison with the present. But little ingenuity or exertion will be required to prove that the appropriations called for by the present bill, are not more extravagant than those to be found in a corresponding bill, passed under the administration of the gentleman from Massachusetts, since the items of increase in this bill over that with which I propose to compare it, cannot fail to strike every one as not only necessary and proper, but absolutely indispensable.

We have been confidently told that the increase of population furnishes the true rule for the increase of expenditure; and we are condemned for increasing the expenditures beyond the limit which this test will warrant. The principle advanced I maintain to be wholly untenable. I shall not run counter to the prejudices of gentlemen. Their attacks are directed against the present and the preceding Administrations. These I shall pass by for the present, and test the soundness of the doctrine they hold, by a reference to the ratio of increase at former periods. If I can show that the increase of expenditure during the administrations of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, has transcended the ratio thus established; if I can show that even at those periods, the rule relied upon proves counterfeit, when tried by this touchstone, it must be confessed that the test is utterly valueless. Let us compare fact with assertion, history with hypothesis.

In the year 1793, the total of the civil expenses of the Government, including appropriations for foreign intercourse and miscellaneous objects, amounted to about half a million of dollars.

In 1818 the expenditures for the same objects had increased to four millions of dollars. The reason why I have selected these two periods needs no explanation. They comprise a lapse of twenty-five years, within which, according to universally received opinion, population doubles itself. During this period, including a quarter of a century, white population advanced one hundred per cent; the expenses of the Government increased eight hundred per cent. It will be unhesitatingly confessed, that the Administrations to which I have referred as the basis of the calculation, are the least liable to objection; and yet the data they furnish go to prove most unanswerably that population and expenditure are not progressive in the same ratio; that the one cannot be graduated by the other. With the knowledge of these facts, where is the force of the argument that has engendered such acrimony of denunciation against the alleged unjustifiable increase of the estimates of expenditure for the present year?

But the comparison I have just made has been instituted between the progressive disbursements of the civil list only, and the advance of population. The charges made have been urged against this particular branch of public expenditure; and, conscious of the correctness of the principles I am advocating, and consequently willing to yield every advantage which gentlemen may desire to claim, I have, in compliance with their implied wishes, limited my comparison and argument to it alone. But there exists no good reason why, in testing the soundness of the doctrines which I am attempting to refute, we should not compare the progression of the whole amount of public expenditures for all objects with that of population. By this change in the character of the investigation, we shall again discover that the principles of graduation relied upon are equally deceptive.

In 1793, we find the aggregate expenditures of the Government, in all its departments, to have been about three millions of dollars; and in 1818, about fifteen millions. I speak in round numbers. The ratio of increase in population was one hundred per cent., while that of expenditure was five hundred per cent. In every aspect the doctrine which has been advanced is erroneous.

[Mr. CUSHING begged leave to explain. When he referred to the increase of population as a test for the increase of expenditure, he did not say that he assumed it as a test; but was speaking in answer to one of the friends of the Administration, who had assumed that position. He had before him some remarks, in which it is stated that the expenditures of the Government had not gone beyond the increase of population. He, in reply, had said, that facts would not bear out this assumed test; but whether it were a good or a bad test, he did not pretend to say.]

Mr. JONES. I am glad that an opportunity has been afforded to the gentleman for making this explanation; for, until this moment, I have been under the impression that such was the ground he had assumed, and he was so understood by many around him. This test is, then, confessedly unsafe, and not to be relied on; but no more reliance can be placed on the converse of the rule. In 1834 and 1835, within sixteen or seventeen years after the period on which I have been just commenting, the whole expenditure was from seventeen to eighteen millions, showing an increase of less than twenty-five per cent. in the expenditures, while population had advanced at least sixty-six per cent. In 1837, 1838, and 1839, the annual expenditures, for the civil list, miscellaneous, and foreign intercourse, have not reached more than five millions and a half of dollars, being an addition of less than forty per cent. while the increase of population has been eighty-five per cent. In no aspect whatever is this principle of graduation defensible. The test is wholly delusive.

I will pursue the investigation of this branch of the subject no farther, but will return to the argument of my colleague. He is astonished that the aggregate amount under the various heads of contingencies should go beyond $400,000. True: but amid the numerous, very numerous, items constituting this aggregate, has he selected one which he has attempted to prove to be unnecessary? So far from attempting an argument of this character, he has not even made the assertion. These contingencies apply to a vast variety of objects in all the departments of the Government, and comprehend many details of unavoidable expenditure. It is not, therefore, surprising, that the total should reach the gross sum he has mentioned. But the total, though large, as he asserts, cannot of itself be a proof of extravagance. This charge can be made good only by showing that some of the items were uncalled for. I do not ask of him an impossibility; I do not ask him to prove any of them to be unnecessary: I but ask him to point out one which he conceives objectionable, and I will undertake to demonstrate—which I think I can do with but little difficulty—that it is just, proper, and indispensable.

But as my colleague will not venture on details to substantiate his allegations, I will meet him on his own ground, fight him with the weapons of his own selection, and under the rules prescribed by himself. The administration of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ADAMS] is the model to which the attention of the country has been invited. To satisfy the scruples of my colleague, I will institute a comparison between the expenses of the civil list proposed by this bill, and the same class of expenditures under that Administration, and prove to him, in the only way which can apparently convince him, that his charge of extravagance is utterly groundless. But allow me to direct his attention to some important facts, the knowledge of which is essential to a perfect elucidation of the subject. Since that period, there has been a vast increase in our population: two new States have been added to the Union; many additional judges have been appointed; the circuit and district court systems have been extended to all the States, having been established not only in the new States, but also extended in the old ones, where formerly they did not exist. With all these reasons for additional expenditures, an increase was inevitable. Does my colleague remember what was the amount of the civil list then? From principle and habit, I shall adhere strictly to the question before me, and not wander into the discussion of matters extraneous and irrelevant. Can he say what was the amount of the civil list in the days of economy—I mean during the administration of the gentleman from Massachusetts? I will will inform him? It was:

For the civil list proper - -	$1,327,069 36
Miscellaneous - - -	1,634,517 30
Foreign intercourse - -	207,765 85
Making an aggregate of - -	$3,169,352 51

Such was the civil list at the period to which we are referred for our model. But this amount, it is alleged, has been immensely and unjustifiably transcended since. Let us examine the soundness of this position, by instituting the comparison to which I have been invited by my colleague. The expenditures for 1829, which has been selected by a gentleman on the opposite side, amounted, as I have already said, to $3,169,352 51; for this year the appropriation required is $4,973,000. There has been, I admit, an increase; but is it extravagant and unjustifiable? Let facts answer. In the first place, the session of 1829 was a short one; the session this year a long one. The census has been taken since that year, and the number of members of Congress increased. From these two circumstances, the expenditures of the two Houses of Congress must be greatly augmented.

[Mr. WISE. Will my colleague tell me if he includes the Post Office?]

Mr. JONES. At present unquestionably not. My observations have been explicitly confined to the expenditures of the two Houses of Congress. When I reach the Post Office, my colleague shall be informed of the fact. But to resume. For 1840, the amount required for pay and mileage of members of Congress is estimated at $668,000

Under Mr. Mc. Adams's administration it was - - - - $304,000

Making a difference in this item alone of $364,000

This branch of expenditure is definitively fixed by law; and consequently the Administration is not responsible for the disparity apparent between the two periods. Yet the pay and mileage of members form a large portion of the increase, which has been denounced as extravagance.

I wish my colleague to note carefully the facts in the comparison. I am solicitous to furnish him the data, which may enable him to come to a correct conclusion. The contingent expenses of this Congress amount to - - - $395,000
At the former session, to which we are referred, they were but - - $155,000

Here is an increase of - - $240,000 which my colleague will hardly charge upon the Executive. If censure fall any where, he and I must submit to take our fair proportion of it.

I now give notice to my colleague, that it is my purpose to examine the expenditures in the Post Office Department.

For this year they amount to - $158,000
In 1829 they were - - - $67,000

It is known to all, that in order to keep pace with the rapidly growing and extending population of our country, it has become necessary greatly to extend the mail facilities. This circumstance alone justifies a great increase of expenditure for this object. Moreover, as far as the revenue of the Department would allow increased mail facilities, the interests of the people have been looked to, and their wishes complied with: care being taken that the expenditure should not exceed the income. The increase of mail routes and post offices, rendered an addition to the number of clerks in the Department also necessary, where it is admitted that men work with more untiring industry than in any other Department of the Government. This necessary increase of expense appears to me to be beyond the pale of the gentleman's censure.

The expenses of the Judiciary have been unquestionably much enlarged. But does not my colleague know that more judges have been added to the bench of the Supreme Court—more to the District Courts? Was any objection made to the additional judges on the passage of the law providing for their appointment? The measure was popular, and but slight objection was made to it from any quarter. If this be so, is the Administration to be charged with extravagance because the courts cost more now than they did ten years ago?

[Mr. WISE. I shall vote any thing for the Judiciary.]

Mr. JONES. My colleague will vote any thing for the Judiciary. He will unhesitatingly accede to any increase of expenditure for this single department. He admits, then, that the expenses under this head must be necessarily progressive; but not so in reference to other branches of expenditure: for them no increase is to be tolerated. I congratulate my colleague for extending his benevolence even to the Judiciary. To this increase of expenditure he has no objection to make; and yet the addition to the appropriations for this object constitutes no small item in the aggregate of expenditures which he so strongly condemns.

In 1829 there was drawn from the Treasury to defray the necessary expenses of the Judiciary, the sum of $239,000, while for the service of 1840, $429,000 are estimated to be indispensable: making a difference of $190,000. For this difference, though great, my colleague can find a full justification, and he extends over it the mantle of his approbation. He then should not only approve the expenditure, but in his calculations deduct it from the aggregate, which he characterizes as extravagant.

But there are other deductions, which, in justice, he is called upon to make. Can he find no sufficient reason to justify the increased expense of surveying the public lands? He must know that the quantity of land brought into market during the last three years, greatly exceeded in each year, that which was sold in 1829. The increase in the demand, rendered necessary more extensive surveys, and consequently the employment of a large force of surveyors and assistants; the establishment of new land offices, with their inseparable appendages—in a word, the enlargement of the whole land office machinery.

The immense accession to the quantity of lands sold within the last few years, warrants the increase of expenditure in this department. Purchasers for the lands appeared; for their benefit and accommodation, the surveys were made. The quantity of land sold, justifies the extent of the surveys, and the extension of the surveys involves a pro rata increase of expense. Here, then, we have another item to be deducted from the sum total denominated extravagance. The subtraction of $175,000 will produce a material diminution in the excess complained of, in the civil list of the present year.

But it may be said, granting the validity of the reasons which vindicate the excess of the present appropriations over those of 1829, what argument is there to justify the reckless prodigality which asks for a sum this year, so surprisingly disproportionate to the amount required last? The explanation is easy. Last year, and the year preceding, large balances of former appropriations remained unexpended, which were adplicable to the service of those years. The reasons why larger sums had been asked at former periods, than were actually expended, are too obvious to require explanation. As these balances remained, but very small sums were asked and appropriated for those two years. Now, all the appropriations have been exhausted, and consequently, the appropriation for the present year must be sufficient to cover all the anticipated expenses of bringing into market the immense quantity of land which it is proposed to survey and offer for sale.

There are still other deductions to be made from the aggregate of alleged extravagance; but these will not require an elaborate detailed investigation I shall bring the items to the view of my colleague as rapidly as possible, and thus satisfy him of the injustice of his accusations. In 1829 there was but one mint, the operations of which created a charge on the Government of little more than $95,000. Since that time, gold has been found in large quantities in many portions of the Southern country, which has led to the establishment of three branch mints; and now the annual expenses of the four amount to $138,000. In passing I may observe that the appropriation for the principal mint in Philadelphia this year, is one-third less than was required for it in 1829. Again, in that year there was drawn from the public Treasury only $55,000 to defray the expenses of the Territories, while for the same branch of expenditure, $123,000 are required at present. For the increase incurred for these objects, my colleague will not venture to inculpate the Administration; nor can he, with any show of reason, charge it with unwarrantable extravagance because more public buildings are in progress of erection in this District and elsewhere, than there were at the period referred to: since, owing to causes against which human providence cannot always guard, several costly public buildings have been destroyed by fire, and the erection of others more durable rendered necessary. In 1829, $83,000 were required for this purpose; now not less than $474,000 are wanted. Then $391,000 more, must be subtracted from the amount of what my colleague denounces as extravagance.
